The Week.

THE Democratic nomination we have discussed elsewhere. The candidate for the Presidency is an officer of the regular Army, of the highest character, who much distinguished himself in the late war, and particularly by bearing the brunt of the day at Gettysburg, where he repulsed Longstreet's assault in the Cemetery. He first attracted the attention of the Democrats as a possible "standard-bearer" by a general order issued on assuming command of the military district composed of Texas and Louisiana in 1867. In this he announced that the rebellion was over, and that "the military power should cease to lead, and the civil administration resume its natural and rightful dominion"; that "trial by jury, habeas corpus, the liberty of the press and of speech, the natural rights of person and rights of property should be preserved," and that crimes should be tried by the regular civil tribunals. As this order was issued in the midst of the quarrel between President Johnson and Congress, when the latter was disposed to treat the South as conquered territory, it naturally seemed as ill-timed to the Republicans as it seemed judicious and seasonable to the Democrats. He supplemented it by a letter to Mr. Pease, the carpet-bag Governor of Texas, who had complained to him that the Texans were in a bad state of mind, and did not like the reconstruction laws or love the United States Government, and were lax and remiss in punishing crime through the courts, and that all these evils were aggravated by the general order, and who suggested the cure of these evils by military rule. General Hancock's reply was a very neat and forcible exposition of the mode prescribed both by American principles of government and by the experience of mankind for dealing with discontent.

The nomination seems to be generally received by the Republican press as a strong one for the Democrats to make, and one which it is not easy for the Grant men to assail without being guilty of great inconsistency, or without taking up the position that the Democrats have no right to be good. It is, for instance, somewhat amusing to find the New York Times objecting to Hancock on the ground that he "is utterly without civil training or experience. So far as questions of policy and administration are concerned his mind is a blank. Placed in a position of high responsibility and civil power, he would be absolutely dependent on those surrounding him. Whatever his desire or purpose might be, he would be incapable of commanding the situation, with whose elements and conditions he was unfamiliar."

This is true; but, esteemed contemporary, how have you the face to utter it? One Democratic paper has commended Hancock already for the familiar reason that, "if elected, he will see that he gets the place." Only one bucket of "mud" seems to have been prepared for him thus far, and that consists of the charge that he took an inhuman delight in hanging Mrs. Surratt, and treated her daughter in a brutal manner when she came to ask for a delay. This, we believe, was not thought of before the nomination, but since that it seems as if it must be true.

The concluding proceedings at Cincinnati were marked by a boisterousness rivalling the tumult at Chicago, but quite in character, and not interfering with the substantial harmony ensured by the general desire for an available candidate. The New York delegation seems to have counted for little or nothing in the deliberations, and its spasmodic and unavailing support first of Payne and then of Randall served only to illustrate the inability of Tilden to nominate his "devisee"; its sole accomplishment was the almost unanimous exclusion of the Tammany so-called delegates, which, however, was of course from the first and in the nature of Democratic things inevitable, though there was a long wrangle over it. After the permanent organization, with ex-Governor Stevenson, of Kentucky, for chairman, six candidates were put in nomination by various orators, among whom Mr. Dougherty, of Philadelphia, in nominating Hancock specially distinguished himself in a speech which almost casts into the shade the now historic rhetorical effort of Senator Conkling at Chicago. Twenty-one names, nevertheless, were voted for on the first ballot, of which the leading ones received the following vote: Hancock 171, Bayard 153½, Payne 81, Thurman 68½, Field 65, Morison 62, and Hendricks 50½. The Convention then adjourned, and on reassembling the next morning nominated Hancock by a vote which would have been unanimous but for the fidelity with which Indiana stuck to Hendricks, and three scattering votes. The Kelly men thereupon appeared, and there was a reconciliation scene of a somewhat galvanic but evidently affecting aspect. The unopposed adoption of the platform and the unanimous nomination of Mr. William H. English, of Indiana, for Vice-President concluded the labors of the Convention.

The platform is a singular document, and suggests the conclusion that all the conventions have now begun to treat the platform as a joke. It appears to have been the composition of Mr. Watterson, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, and reads like a highly inflammatory "editorial" from that paper. It pledges the party to its constitutional doctrines and traditions; promises opposition to "centralizationism," "the dangerous spirit of encroachment," and the consolidation of the power of all departments in one; declares there must be "no sumptuary laws," and insists on "the separation of Church and state," a somewhat startling proposal. It calls for "home rule," without defining it; and "honest money," but evades the silver question; and demands a tariff for revenue only. It insists on the subordination of the military to the civil power; on "a general and thorough reform of the civil service," without saying in what such a reform would consist; and on a "free ballot." It castigates the Republicans in the usual style for the exercise of "corrupt and despotic power" at elections, for fraud in 1876–7, and "execrates" the Administration for "making places in the civil service a reward for political crime"; demands legislation prohibiting in future the "billeting of villains on the people"; glorifies Samuel J. Tilden, and bids him good-by; denounces Chinese immigration except for "travel, education, and foreign commerce," and suggests the use of public money for public purposes only; pronounces the Democratic party the protector of the laboring man from "the cormorants and the Commune," an alliteration which must have greatly tickled the author, but the meaning of which is painfully uncertain; and, finally, congratulates the country on "the honesty and thrift" of the Democratic Congress. The reading of it, except the plank about the "billeting of villains on the people," is said to have received but little attention.

The truth is that in this, as in the last Presidential campaign, the platforms of both parties have no hold upon the memory or consciences of the constituencies. They will not determine the character of the stump-speaking nor influence the conduct of the new Administration. There is not a single article in them for whose embodiment in legislation hereafter anybody is responsible, or whose relative importance in the party policy is clearly indicated. The candidate is no longer expected to pledge his adherence to each plank in its order, but is virtually left to frame his own platform in his letter of acceptance. To this he can be, and ought to be, held strictly accountable. We have not much to learn from General Garfield's letter, but General Hancock's may easily throw light on his mental attitude towards the more important questions which should occupy the public during the next four years.

The Democratic nomination for Vice-President was a surprise in a different way from the Republican. Mr. English has had no part in national politics since the war, and his notoriety belongs entirely to a former generation, to whom, indeed, his name was for a brief period familiar enough. He was the author of a compromise measure called the English Bill, which, in the exciting spring of 1858, broke the dead-lock between the Senate and House of Representatives on the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, by permitting the people of that Territory to vote upon the constitution, and offering them a land-bribe to accept it, but refusing them admission if they rejected it. The bill was passed amid a storm of opposition, including that of Senator Douglas himself. As everybody knows, Kansas preferred remaining a Territory to adopting a pro-slavery constitution not of its own making, and the only effect of the English Bill was to hasten the disruption of the Democratic party and pave the way for the civil war—and for General Hancock. Mr. English was a member of the Thirty-third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Congresses, and is well qualified to preside over a legislative body. He was a "war Democrat," has been a very successful banker, is reputed the wealthiest man in Indiana, and has been a prominent opponent of inflation and of loose and dishonest doctrine about the currency.

Of the literature of the Convention a despatch from Forney to his "dear old friend" Dougherty is probably the most spirited, as in other than rhetorical regards it is the most singular. From it Forney's position appears to be unique. He announced that "the living hero of Gettysburg, the Murat of Pennsylvania," would deliver Pennsylvania "from the terrible curse that has polluted its fair fame, destroyed the hope of its young men, and enriched its insolent politicians." His disgust at the selfish greed of the Cameronian clan may be entirely explicable and excusable, but why did he proceed to allude to "Grant's sacrifice at Chicago" as "the unspeakable ingratitude of the age"? Surely the "insolent politicians" of Pennsylvania are so much at one with Forney in this opinion that Grant's election would have done little to rescue the fair fame of their State from persistent pollution; unless, indeed, Grant should have himself proved unspeakably ungrateful. Forney's adding that "hundreds of thousands of Democrats" feel as he does about the Chicago result still further complicates the matter. All that is certain is that it is hot weather and that Forney is for Hancock.

The Springfield Union, in reply to our suggestion that the secret of the process by which General Grant was to prevent the Democrats from counting him out should be communicated to General Garfield, declares "there is not the slightest objection in the world to communicating it," but that it would be of no use to anybody but General Grant, because it lies in his great popularity, which "would have secured him such an overwhelming majority against any candidate the Democrats could put up, that it would have been a hopeless task to count him out without nullifying the election entirely." This shows that the Union is guilty of a mild attempt at imposture in offering to communicate the secret, and confirms our belief that the Philadelphia Bulletin is the only paper which really knows it. Mr. Conkling, at the Utica Convention in this State, urged General Grant's candidacy on the ground that even with him the election would be close, and if it turned on the vote of one State might be thrown into the House, where it would be in the hands of the Democratic majority. It was to frighten the Democrats from playing tricks with the certificate of a single State, therefore, that General Grant was to be nominated as the man possessing the secret. This being the case, it will probably be as needful to General Garfield, in the contingency described by Mr. Conkling, as it would have been to General Grant. But as the Union evidently knows nothing about the matter, let it "hush," as Emerson says.

If it be true, as is alleged, that the Republican Congressional Committee has begun to levy contributions on the Government employees in Washington, and in particular on the women in the Treasury Department, under threats, there ought to be a prompt stop put to it. General Garfield himself can readily repress this form of electioneering activity if he pleases, and he will find it to his advantage to do so. Nothing is more certain than that the days when the Presidential candidate sat apart as a sort of Grand Lama during the canvass, without any responsibility for the doings of his wicked followers, are gone by, and we are glad of it. If the wicked followers care nothing about the party platform, he must remind them of it, and remind them, if necessary, that he must be elected, if at all, in defensible ways. It will not do any more for either party to get hold of the Presidency any how, and then cry out to let bygones be bygones. There has been, as the Republican platform in 1876 said, considerable quickening of the public conscience concerning political affairs, and neither party is so sure of its ground this time as to be able to disregard it.

The National Republican League, heretofore contemned by the Machinists as scratchers and bolters, prove their title to be considered stanch Republicans by an address to the "conscience vote," dated Philadelphia, June 26. "Simple acquiescence in the Chicago ticket," they say, "is not enough In the coming canvass there is no place for lukewarmness or indifference." They go on to enumerate the evils of Democratic success, infer from the example of Maine a readiness on the part of the Democrats to count out the lawfully elected Republican candidate, and apprehend the failure of any reform movement hereafter if General Garfield is defeated. They insist also upon the necessity of a Republican House of Representatives. Though they anticipate, under a Democratic régime, "events which will strain our institutions to the utmost, and lead to dangers which no lover of his country can contemplate without the gravest alarm," they do not specify the most serious danger—namely, the blow which the civil service would receive from a general redistribution of the minor Federal offices. The address, of course, censures the Democratic nomination of a man "whose only training has been that of the Army, and whose reputation, solely military, is the precise measure of his unfitness for the highest civil position in the gift of the people."

Every week, and almost every day, has now its tale of disaster to those who travel on our inland waters. The collision of the Stonington and Narragansett was followed at a short interval by the running down and sinking of the Adelaide by the Grand Republic, in the North River, happily without any fatality; and to the burning of the Seawanhaka in the East River succeeds the next day a collision of the Long Branch with an oil-barge, endangering the lives of hundreds of Sunday-school children. The fate of the Seawanhaka alone is mysterious, the other two "accidents" being known to have been avoidable. What is remarkable in its case is the large number of those who perished from fire or drowning when all the circumstances conspired to make rescue almost certain. The explosion, which as yet remains unexplained, occurred in broad daylight; the captain heroically kept the wheel until he had grounded the boat on a sunken meadow, ensuring the safety of those forward; life-preservers were not wanting; numerous steamboats and other craft at once hastened to the spot; physicians from the hospitals on the adjacent islands received the unfortunates as they were brought to land, and did their best to resuscitate them; and still the list of men, women, and children destroyed is a sadly long one. The small boats of the Seawanhaka were, as usual, of no sort of benefit to the terror-stricken passengers; the life-preservers, of but little.

The continued large increase in the value of exports and domestic products, without a proportionate increase in the imports of foreign goods, is the main reason for the weakness of foreign exchange and the three reductions in rates which were made during the week by the leading drawers of sterling bills. Whereas a few weeks ago it looked as if gold would be exported, there is now a fair chance that gold may be again imported in the latter part of the summer. This changed condition has had the effect of reducing the rates for long-time loans in this market, and of inducing large purchases of the better class of Stock Exchange securities; this in turn started a sharp speculative rise in inferior shares, which advanced ½ to 10½ per cent. As the week closed there was a downward reaction to this speculation on the reports that the Treasury will stop buying bonds for the sinking fund, and that Gov. Cornell has decided to sign the bill taxing the loans of foreign bank agencies.

The long-range rifle-match between Irish and American riflemen which came off at Dollymount on Tuesday, and in which the Americans beat their opponents by twelve points in a score of nearly thirteen hundred, was in the nature of a friendly and not a championship contest. Even for this era of sharpshooting the scores were remarkable, the target being missed but once out of 540 shots, and, as heretofore, the Americans won by their superiority at the longer ranges—though even at the 800-yard range they tied their opponents. Their continued success is of course very gratifying to their countrymen, and we should say might fairly be referred in good part to the superiority of their breech-loaders. It is hardly likely that each successive American team should be composed of better marksmen than any of their foreign rivals; and though they are said to be unapproached in their ability to "pull together," we imagine that the difference between the scores for the different ranges attests strongly the greater accuracy of their rifles. One of the Irishmen, and but one, stuck to his muzzle-loader, by the way.

The extraordinary absurdity of the performance of the majority in the House of Commons in the Bradlaugh affair, and the judiciousness of Mr. Gladstone's course in abstaining from any direct attempt to stem the tide, have been made manifest sooner than was expected. The Tories joined the Irish Home-Rulers in the refusal to permit Bradlaugh to take his seat, solely for the purpose of making trouble for the Government, though one of their hysterical newspapers says it was for the purpose of "protecting God from insult." They were thus driven by the logic of events into sending him to jail for trying to assert his undoubted constitutional right, and, having got him in jail and made a martyr of him, and associated him in the minds of all the extreme Radicals with the cause of freedom of opinion and representation, they perceived their folly and had to let him out. They could not have been convinced of this by any speech from the Ministerial side of the House, and, indeed, tried to drown Sir William Harcourt's words of soberness and truth by catcalls and groans. They were convinced of it by actual experiment, and now the Ministry will have no difficulty in providing by legislation a form of affirmation which Bradlaugh can make in lieu of the oath. In the meantime, however, Bradlaugh has been saved by Tory folly and rancor from dropping into the obscurity which so rapidly overtook Dr. Kenealy when he entered the House.

The Tichborne Claimant has had a writ of error in his case argued before the Lords-Justices of Appeal, in England, in which he made the claim, and supported it largely by the decision of our Court of Appeals in Tweed's case, that his two sentences of seven years each for two perjuries ought to have been concurrent, and that therefore he was entitled to deliverance in seven years, or in February, 1881, instead of starting on a fresh sentence of seven years. The court apparently thought it fair to infer from the argument of Mr. Benjamin, his counsel, that he meant to maintain that when a man committed one perjury he could afterwards commit as many more as he pleased, because his punishment for all would have to commence on the same day and be identical throughout. Seven years more of confinement will, of course, greatly reduce the number of the Claimant's admirers, but his imposture will probably long remain the most remarkable on record, both for the measure of success it met with and the curious composition of the sympathy it called forth; for he won popular favor in England as a butcher-boy who was kept out of his rights as a baronet, and yet if he really was a butcher-boy he had no rights as a baronet, and was consequently entitled to no sympathy.

The Conference at Berlin has, without waiting for the Technical Commission to visit the ground, decided on a frontier line between Turkey and Greece. It differs from the line originally recommended by the Treaty of Berlin in this: that one, like the present one, started at the mouth of the Salambria River, but it then turned slightly to the southward, and, leaving Turnavo to the Turks, went across straight to the Straits of Corfu, at the mouth of the Kalamas. The one now traced does not turn southward, but goes straight across the country from the north side of the valley of the Salambria, and takes in both Metsovo and Janina, an important gain for the Greeks. This decision of the Conference is said to be peremptory, and will be signified, or has been signified, as such to the Turks, who will, however, be compensated in some way for their increased loss of territory—most probably, it is said, by some European help in setting their finances in order. The Porte has anticipated the formal communication of the decision by a note reminding the Conference that its powers are mediatory only, which means that the Turks would like it to recommend something which they could reflect upon for two or three years more. They have, however, announced their intention of recovering for Montenegro the territory seized by the Albanians as soon as the agitation among the latter subsides.

The attacks of O'Donnell on M. Challemel-Lacour have had the effect of spreading this gentleman's fame in a way which must be as gratifying to him as it is unexpected. He appears from the details of his biography now given to the world to be above all things a literary man. He was a professor of philosophy at 22; was imprisoned by the Bonapartist conspirators in 1851, and expelled by them from France in the following year; was a popular lecturer in Belgium and a college professor in Switzerland during his exile; returned to France under the amnesty in 1852 and became a contributor to the Temps, the Revue Nationale, the Revue des Cours Publics, then editor of the Revue Moderne, and finally manager of the Revue des Deux Mondes. During all this time he occupied a foremost place as a critic and thinker, without ever losing his interest in politics or ceasing to be an object of suspicion and persecution to the Bonapartist police. After the revolution of 1870 he was made a prefect of the Rhone, but was momentarily overcome and imprisoned by the Lyons Communists, and it was during this period that the plunder of the convent which O'Donnell laid to his charge occurred. The alleged "massacre" of Mobiles, it seems, never occurred, nor did the German Government ever refuse to receive him. He is probably the most accomplished French ambassador whom this generation has seen in London, and has one of those sound and apprehensive minds to which new and unfamiliar work comes easy—such, for instance, as the negotiation of the new Commercial Treaty—for he has made no mark in political economy.

The triumph of the Clericals in the municipal elections in Rome is due to the release of the faithful from the restrictions as to political action imposed by the late Pope, and known under the formula Ne eletti, ne elettori. According to the Voce della Verità, it has now been determined that the pious may vote, as a means of giving weight and force to the opinions of the Vatican on Italian affairs. Their participation in the municipal elections at Rome was in the nature of an experiment, and its complete success is said to have determined the Pope on calling his forces into the field at the elections all over Italy. Judging from what has happened, the influence of this change of policy on Italian politics may be very considerable. Among the candidates badly beaten in Rome was Garibaldi.

The Grand Council of Geneva has passed a law, or rather constitutional amendment, which has still to be submitted to the people, abolishing the connection between Church and state in the canton. It provides that no minister of religion is hereafter to receive any salary from the state, and no tax can be imposed for the maintenance of any form of worship. Such churches as are the property of the communes are to pass into the category of other communal property, but are to be inalienable for thirty years from the passage of the law; but no Protestant church is to be used for Catholic worship, and no Catholic church for Protestant worship. The endowments now belonging to the Protestant Church at Geneva are to be administered like those of charitable institutions. The bill was carried on the third reading by a majority of 55 to 46. The majority represent the rich Catholics and Protestants and free-thinkers, and the minority the poorer Catholics and Protestants who think they cannot maintain any form of religious worship without state aid. There is a strong feeling out-of-doors, however, that the Catholic Church will be the only gainer by the change, and that the Protestant interest will be ruined by it, owing to its divisions and want of organization.

THE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATION.

THE nomination of General Hancock by the Democrats would have been most seasonable and appropriate in 1872 or in 1876. In both those years there lingered among the party in power a strong tendency to apply military methods to the government of a considerable portion of the Union, and to tolerate, if not countenance, the elevation of the military above the civil authority, for a variety of objects, vaguely described under the general term of "saving the results of the war." This tendency was represented, too, by the presence in the Presidential chair of a man who was a soldier and nothing but a soldier, and who had given repeated proofs that he looked on the Presidency as an essentially military office. The Democrats were greatly hampered in their efforts to resist this tendency by their supposed sympathy with the enemies of the Union, by the presence of the great body of the "ex-rebels" in their ranks, and by the suspicion that they really desired to weaken the general Government. No way of meeting this would have been so effective as the nomination of a soldier like General Hancock, whose services to the Union on the battle-field were incontestable, who had at the same time given unmistakable proof of his dislike of military interference with the regular working of the Constitution and the laws, and who might nevertheless be relied on for full as much vigor in the execution of the laws as General Grant. Instead of this, however, they nominated in 1872 a candidate from whom nobody looked for vigorous administration, in whose discretion nobody believed, and who had made all his fame by the doctrine that almost anything was justifiable which kept Democrats out of power. In 1876 they nominated a candidate who had all along opposed the war, and was suspected of having encouraged the rebellion. Now, when the controversies created by the alleged unlawful use of military authority have passed away, and when there seems to be a general acquiescence in the supremacy of civil authority everywhere, they come forward with a soldier whose opinions on civil affairs are, for the most part, unknown, and whose one excursion into the field of civil jurisprudence was made fifteen years ago in the South, by a refusal to allow the troops to take entire charge of a State Government. General Hancock's utterances in Louisiana in 1867, creditable as they were to him, bore on a state of things which has wholly passed away, and were made in a controversy which has absolutely ceased, and indicate nothing whatever as to his attitude towards the problems by which the country is now beset.

His nomination comes, too, just as the Republican party has finally discarded military ideas and military methods, and has nominated a man whose fame is almost wholly based on his career as an economist and legislator. And yet the Republican party has not hitherto stood for administrative reform and legislative enterprise. It has been essentially a war party. It has to no small extent thrown discredit on peaceful agencies in the work of renovation and pacification. It is the party which one would naturally expect to cling to soldier government and "strong man" government. It is, therefore, more than surprising to find that no sooner has it returned to the paths of peace, and produced a candidate whose triumphs have been almost all legislative, than the Democrats, the great friends of government by discussion and persuasion, and of policemen as against soldiers, the great enemies of attempts to work on opinion through the revival of war-memories and passions, should throw all their civilians aside, their lawyers, their statesmen, their financiers, and appear on the scene with a major-general in full uniform, and begin to tell us of the battles he fought, the guns and prisoners he took, and of the mildness and good sense with which he exercised the powers of a military dictator over large bodies of the American people half a generation ago. Of course the object of this is well known. It is meant to meet the suspicion of Democratic sympathy with the rebellious South; but it must be admitted that a great political party is in a bad way when it has no better mode than this of commending itself, in time of profound peace, to a public much sobered by unhappy experience of administrative and financial disorder, and reasonably anxious for a careful adaptation of the governmental machine to the needs of a rapidly increasing population and to a growing complexity of interests and responsibilities, both material and moral.

There is not a word to be said against General Hancock personally. He is a gallant soldier and honest gentleman.

"A better and a braver man Never rode in battle's van."

Soldier for soldier he is vastly preferable to General Grant. He has not won as many fights, but he has won enough. We are sure he would keep better company and take a much higher view of his own official responsibilities. But he has just as little political experience as General Grant had, and is considerably older than General Grant was when the latter was elected to the Presidency. He would probably make a more discreet use of "troops" at the South, but there are no troops to use at the South any longer. He would be beset at Washington by problems more serious than those which beset General Grant, and there is no reason to be found in his experience or pursuits or studies for supposing he would be any more competent to deal with them. There is every justification for believing that he would pass very rapidly, as General Grant did, into the hands of a "Group" or "Syndicate," who would undertake to deliver him from the "theorists" and "idealists," and show him how earthly governments have in the present condition of human nature to be carried on. It would not be the old "Group" which carried General Grant through his difficulties, but does any reflecting man who knows anything of the ruling influences in the Democratic party suppose it would be any better? Can any one think without alarm of the results of a "clean sweep" in the administration effected under its auspices? Would it be any consolation to us to know after General Hancock had surrendered himself to its guidance that he had held the Cemetery at Gettysburg? Does any rational man want to go back to the régime under which the country was forced to rejoice because the soldier-President when he sat down to approve the inflation bill, which would probably have ruined the national credit and disordered all private business, by a happy stroke of luck changed his mind while he was writing the message, got more paper, and composed a glorious veto? Is this the kind of government of which a great commercial people, fifty millions strong, wants a continuance? It would not be good enough for Turks; is it good enough for Americans?

The Grant movement, happily defeated at Chicago, showed what a powerful lodgment Bonapartism had made in our politics, for the passion for putting successful soldiers in high civil positions is the essence of Bonapartism. It is based on the assumption either that high office ought to be used as a reward for military service without regard to the candidate's fitness, or that the Government may have to rest on military force instead of on discussion. It has gone far enough among us. It is now high time to have an end of it. The Republican party has discarded it; the adoption of it by the Democrats does not put any better face on it. It is needless to say to most of our readers that the few precedents we have had say nothing for it. The Union over which Washington and Jackson and Harrison were called to rule was a very different community from that which is to elect the next President. It has changed from a simple and small agricultural population strung along the Eastern coast, and managing almost all its affairs through local self-government, into an immense nation covering a continent and competing with the world in all the industrial arts, with a vast civil service, vast accumulated wealth, powerful corporations, a thousand conflicting interests, and with a momentum in its progress which makes the slightest error in direction capable of tremendous mischief. Taking the very narrowest view of the functions of the executive, the President of such a republic needs to be not simply an able or honest man, but one of the master politicians of the time. There is not much likelihood of such politicians finding election to the Presidency easy in our day, but we do sincerely believe a strong move in that direction has been made in the nomination of General Garfield, that he belongs to an order of men whom the people have to be persuaded to favor and elevate, and that the selection of another soldier now would be a distinct step backwards towards a somewhat barbaric theory of government. Is it not time "the war-drum throbbed no longer and the battle-flags were furled," even though the "Parliament of Man" be still some ages distant?

We wish it were possible to say all this—and we fear it is not—without seeming to disparage General Hancock and the class of gallant men to which he belongs. None of those, we venture to say, who like to "run" them for the Presidency has half the respect for them that we have. We wish they were ten times more numerous in this community than they are. But the example which they exhibit of simple and loyal devotion to duty, of toil and sacrifice for other things than gain, precious and fruitful as we believe it to be, retains its force only so long as they follow the calling to which they were bred and which they understand. They could not be as good soldiers as they are if they were fit candidates for the Presidency. Not one of them ever enters the political arena without losing much if not most of what makes him really valuable to his country.

GENERAL GARFIELD AND THE DE GOLYER & McCLELLAN CONTRACT.

THE accusation regarding the De Golyer contract against General Garfield is made in various ways. It includes the charge that, when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and knowing that appropriations for such improvements as this De Golyer contract covered would be pressed upon the Committee, he accepted a fee of five thousand dollars, ostensibly for legal services for the purpose of procuring the contract from the Board of Public Works, but really for his influence as chairman of the Committee; that he thus made himself the advocate of a contract which was bad in itself, and thus also took a bribe to affect his action in his Committee in favor of this and like contracts; or, if it was not on his part the taking of a bribe, that he must have known that the motive with which the money was paid him was to secure his influence as such chairman in favor of the appropriations to pay for this and like contracts. Such is the substance of this accusation in its various forms and phases.

In order that the public may properly judge of it, it is necessary to know the following facts, which can easily be verified by reference to the public laws, the records of the District of Columbia, and the testimony that has been taken by two investigating committees of Congress.

February 21, 1871, Congress passed an act creating a government for the District of Columbia, just such a government in general as is organized in the territories by Congressional action. This act provided for a Governor, in whom was vested "executive power and authority"; a Legislative Assembly, in which was vested "legislative power and authority"; a Board of Public Works, to which was given control of the streets, avenues, and sewers, and all other works that the Legislative Assembly might entrust to it. It also provided that the Board of Public Works should have "no power to make contracts to bind said District to the payment of any sums of money except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriations shall have been made." This has reference wholly to appropriations made by the Legislative Assembly. The government having been thus created, and with this restriction on the Board of Public Works, on the 20th day of June, 1871, the Board submitted to the Legislative Assembly a plan for the improvement of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the roads outside these cities, embracing nearly all the streets and avenues and roads, and in the submission of this plan estimated the entire cost to be $4,358,598, recommended the adoption of this plan, and submitted to the Legislative Assembly a bill to provide "the necessary means for the execution of the work."

On the 10th day of July, 1871, the Legislative Assembly passed this act, appropriating $4,000,000 to do the work referred to in the plan, or, to use the language of the act, "to be used and expended, . . . as fully as may be practicable and consistent with the public interest, in conformity with the plan of improvement submitted to the said Legislature by the Board of Public Works of said District in its communication bearing date June 20, 1871"; and in order to procure the money thus appropriated it was provided in this act that bonds of the District to the amount of $4,000,000 should be issued, and also provided for levying a tax on the property in the District to pay the interest on these bonds, and to provide for the gradual reduction of the principal. It was further provided that the Board should "in no case enter into a contract for any work or improvement the cost of which shall exceed the amount estimated therefor in its aforesaid plan, less twenty per cent. of said estimates." May 8, 1872, Congress approved the act of the Legislative Assembly above alluded to, and in connection with it enacted that the debt of the District, including the debts of the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, "shall at no time exceed the sum of $10,000,000, unless an increase over the said amount shall have been previously authorized by act of Congress." At the time the new government came into existence the debt of the District, including the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, was in the aggregate $5,520,626 02, so that the $4,000,000 loan brought the amount of indebtedness up to within $479,373 98 of the limit that was fixed by the act of Congress above alluded to.

From the foregoing the following facts will be observed:

1st. That Congress had turned over the control of the streets, avenues, and roads to the government of the District of Columbia.

2d. That that government adopted a plan of improvements.

3d. That that government provided the money with which to pay for those improvements.

4th. That the Board of Public Works was prohibited by Congress from making contracts before appropriations were made, and prohibited from contracting in excess of appropriations.

5th. That the Legislative Assembly restricted the Board in making contracts to 80 per cent. of the $4,000,000 loan.

6th. That Congress had fixed a limit to the entire indebtedness, which limit the $4,000,000 almost reached.

7th. That the money to pay for this work was not to come through appropriations by Congress, but was to be derived by taxation of the property in the District imposed by the Legislative Assembly.

In September, 1871, the Board of Public Works, instead of adopting the policy of letting contracts to do the contemplated work to the lowest bidder, fixed a scale of prices that would be paid for various kinds of work, that is to say: a specific price for grading per cubic yard, a specific price per square yard for concrete pavement, for wood pavement, for stone pavement, and so on; so that when they determined to lay a particular kind of pavement on a certain street or avenue, whether of wood, stone, or concrete, the price was already fixed, and the open question was which kind of wood or stone or concrete should be laid; and hence there was a struggle before the Board by the owners of the various patents for pavements to have their respective patents adopted for use, and this brought in question the merits of the respective patents. It made no difference whatever as to the cost, whether one patent was used or another of the class of wooden or concrete pavements; the price was precisely the same.

De Golyer & McClellan had a patented wooden pavement. Others had patents for wooden pavements, and between these there were contests as to merit. There was also the question of merit as between wooden and concrete pavements. De Golyer & McClellan employed Mr. Parsons as their attorney to procure the adoption of their pavement, by showing to the Board its superiority over others. This was the only question to be considered—the question of price having been settled months before, by the adoption of a schedule of prices. The hearing before the Board as to the merits of these various patents was about to be had, and Mr. Parsons was called away from Washington. He asked General Garfield to take his place as attorney to argue the merits of the De Golyer patent. As above shown there was nothing else to argue. General Garfield appears never to have seen De Golyer or McClellan or anybody else in relation to this employment, excepting Mr. Parsons, and at the latter's solicitation he examined the various patents and made his presentation of the case to the Board, was paid a fee for it, and there his relations to the subject entirely ended. He had nothing whatever to do with making or shaping the contract under which the pavement was laid. Now, the money having already been provided to pay for all the improvements that the Board was authorized to make, it seems impossible that it could have been contemplated by General Garfield or any one else that appropriations would be asked from Congress with which to pay for any portion of them.

In order to make good the accusation against General Garfield the following must be assumed: 1st. That the Board contemplated at that early period of its career violating the law prohibiting the making of contracts in excess of and prior to appropriations. 2d. That it then contemplated violating the law restricting it to 80 per cent. of the $4,000,000 loan. 3d. That it then contemplated the violation of the law limiting the indebtedness of the district to ten millions of dollars. 4th. That General Garfield had knowledge that the Board so contemplated.

In the absence of these assumptions the case is in brief this: The money had, long before General Garfield's employment, been provided by the District government to pay for the improvements; the prices to be paid had been established; no appropriation by Congress could have been in contemplation; the question and the only question was whether this or that kind of pavement should be used, and General Garfield as an attorney argued in favor of the De Golyer patent.

The impression has entered the public mind that the De Golyer patent is worthless, but this is wholly erroneous. No one familiar with the subject has questioned that it was at least as good as any other process of laying wooden pavements, and no question of that kind has ever been made before the Committee or elsewhere. The impression, too, possibly prevails that there was something fraudulent in the contract as to prices, etc. But this is wholly without foundation. The Board having adopted a schedule of prices long before, when the decision was made to lay this pavement to any extent it was at the price already fixed. If any other pavement of wood had been adopted in preference to this the price would have been the same; so that the use of this pavement involved no more expenditure than if any other had been adopted.

It may be asked, Why, then, all the criticism that has appeared in regard to this De Golyer & McClellan contract? The answer is this: it is maintained by those who were assailing the Board of Public Works that the prices paid for work were unreasonable and excessive, and to show this the proof was presented to the Committee that for a quantity of work which would amount to about $700,000 the parties were willing to pay and agreed to pay $97,000 in commissions and attorneys' fees; consequently, it was argued, the Board in fixing the schedule of prices had fixed them too high, and thereby had violated their duty. But these prices would have been paid if any other wooden pavement had been used, and were paid to every other contractor where wooden pavement was used; and every other contract for wooden pavement was and is amenable to precisely the same criticism. The De Golyer contract is no more fraudulent than every other that was made to lay wooden pavements. To establish the same fact—viz., that the Board had fixed its schedule of prices too high, and thereby had unnecessarily burdened the taxpayers—proof was adduced that it was quite common to let a contract to lay a pavement, and the contractor would at once sublet at a rate twenty-five cents less per square yard, giving a profit or bonus of twenty-five cents per square yard for doing nothing. The De Golyer & McClellan contract differed in no respect from all others, and it only became conspicuous because it showed the amount that the Board was paying by its schedule of prices in excess of what should have been paid.

The sum and substance of the whole matter, as regards General Garfield, then is, that at the request of a friend of his, the attorney for the De Golyer & McClellan Paving Company, he examined the evidence in favor of some forty kinds of pavement, prepared the required brief, which was intended for the Board of Public Works, made known to Mr. Shepherd, then President of the Board, his favorable opinions, and expressed the hope that he would give these Western men a chance. No price was agreed upon for the service, but Mr. Parsons paid him $5,000, saying that he had received a large fee and would share it with him. The disproportion of the fee to the work performed may be attributed to the large interests involved and to the friendly intervention of Mr. Parsons. But the case, nevertheless, exemplifies one of the gross abuses prevalent in public life which the friends of good government can have no difficulty in condemning. We refer to the practice of seeking and giving weight to the opinions of public men on subjects of which they know no more than any one else, and in legal cases paying fees in proportion to their influence. We should have liked it much better if General Garfield had told his friend that there were scores of people much better qualified to form a reliable opinion of pavements; that his official position would give a factitious importance to his opinion which he did not wish it to have, and that the services of the best experts should be sought for rather than his own. We do not think, therefore, that the motives of Mr. Parsons and his clients in employing Mr. Garfield are above suspicion. It is not improbable that they sought in so doing something more than his services as counsel, but we can discover no trace of anything worse on his part than indiscretion. With this we think he may be fairly charged, and although the character of the Board of Public Works was not as well known then as it was afterwards, there must have been enough known about it to suggest to a prudent public man the impropriety of taking a hand in influencing it in any matter, and especially in a matter in which he had no claim to be considered an expert. General Garfield has been severely assailed, too, because he made no formal argument before the Board as a whole, and the inference has been drawn from this that he knew he did not render full service for his fee. But an oral argument would hardly have added anything to the value of his brief, and having made the brief, we think he was fully justified by forensic custom in thinking that he had done enough. Let us say finally that in judging him on the charge of indiscretion it is not fair to judge his conduct in 1871 with the light of 1880. There is not one of us whose views about discretion touching the relations between politics and money have not been greatly clarified by the events of the past nine years.

THE INNER LIFE OF GUIZOT.—III.

PARIS, June 11.

WHEN M. Guizot fell from power in 1848 he was obliged to find a retreat in England. Whatever may have been said of the corruption of the régime of 1830, Guizot, who had been for several years the first personage after the King, found himself as poor in 1848 as on the day when he undertook the difficult task of running the constitutional machine—between the Republicans, the Legitimists, the Bonapartists, in a country where there were not two governing parties ready to take each other's place—without any violent commotion. He arrived in England without any means. One of his daughters, who was with him, wrote at the time to one of her English friends, who asked her if she went often to the Park: "No, because the omnibus, which is our carriage, does not go through the Park." It was well for M. Guizot and for his children to have been brought up in those severe principles which place man above the accidents of fortune. On the 24th of February M. Guizot had resigned, and he had himself conducted his successor, M. Odilon Barrot, to the Ministry of the Interior. The movement which had begun with the cry of reform had rapidly become a revolution, and M. Guizot, who was hunted by the insurgents, had been obliged to conceal himself in the lodge of a portress of a house in the Rue Vanneau. Madame Duchâtel, the wife of one of M. Guizot's colleagues, had found this place of refuge for him. In the evening, Madame de Mirbel took M. Guizot to her own house and concealed him till the 1st of March; on that day he left for Brussels, with a friend, and crossed the sea from Ostend to London. He met his children in London, and soon afterwards his old mother rejoined him. He found a little house in Brompton, where he established all his family.

"I am well received here," he wrote M. de Barante on the 13th of March, "as if nobody had ever been out of humor with me [this is an allusion to the Spanish marriages and the discontent which they had produced in England]; but I am profoundly grieved. What a spectacle! What a future! Notwithstanding my optimism, I have always thought that the evil was very great, and it was one of the causes of my ardor in the struggle. But I did not think it as great as it is. . . . There is to-day at Kennington, near London, a great meeting of Chartists, twelve or fifteen thousand, who meet in order to ask about half of what the Parisian Communists demand. The walls are covered with a police placard forbidding any meeting, any procession; exactly the ordonnance of Delessert, three months ago."

Many offers were made to M. Guizot, inspired by a desire to help him in his difficulties; he was determined to refuse them. He was advised by one of the leading firms of London that a French gentleman, who wished to be unknown, had opened an unlimited credit for him; he never used this credit. He undertook at once a series of literary works, and accepted the collaboration of M. Lenormant, who had been his assistant in the Faculty of Letters. To him he wrote on the 24th of March: "Here are my projects: I am going to work again at (1) my 'History of the English Revolution,' . . . (2) my 'History of France told to my Children,' (3) my 'History of Civilization in France.'" A few days afterwards Madame Guizot, the mother who had followed her son into exile, died quietly in Brompton; she had been the best of mothers to him, and had given him with her religious sentiments the unflinching courage of the old French Huguenots. This is how Sainte-Beuve describes her:

"I think I see her still; and who, among those who have had the honor of seeing her even once, will ever forget her? The venerable mother of M. Guizot, with her antique and simple dress, with her strong and profound physiognomy, tenderly austere, which made me think of the mothers of Port Royal—this mother of the time of the Cévennes, to whom her son always remained most submissive and deferential—I think I see her still in that drawing-room of the minister . . . . . where she represented faith, simplicity, the persistent virtues of persecution and of the Desert."

Madame Guizot was buried in Kensal Green, in the ground reserved for dissenters. M. Guizot found some consolation in the lessons which he gave to his son Guillaume; he read with him Homer and Thucydides, Virgil and Tacitus. His daughters were a great comfort, active, cheerful, extremely intelligent. He saw but little of the outside world; he took some pleasure in his 'History of France,' which was cast in the form of lectures to his own children; he continued, as he had written to Barante, his 'English Revolution' and his 'History of Civilization.' He spoke without anger of France; he wrote, for instance, to his son: "You are interested in what is going on in France, and you are right. You must love your country and devote yourself to it, even though it be blind and ungrateful. Your generation will have much to do in France and for France. You will not fully succeed. I hope, however, that your portion of success will be larger than ours, and that it will not be bought at so dear a price."

After the terrible socialistic and communistic revolt of June, 1848, which ended in the victory of the National Assembly and of General Cavaignac, M. Guizot wrote to Madame Lenormant: "France needed to convince herself that she was still alive; the proof is made. A society which, after having shown itself unable to defend its institutions, can still defend itself in this way is not dead and will not die. They say here that it is still of some account. People begin to say that after having thrown Europe into the abyss France may show her how to come out of it." General Cavaignac had conquered the Commune of 1848 and put an end to social anarchy; political anarchy still continued. M. Guizot was urged at various times to come forward and to try the power of his marvellous eloquence with universal suffrage; he had been opposed to the extension of the suffrage, and he refused to offer himself as a candidate in the elections, saying in a letter to his friends in Normandy that he could not change himself; that he continued to be, as he always had been, a friend of constitutional monarchy.

The trial of the ministers of Louis Philippe had been a perfect farce; an "ordonnance de non-lieu" was rendered in their case, and Guizot returned to France immediately afterwards. He went to his place in Normandy, the Val-Richer. In a little while he wrote to his friend Mrs. Austin:

"Do not fear for me discouragement or sorrow. . . . I believe that our society, like many others, is very ill and that we are in a painful crisis of its malady; but I will not believe and I do not believe that this can be the end of the glorious history of France. . . . As for myself personally, I have had so much happiness, public and private, in the course of my life, which is already long, that I feel that I have no right to complain. One of your cavaliers, the Duke of Ormond, said after the death of his son, Lord Ossory: 'I prefer my son dead to another son alive.' I can say as much of my happiness. In my public life God has done me the honor to employ me in three great things—the education of the people,* the foundation of a free government, and the maintenance of peace. Of these three difficult works the last has succeeded beyond my expectations; . . . the two others, I must confess, seem much compromised. I am convinced that they seem so more than they are. We are going through an orgy. I am confident that the ideas which I have tried to spread, the institutions which I have tried to establish, will not perish, but will be purified. I shall probably not witness their success, but I have kept watch near their cradle."

As for his inner life, Guizot had always the satisfaction of being surrounded with the purest and sincerest affections. Madame de Witt's book shows conclusively that under the stern surface of the statesman there was a great tenderness of heart, an exquisite delicacy of feeling. His two daughters had married two brothers, MM. Conrad and Cornelis de Witt, who had really become his sons. "I really envy but one man," said he, "the man who has well married his daughters." He had himself become that man. He persisted in keeping himself completely out of the turmoil of politics. This is what he wrote in 1850 to his friend Piscatory, who had been a long time French Minister in Greece: "There are two men whom I know as well as if I had spent my life with them: Cromwell and Washington. Be sure that neither the one nor the other would have believed in the least in a republic such as that we have. One would have overthrown it; the other would have let it alone." The President was then Louis Napoleon. "He can wait for 1852; he will be re-elected, for he alone can be elected. We also used to say in 1830 'the king of our choice.' Once re-elected, it may be that he will not remain what he is now, and will become something else." Napoleon did not wait till 1852, and he did become "something else." M. Guizot did not reappear in public before 1852, when he received M. de Montalembert at the French Academy. Montalembert denounced the Revolution; M. Guizot stood by it in a measure; he wrote at the time to his daughters:

"M. de Montalembert has been unjust towards 1789 and the Constituent Assembly. All he said is true, all the reproaches which he addressed to that period are well founded; but he omitted to say three things equally true: (1) Good and evil are so profoundly mixed in all human acts and human events that in the best and most salutary ones evil abounds, moral as well as material evil; (2) in 1789, in the midst of false ideas and of the corruption of manners, good intentions were dominant—an extenuating circumstance which ought always to be present to the mind in any judgment passed on that period; (3) 1789 was not so vain, the Constituent Assembly was not so powerless, so barren, as M. de Montalembert says; there is much of its work in the present state of our society, and in what it retains of justice and humanity in the midst of its miseries. If we were suddenly brought back to the France of one hundred and fifty years ago we would not tolerate all we should find in it that was iniquitous, absurd, and oppressive. The evils from which we are suffering must not make us forget the evils from which we have been delivered."

This calm serenity of the historian, introduced into the circle of family life and becoming a lesson for the children and the grandchildren, has in itself something touching. We all know the fine picture of Guizot by Delaroche, where he is represented with the proud and almost fierce attitude of the man who calms the revolutionary waves—"Quos ego." It has been my privilege to see another Guizot in his family circle, amiable, smiling, kind to everybody, anxious to please everybody. His modest apartment received the most illustrious visitors; but he was as attentive to the rising young lawyer, to the timid artist, to the young girl, to the boy who was still at school, as he was to the ambassadors and the princes. His heart was gentle, his spirit was proud; and perhaps his gentleness was also a part of his pride. The last years of Guizot were happy; he had raised his soul above the accidents of political life, he had reached before death the calm of death.

* M. Guizot was the author of our law on primary schools.

THE NATIONALITY QUESTION IN AUSTRIA.

VIENNA, May 31, 1880.

THE first session of the Austrian Reichsrath under the coalition Ministry of Count Taaffe has just come to an end. The relations between the Ministry and the House of Representatives have been of that peculiar kind which, in the splitting up of parties into small fractions, seems to be becoming the rule in constitutional government on the Continent. The Ministry has had its majority, and has with it transacted the business of the country; but its members are not the leaders of the majority; it is not the ministry of the majority; it has pretended to be something beyond and independent of parties and majorities. The majority in the House consists of all the varied elements which do not belong to the Constitutionalist party, now in the minority—that is, of the Conservatives of more or less reactionary tendencies, the Clericals, the Poles, the Czechs, the Slavs from Carinthia and Carniola—in short, of the members of the Right and the Federalists. This majority has been a very precarious one, and in the latter part of the session resorted to some sharp practice in its own interest by annulling the elections of three Constitutionalist members from Upper Austria. It will be remembered that on one question—that of granting the Ministry an allowance of secret-service money for irresponsible use, practically a campaign fund, an allowance which Austrian parliamentary practice has sanctioned for a number of years—the majority did not prove firm enough to prevent a disagreeable defeat of the Ministry. The Ministry meanwhile consists not only of Conservatives, with the addition of one Pole and one Czech by way of sop to these nationalities, but of three Constitutionalists, whose party is now in vehement opposition. It is proposed now to dismiss these latter, and so bring the Ministry more completely in agreement with the majority of the House. It may be doubted, however, whether this would make the political situation any clearer. Probably before long either the Reichsrath will be dissolved, or a new ministry with a more definite programme be formed.

Such as it is, the present Ministry set for itself at the beginning of this session the task of solving the two great questions of Austrian politics, namely, the reform of the finances in such a way as to open some prospect of getting rid of the large and increasing deficit, and the establishment of a permanent amicable modus vivendi between the different nationalities of Austria. As to the finances, absolutely nothing has been done, except that the military law passed last December has considerably increased the burdens of the budget, otherwise unchanged from that of previous years. Indeed, the incapacity of the Minister of Finance is so notorious that it is hardly possible for him to retain his office much longer. But it was the nationality question which it was especially proposed to bring to some solution. An era of peace and reconciliation was to arrive, the national feuds were to be put an end to, the demands of the Czechs, and Poles, and Slavs of the southern districts satisfied without endangering the integrity of the Empire. Certainly the era of peace and reconciliation has not yet come, for never has the discussion been more heated, the jealousy of the Germans greater, the importunate demands of the different Slav nationalities more loudly expressed, than during the past six months. The matter has advanced a stage in that the Federalists have members in the Ministry and are necessary to keep up the Government majority; and something tangible has even been done by the ministerial decree issued toward the end of April in regard to the use of the German and Czech languages by the administrative and judicial authorities of Bohemia, to which we shall recur.

It is Bohemia which now stands in the foreground in the nationality question. The present movement among the Czechs, which has in the course of the past generation been accompanied, partly as cause and partly as effect, by the resurrection (for such it may be called) of Bohemian history and literature, is on its political side decidedly the most important question in Austrian politics. The final object of the Czechs is to have the relation between Austria and Bohemia made a federal one, more or less like the relation now existing between Austria and Hungary. But for the present their efforts are directed mainly to having the Czech language placed on an equal footing with German in Bohemia. In the memorandum presented to the Emperor last December they ask for the removal of "the violations nearest to hand and most oppressive of the principle of equality of nationalities," a principle fixed and expressly enunciated by the Constitution. They ask for the establishment of more elementary and grammar schools conducted in Czech; for more artisan and industrial schools; for equality of languages in the University of Prague—so that, for instance, a candidate may get his doctor's degree, or a "docent" his appointment, for a dissertation in Czech; finally they ask for equality in the administration, for the use of Czech not only in the intercourse between the administration and the public, but also within the administration, in communications between the members. The last two are by far the most important of these demands. The University of Prague, as readers of Bohemian history will remember, has been a bone of contention between Germans and Bohemians from its foundation. Since 1848, when there was only one lecturer in Czech in the University, a great many concessions have been made to the Czechs, and as more has been conceded more has been asked. Ten years ago they asked for an independent Czech university; now they only ask for greater freedom in the old, which is already half Czech, and which they are confident of making wholly their own if the legal obstacles are removed. But the point practically most important for the moment, and permanently too, is that in regard to the civil service and the administration. It is here that the support of the Ministry by the Czechs has been rewarded by a practical result in the shape of the decree as to the use of the Czech and German languages already referred to. This decree, which has produced great excitement, especially among the Germans in Bohemia, orders that the administrative and judicial authorities in Bohemia and Moravia shall answer all verbal or written communications from the public to them in the language of such communications; and where they at first hand communicate with the public, they shall use the language of the parties they address, in case of doubt using their discretion in choosing the language such parties presumably speak. This seems innocent enough, and in part is so, in so far as the decree only legalizes the usage prevalent in the greater part of Bohemia. Its danger for the Germans becomes apparent when it is considered that in consequence the judges and civil-service employees will have to know both German and Czech; that while every half-educated Czech learns German as a matter of course, comparatively few Germans learn Czech; that thus, even in districts almost exclusively German, as in the northwestern districts near Eger, Czechs will be appointed to the Government service; finally, that when once this has happened, there is danger of the abuse of the discretionary power given by the decree for communications at first hand. Last, but not least, this is only a very small part of what the Czechs want: in the memorandum, which again only mentions their immediate grievances, they ask, for instance, that a judicial proceeding begun in Czech shall be continued in that language in case of appeal even to the court of highest instance.

It is impossible not to feel some sympathy with the Czechs in their enthusiastic efforts for their race and country. Their history, during the last three centuries, entitles them to all possible sympathy, and in the revival of letters and literature during the past generation they have shown a vigorous national life that must command great respect. They outnumber the Germans in Bohemia in the proportion of three to two, in Moravia in that of three to one. Yet, politically, the German element has the upper hand, controlling a majority both in the Bohemian Landtag and in the delegation to the Reichsrath of Austria. In the elections of delegates from the Reichsrath to the Delegations for Austria-Hungary the German majority of the Bohemian members of the Reichsrath chose only German Deputies. So great, indeed, has been the sense of injustice among the Czechs, that they have pursued a policy of secession, and only in the present session of the Reichsrath attended the meetings. Nevertheless there are some features in the movement which make one stop and think before following the fashion of the day of wishing success to struggling nationalities. The Czech movement is entirely under the control of the feudal reactionists and the clericals. The Old Czechs, comprising these last, are in a decided majority over the Young, the liberal and enlightened, and it is said are even going to deprive the latter of the minority representation they have hitherto been allowed in the Czech delegation to the Reichsrath. Apart from the nationality question, no friend of progress can sympathize with the ideas and objects of the Old Czechs; and the Young, even if they had the direction of the policy of their party, seem to be, like most Slavs, lacking in genius for practical politics, are rash, impulsive, hot-headed, and apparently not at all sure exactly what they want. As a climax, the question arises, What is it all to come to? Although only a part of the Czechs —mostly the Old Czechs—are avowedly federalists, the efforts of all tend toward greater looseness in the political connection of the different parts of the Empire. If the Czechs get what they want, the Poles of Galicia, the Slavs of Carinthia and Carniola, the Italians of Tyrol, will follow suit. No one can blame the Germans of Austria, least of all accuse them of oppression, for opposing to the utmost all efforts to make the Empire a federal league. And if Austria-Hungary is to continue a state, and not become a league, it must be a German state, with German as the state language; hence, the immediate danger of the decree on languages in the eyes of the Constitutionalists—i.e., those faithful to the present constitution. This constitution is already quite loose enough for the emergencies of the continental state nowadays, and it may well be doubted whether Austria, as a great Power, would survive its further weakening.

SOUTHERN LABOR SYSTEMS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your issue of the 10th instant includes an article upon the "Distribution of the Blacks." It is characterized by your usual moderation, and is very welcome reading after many of the strictures which so often appear upon this subject in the Northern press. On one point, however, I think you are laboring under a misapprehension, which I would crave a few lines of space to correct. Upon reading this article one would be led to believe that all the plantations in the South were run upon the share system, the laborer's supplies being advanced to him under a lien upon the growing crop at exorbitant rates of profit. It is true that this system is in use throughout a large area, though not the entirety, of the cotton-growing country. In Louisiana, however, on the sugar-growing estates, this is not the case. Here the labor is paid in cash. I am interested in a place where the hands have free quarters, with little gardens, free firewood, and eighty cents a day paid semi-monthly, as in a city factory. On these terms one hundred hands might turn out in the field six days in the week, and in grinding season double that number would be welcome at our price of one dollar per day. They buy their supplies in our store, but this is in no way compulsory, and as they are near enough to New Orleans, if our prices were unreasonable they would make their purchases in the city. With the negro working on these terms, I am inclined to take issue with you when you advocate his emigrating. I hold that in no country could he do as well as here, or average such cash wages for the year's work. As you have told us in this same article, the "negro problem" must be solved aside from politics, and the only solution can be for the blacks to stay where they are and work six days in the week, instead of three, until they are able to find a State where permanent labor will command better prices, and in sufficient quantity to guarantee their emigration.

THE VENUS OF MELOS ONCE MORE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As I write from within sight of the locality in reference to which so much has been said in and out of your columns—viz., that where the so-called Venus of Melos was found—I venture to ask a little space to report the result of a careful examination of the ground in company with Mr. Brest, the well-known son and successor of the former agent of France, writing immediately after the visit of two or three days spent in his company, and with the notes taken down before me. The place has somewhat changed since I was here last in 1867, and the slightly-put-together niche I then saw where the statue stood when found has disappeared; but there is no foundation wall nor vestige of any regular building nearer than the old citadel wall above it, and a hundred yards away. There are amongst the amazing piles of rubbish thereabouts no pieces of stone which suggest a temple, and no trace of substructions which invariably survive the clearing up of these fields, and are generally utilized as part of the dividing walls of them. The examination of the ground assured me, as did Mr. Brest in the most explicit terms, that there was never any construction resembling what the pamphlet of M.

Doussault describes. There was not even a stone substructure where the statue stood.

The site of Melos was a steep hill, only to be ascended by a zigzag road, and it is now—and probably was when the city stood there—a series of terraces, at present supported by interminable and enormous walls of the débris of the city, mostly fragments of the volcanic rock of the island, with only here and there one of marble; and the narrow strips of cultivable land are made the most of. Around the top of the hill are traces of the walls of the citadel or inner city, which was not on the high point now occupied by the successor of the ancient city, but on that below it. The road runs along the terrace immediately under the citadel wall, and on the one below this stood the statue. The field belonged to Theodore Kentrotas Botoni, who, finding it greatly encumbered with rubbish, cleared away that which lay on the upper side so as to enlarge it. As he dug away the base of the pile of stones the upper portion rolled down (croulait, to use Brest's word), and showed the statue standing upright in the pile of rubble. I remember a sort of niche of rough stones which has now been dug away, probably in the search for more statues, or the lacking parts of this; but Mr. Brest tells me that the statue was not in it but slightly in advance of it, standing on its base in the open field. There is no vestige of a vault or subterranean chamber of any kind, and I have a very distinct impression that on my former visit Brest said to me that it was evident that the place was prepared for concealment. He is now sixty-six years of age, and a very vigorous man, mentally and physically, as showed our walk and talk over the hills which once held Melos, its necropolis and acropolis, and the modern city as well—a hard walk of several hours. He remembered my short and only visit to him twelve years ago, and even my name, which probably never has fallen under his attention since; so that though he was a mere child when the statue was found, he must have a very perfect memory of what he had heard from his father and others in his youth.

I propose elsewhere and at length to enter into the discussion of the unsettled points about the statue, but desire to put these facts on record while perfectly fresh in my mind, and will add certain details as to the finding and preservation of this priceless work, now told me by Brest, and which have been differently stated. The arms, it appears from a despatch of Brest, senior, to the ambassador at Constantinople, brought to light in the more recent investigations were not with it, in any relation at least which permitted identification; many fragments and some arms were found, however, and four Hermes, possibly accessories to the statue. Brest supposes the arms, etc., to have been ex-votos. The arms of the statue were apparently originally of separate pieces of marble, and the body of two others. The finder acquainted Brest with his discovery, and the latter purchased the statue for five hundred piastres (then about as many francs) and a complete dress. He wrote to the consulate-general at Smyrna and the ambassador at Constantinople announcing the facts. In the meanwhile a priest of Melos, Economos Vergi, wishing to make friends with Murusi, dragoman of the arsenal at Constantinople, informed him of the new find, and he sent a brig to bring it away. The local authorities were divided as to the expediency of obeying Murusi or defending the rights of the French agent; but force prevailed, and the statue was seized and one-half already half embarked when the French man-of-war, the Estafette, arrived and took by force from the brig the half they had already on board, and embarked the other. The dragoman in his anger fined the party of the authorities who favored Brest's claims twelve thousand piastres, which were repaid them by France.

These details differ slightly from those I once sent the Nation, but since then there has been a thorough search into the correspondence and records relating to the affair, and the younger Brest found that there had been new light thrown on some details of the questions involved. I may also have incorrectly related some, owing to the lapse of time between seeing him and writing down my impressions. This must account for the discrepancy as to the arms which Brest then believed to have been shipped on the Turk.

Yours respectfully, W. J. Stillman.

THE CASE OF GARFIELD—THE "LOAN" HYPOTHESIS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You seem to think that, assuming the memory of Ames to have been treacherous, the most likely supposition is that Ames did loan Garfield money, with the understanding on the part of the latter that if he did take the stock the adjustment should be made when he took it, and that he never did take the stock, but repaid the loan. And this you think is consistent with all the facts proven in the case.

Let us look at it.

(1.) Did Garfield receive $300? If so, then the memoranda relating to Garfield must be construed as having been made up by Ames with the expectancy that he would take the stock and dividend balance; that in June, 1868, when Ames offered $329 he took but the $300 as a loan, and left the question of acceptance of stock in abeyance; and that Ames left his memoranda standing as made, without any figures as to the $300 whatever. Besides, on what footing was Garfield to take the stock, if he did, ultimately? Did Ames intend (secretly in his own mind only) to let Garfield have it as if he had bought in July, 1867, and had paid for it "7 mos. 10 days" thereafter—so that when it should be "settled" Garfield should get the stock, its dividends "earned" after June, 1868, and $29 in money (being the overplus to which he would be entitled in reference to the $329 balance) due in June, 1868? Did Ames and Garfield so, then, understand it? Why, then, is there not a figure accordant with such a fact? Why is there not a figure as to a "loan" of $300? What did Garfield then (June, 1868) understand he was to pay, then knowing (see his own evidence) that it was worth (about) three times par? Or did he think Ames was a kind, benevolent Jupiter, convenient in the air above, ready to descend in golden drops?

There is, however, an especial memorandum (to which, by the way, you did not refer in your article on the subject), which cannot be included within the circle of the $300 "loan." I refer to the general list (page 445 of the evidence "Reports of Committees: Crédit-Mobilier Reports . . . 1872–73"). This list was made before payments, but the cross × was put after payments made (p. 450). In this list appear the following names: Dawes, Scofield, Patterson, Painter, Wilson, Colfax, Bingham, Allison, Kelley, Wilson, Garfield, and opposite "Dawes, Kelley, Wilson, Garfield" are set "× 329."

(2.) Did Garfield receive $329? Then the further irresistible question occurs, Which supposition best concurs with the used check (p. 353–4), the memoranda (pp. 445, 453), the statement (shown to each person of ten shares, pp. 454, 459) and Garfield's account (p. 459)—Garfield's as to a loan of $300, or Ames's as to a balance of dividends after paying for the stock?

(3.) Again, as to any loan whatever. You treat Ames's evidence as fluctuating. But what did he say Garfield said since the investigation commenced? "A part of the time he thinks it was a loan; sometimes he thinks he has repaid me; and then again he is in doubts about it" (p. 357). "He did not claim that" (loan of $300) "with me." . . . "He thought he had repaid it. I don't know; I can't remember" (p. 357). And see the very remarkable evidence as to $400 received from and given back to Garfield (since investigation began) on page 297. Garfield never contradicted Ames in these respects, nor did he give any evidence as to the memoranda said to have been shown to him.

(4.) But suppose the $329 was advanced as a "loan"; how stood the agreement as to stock then and there, or Garfield's state of mind thereon? Set it out in full, plain words, and see how it looks to you when so stated. "Adjusted" is good; but give particulars and see to what conclusions it inevitably leads, remembering that then the stock was three times par (about).

(5.) Finally, the burden of proof in this discussion is with Garfield and his friends. The popular verdict sought is, "He is to be trusted." And to find such a verdict the evidence must be inconsistent with every other hypothesis than that of innocence, beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt. To punish for a crime is one thing, to put in a post of high responsibility and trust is quite another, and the burden of proof is very different in the two cases. Do we want a President with a Scotch verdict "not proven" tacked on to him? I trow not. J. B. W.

Morristown, N. J., June 25, 1880.

[1. We think Garfield did receive $300. That Ames thought he would eventually take the stock we infer from his (Ames's) holding on to it so long; but that his expectation was not strong we infer from his admitted failure to offer it to Garfield, or to pay him or offer to pay him any of the dividends which accrued on it after the $329 (June, 1868), although he did pay these dividends to others during this period. Ames's understanding or expectation, however, does not bind Garfield unless there was something said or done by Garfield to support it. We find nothing of this kind. On the contrary, Garfield acted during this period in his management of his affairs as if he had no money or money's worth in Ames's hands, and expected nothing from him, and Ames acknowledged that during this period (1868 to 1872) he had received no communication from Garfield with regard to the stock or dividends (Poland Report, p. 296). We are therefore driven to the conclusion either that Garfield did not understand that he owned the stock and was entitled to the dividends, or that he is so peculiarly constituted that he, being a poor man, preferred borrowing money to using his own funds. As regards the "especial memorandum or general list," which our correspondent thinks of such importance, it is easily disposed of. In the first place, Ames acknowledged that he had at the time of these transactions no bookkeeper, and used "to keep all his own matters in his own way, very carelessly he admitted." In the next place, the names in the list were put down before payment "he thought"—"about the time of payment, probably before"; so that the list was really a list of persons whom he expected to have to pay. He put crosses against the names of those he had paid, Garfield's being one of those thus marked; but he would naturally have done this on cashing the check which he says he intended for Garfield. But what sort of evidence is this? How would it work if every man's reputation were held at the mercy of memoranda in another man's pocket-book, and if A.'s drawing money on his own check for B.'s intended benefit, without any sign of B.'s cognizance, were to be taken as proof that B. got the money?

2. We conclude that Garfield did not receive the $329, (1) because Ames had no receipt to show for it, although he had taken receipts for stock and dividends from five other members; (2) because he said he paid it by check, but the check produced was not made payable to Garfield's order, nor did it, as in three other cases, bear any initials, or memorandum, or sign of any kind connecting Garfield with it. Moreover, the memorandum-book gives this payment as made on the 19th of June, whereas the check is dated the 22d of June. Ames first said he paid this dividend "in money"; he then said he "presumed" it had been paid by check; a week later he said he "could not tell who had the benefit of this check" (p. 353); that he "had no idea whether he received the money on it himself or not"; that "he might have drawn the money and handed it to another person"; that "he had no memory as to that particular check"; and, finally, "that he was not sure how he paid Mr. Garfield" (Report, pp. 353–4). Later still he said that "he put Mr. Colfax's initials on the check, while he put no initials on Mr. Garfield's, and he might have drawn the money himself" (p. 471). The cashier of the Sergeant-at-Arms was also examined, and swore "that he had no doubt himself that he paid that (the check in question) to Mr. Ames."

Garfield published in the newspapers at once the letter he wrote to Ames with Ames's endorsement on it, and this appeared before Ames's testimony about it. Garfield fully explained in his pamphlet the circumstances which led him to send Ames the $400. It was due to a report brought him in the House that Ames had just testified before the Committee that the loan "was $400 and not $300, and that he had never been repaid." Garfield in a moment of excitement rushed off and sent him a check for $400 with an indignant letter. The report was untrue and Ames returned the money. This was an indiscretion on Garfield's part, but we cannot see any sign of guilt in it. He was not summoned before the Committee for examination as to this part of Ames's testimony, and any one who reads it can easily see why. He gave full explanations on the points raised by it in his pamphlet. We quite agree with our correspondent that the burden of proof in the case of a candidate for high office accused of dishonorable conduct lies on the candidate and his friends. On the other hand, the laws of proof are the same in the case of a candidate as of any other man. We have no right to balance probabilities in judging a candidate in a way which we should consider unfair or untrustworthy in judging a private individual, and we repeat that, in coming to a conclusion about a transaction affecting any man's reputation, of which two explanations are possible, we are bound to take account of the general tenor of his life and character; in other words, no charge is equally probable against all men. Finally, let us add that if inability to refute completely any charge brought were to be held fatal to a man's fitness for the Presidency, no man in the United States would ever get the office. The Independent voters, on whom General Garfield must largely rely for his success, will, we are sure, judge his record rationally and calmly, as they would any other matter, without being carried off their feet in either direction by the usual campaign foam.—Ed. Nation.]

THE INDEPENDENT REPUBLICANS AND THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Presidential campaign is now fully opened, and it is generally recognized that the absurd "scratching" movement of last fall has had perhaps as much practical effect in obtaining for the Republicans a possibility of victory as Secretary Evarts's speech on "voting in the air," or Mr. Beecher's eloquent comparison of the Republican party to a case of measles. It is chiefly to be remembered as practical proof that in times of organized party tyranny, against all sorts of odds, and with no capital except pluck, a sense of doing the right thing, and some faith in the application of ordinary common sense even to political matters, the leadership of younger men, "unknown" and untrained in politics, was able to gather a resisting force sufficient to cope even with party "discipline"—in a word, proof that American private citizens still possess the independence and organizing power to take care of their own affairs.

If we are to believe the New York Times (of the present month) "the Independent Republicans of New York control the State, and this State will undoubtedly determine the next Presidential election. . . . The Independents are quite numerous enough to move the balance." It is indeed a matter of surprise how numerous they are. It was not suspected, for instance, until Mr. Choate made the announcement the other night, that Mr. Gedney's Republican club was an army of hitherto disguised "scratchers." Noble men they are, too, if we may again credit so competent party authority as the Times (of June 13), for they constitute an "honorable feature" so creditable as necessarily to be "unknown to the Democratic party"; young men, indeed, who "correspond in their enthusiasm and purposes of reform to the youthful reformers who founded the Republican party." It is to be hoped that in the conflict of statement between the Times and that trusty boomster, Mr. H. C., who has for some time conducted its opinions, it is the latter who is mistaken in asserting (Times, June 17) that the "namby-pamby, goody-goody gentlemen who call themselves 'Independents'" and "sip cold tea" (the most dreadful of political crimes) are "in reality assistant Democrats in disguise," since in that case, by the Times' showing, the Republican party must lose New York and the election. It may be observed, however, that the correspondent's letter was dated June 12, and it was possibly on the Saturday night of purification intervening that the miracle occurred by which these persons became so changed in character.

If this certificate were intended as coaxing, it was unnecessary, nor are Independent men to succumb either to flattery or abuse. So far as I know—and I speak from personal intercourse since the Chicago Convention with leading men of the affiliated Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and New York organizations—the men who really were Independents when that meant party ostracism earnestly desire the election of General Garfield, and mean to work actively for the Republican ticket. To do otherwise would be indeed to win the victory and lose, not "the spoils," but its fruits. These men have worked only as Republicans, and it was only as they found their own party captured by traitors to its principles that they proposed its true banner should float, if need be, over another camp.

The Independent conference which was in daily session at Chicago during the Convention saw indeed the realization, in the first steps, of what had before been only a snare—"reform within the party." This conference was not without its effect upon the Convention. The efforts of such men as Wayne MacVeagh and Wharton Barker, from the Pennsylvania League, were largely instrumental in bringing about the Pennsylvania defiance of the unit rule and confirming independence inside Mr. Conkling's own camp; the New York Independents were able to show a 20,000-vote-power revolt against Conkling and Grant and Boss government in New York—the one fact against the wild assertions of the boomsters; while the Massachusetts Young Republicans, through the active sympathy of their State delegation in the Convention, were able to obtain the declaration in favor of civil-service reform, which would not have been forced into the platform but for the persistent exertions of the Independents in conjunction with the Massachusetts delegates. It may be worth the Nation's while to put on record, as a cardinal and specific article of faith representing an especial aim of the Independents within the party, the plank originally drafted in that conference, which was afterward modified into less distasteful form by Mr. Barker, of Massachusetts, and finally carried through the Convention, after it had received but three votes in the Committee on Resolutions:

"The Republican party responds to the demand of the people for civil-service reform, and pledges itself to continue the work of putting that reform into practical effect. Fitness; not partisanship, should admit to the public service, under such practical tests in each department of government business as may be provided for by a civil-service board, or by equivalent means. Tenure should be permanent during good behavior, except in those offices through which the distinctive policy of the party in power is carried out. This requires the repeal of the law vacating certain business offices every four years. Executive officers must be held responsible for the conduct of officials under their control, with full power to remove for cause. This requires, for Presidential appointments, the repeal of the Tenure-of-office Acts, and the fulfilment of the declaration of the Republican platform of 1876, that 'Senators and Representatives, who may be judges and accusers, should not dictate appointments to office.'"

Though the modified declaration was itself shorn in the Convention, it still contains the specific demand for legislative co-operation which, by those who know most about civil-service reform, is considered a decided advance in the record of the party on this point, which is the key to the final triumph of "Independent" principles. The overthrow of the designs of the "Senatorial Seizers" in the National Committee; the final defeat of the unit rule; the utter rout of the Bosses on the floor of the Convention; the rejection of Gen. Grant and the third term, and finally of Mr. Blaine, were all triumphs of "Independent" principles—to whose victory there were but two exceptions.

These were the pusillanimous adoption, at the bull-dozing of Mr. Conkling, of his gag-rule, in which it was left to West Virginia to show to Massachusetts, with the splendid record of her State conventions, what liberty means; and the temporary aberration of mind which produced the nomination of Mr. Arthur. This last, of course, weakens the ticket to Independents, because it is a slap in the face of the Administration and the particular reform which they support, but it is so small a spite that they can afford to ignore it. Civil-service reform can safely be trusted to Gen. Garfield and to an awakened public opinion—better than to the too willing Democrats; and Independent Republicans ought to, and will, support the Republican ticket. It may be counted as certain that the plan suggested for combating this portion of the ticket inside the electoral delegation of safe Republican States will not be carried out if it involves any danger to the head of the ticket. It is a sad commentary on the personal honor of the defeated Bosses that while it was thought necessary to "shadow" Mr. Cameron at the desk of the Convention, it was found desirable to induce Mr. Conkling by this sop to carry out the pledge he had imposed upon other delegates.

The Presidential nomination presents a man who, perhaps beyond all others, typifies the principles of the Independent movement. Mr. Edmunds was "the ideal candidate," but to him civil-service reform was a piece of new-fangled "idealism"; Gen. Garfield has from the beginning practised it in his relations with his district. On finance, what he has done speaks where the Republican platform is silent. No man in Congress has been more broad in his views of party relations and of sectional issues. He even sees that the tariff is not perfection. He is a man of the present, not of the past. His address at Chicago was the masterpiece of the Convention. If the whole tendency of character and life is to be taken into account in weighing evidence as to particular occasions, Gen. Garfield is essentially an honest man, whether it be considered that he did not show, in the two possible spots upon him, the moral clearness he should have had, or whether he be altogether acquitted on the Crédit-Mobilier and the De Golyer charges, as so scrupulous an authority as the Nation has already acquitted him. I do not hold it to be "mud-throwing" that the Democratic press discuss, from authentic evidence, the personal honesty of a candidate for President, but I do hold that the character of this man demands strong evidence for its impeachment. It is to be hoped that General Garfield will not himself repel the Independent vote by acquiescence in the attempt to put Cameron again at the head of the National Committee, which would threaten more of the mistaken tolerance that has done so much harm in Mr. Hayes.

It must be to the satisfaction of all true friends of good government that against him the Democrats have nominated so good and blameless a man as Gen. Hancock. But there is nothing in the record or probabilities of the anti-Republican party to supply the uncertainty as to the civic career of this untried soldier as against the Congressional work of Gen. Garfield, and to turn Independent voters in that direction. For while the Democratic platform is less ludicrous in assumption of every credit where the country has succeeded despite parties, it is more obnoxious than the Republican in its treatment of the human rights of the Chinese; it does not supply with the necessary particulars the hiatus in the Republican platform regarding finance and the silver question; its professions as to civil-service reform are no more specific and much less likely to be carried out; and its "historic" declarations as to revenue reform show poorly alongside the history it has been making while it has had the legislative power in its hands. It seems, in short, that no man who desires the success of those measures towards good government with which the Independent movement is identified can afford to do other than his best for the success of the Republican ticket, despite the weakness of its second name. The campaign is one in which every Independent vote should be called out and Independent principles brought to the front for thorough discussion, that the election of Garfield may be only a first step in the regeneration of the Republican party. I may ask leave in a future issue to offer some considerations touching this practical work. R. R. Bowker.

Notes.

Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati, will shortly publish a prose volume by John James Piatt, entitled 'Pencilled Fly-Leaves,' and containing, among other essays, one more elaborate on the foundation of Kenyon College.——New editions of Dickens's 'Child's History of England' and of Bancroft's 'Life of Washington' are in the press of Porter & Coates, Philadelphia.——Roberts Bros., Boston, announce 'Crusoe in New York, and Other Tales,' by the Rev. E. E. Hale.——A. Williams & Co., Boston, will publish next month 'The War-Ships and Navies of the World,' by Chief-Engineer King, of the United States Navy. Its illustrations and statistics will give this work an exceptional value.——George R. Lockwood, the publisher of 'Just One Day,' a trifle of last summer, now discloses the fact that it and 'Helen's Babies' are by the same author.——The June number of the American Art Review opens with a first paper on one of the most original and imaginative of American artists, Elihu Vedder, whose genius embraces a range from the "Young Marsyas" to the "Sea-Serpent." An excellent etching, by S. A. Schoff, of that "sea-beast crawled forth, that on a shelf Of . . . sand reposeth, there to sun itself," shows how ingeniously the perspective of the sand ridge is made to heighten the apparent length of the serpent. Of the other illustrations to this article the tail-piece might be thought most characteristic. An etching, "Divination in Tea-Leaves," by Alfred Brennan, a young Kentuckian, is full of promise. Mr. Linton's "History of American Wood-Engraving" treats interestingly of the influence of our pictorial newspapers on the art.——The growth of etching as a familiar mode of illustration is shown in the June number of the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, which gives a freshly-etched portrait of General Abner Lacock, in connection with his biography, and an equally recent etching of the yard of the Black Horse Inn, on North Second Street, Philadelphia, an inn of the true English type in construction and still preserved. The magazine begins the publication of a number of rare tracts "issued during the infancy of Penn's Colony," and designed to foster immigration. Among the notes Dr. Robins frankly produces evidence overthrowing his theory that his "Edward Wale" of Maryland was the regicide Whalley. He now concludes the former to have been a near relative, perhaps a son, of the latter.——The Magazine of American History for June has the usual variety of illustrations in fac-simile and otherwise, including an etched portrait of Col. Samuel Blatchley Webb, of the Continental Army, whose career is traced by the editor. Miss Susan Fenimore Cooper discusses the early names of the Hudson River, and Mr. T. C. Amory his kinsman Gen. Sullivan's expedition against the Six Nations.——The Metropolitan Museum of Art has published a Hand-Book No. 2 on the Potteries of the Cesnola Collection in the South Aisle of the Great Hall.——The net proceeds of the latest picnic of the Madison School, St. Louis, were nearly $300, and swell the amount thus raised in the past five years to nearly $1,100, which, as we lately described, is expended in books and apparatus.——A brief memoir of the late Governor John A. Andrew, extracted from the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, has been printed by the author, Mr. Peleg W. Chandler. The preface announces that an extended biography in preparation by another hand "will not be published for a considerable time, if at all."——B. Westermann & Co. send us Parts 14 and 15 of the new edition of 'Stieler's Hand-Atlas,' with maps of Ireland, North Germany, Southern Italy, Asia Minor, Palestine, and the western half of Polynesia.——The death is announced of the Rev. Leonhardt Tafel, Ph.D., Tübingen, Professor of the Oriental and Modern Languages in the Philadelphia Academy of the New Church. He was an extensive translator into German of the Latin and Greek classics and of the works of Scott, Thackeray, and Dickens, and the author of several manuals for the learning of modern and ancient tongues. With the assistance of his sons he prepared and published the chief part of an interlinear translation of the Bible.——We must also record the death of Mr. George Merriam, the head of the well-known Springfield (Mass.) firm, whose main publication has, since 1847, been Webster's Dictionary. He was greatly esteemed for his benevolent actions.——Students to whom the German is either a locked or a difficult language will now have, besides the English version of Curtius's 'History of Greece,' the option of one in French. The fifth edition has been translated by Professor A. Bouché-Leclercq, and the first fascicle of the first volume is now before us, bearing the imprint of Ernest Leroux, Paris. M. Bouché-Leclercq is the author of a very considerable 'History of Divination in Antiquity,' in four volumes.

—As a means of promoting a school of sacred composition in America, Mr. George G. Rockwood, Director of the Music of the Church of the Holy Trinity in this city, offers two prizes, of $70 and $30 respectively, for anthems for the use of the quartets and chorus choir under his direction. The MSS., with cipher or motto, must be sent to Mr. Rockwood at 17 Union Square, by October 1, 1880; the award will be made (by very competent judges) a month later. Those accepted become the property of the Director, who intends to publish and distribute them widely at a cost price. "The anthems are to be from four to seven minutes in length, for full chorus, with or without interspersed solos, duets, quartets, etc." The words must be taken exclusively from the Scriptures.

—The last published word about Shelley has been Mr. Symonds's biography, of which, in spite of its many excellences, the real valuelessness as criticism is indicated by such sentences as "Not only did he write the best lyrics, but the best tragedy, the best translations, and the best familiar poems of his century," and "He was the loftiest and the most spontaneous singer of our language." Remembering that there is something very like an entire literature concerning Shelley, this way of summing it all up could but be unsatisfactory, and doubtless all of Shelley's admirers who admire him wisely will be glad to learn that the Rev. Stopford Brooke has just prefaced a selection of Shelley's poems with an essay of some length and noticeable temperateness. Mr. Stopford Brooke is certainly not less an admirer of Shelley than Mr. Symonds, but the difference between the spirit of the criticism just quoted and such really felicitous criticism as this from 'A Primer of English Literature' about Shelley's lyrics—"They form together the most sensitive, the most imaginative, and the most musical, but the least tangible lyrical poetry we possess"—is apparent. Indeed, what he had to say of Shelley in his 'Primer' would perhaps have justified the expectation that his present essay would be at once a closer and more ambitious critique than it turns out to be; and it is so excellent that we wish it had attempted more than the pleasant and suggestive but possibly a little desultory reflections that it furnishes us. Of its sixty pages half are contributed by Mr. Stopford Brooke to the June Macmillan, under the accurate title "Some Thoughts on Shelley," where the reader who does not see the volume of 'Selections' will find them; but though they are perhaps the only suitable portion for a magazine to print, the remainder of the preface is almost as well worth reading, especially the elaborate analysis of 'The Triumph of Life,' and the tracing of Shelley's alternation between "the world of mankind and its hopes" and "the world of his own heart." The volume, which is a 16mo of some 350 pages and is published by Macmillan, contains, besides most of Shelley's shorter poems, 'Alastor,' 'Adonais,' and the 'Ode to the West Wind,' and several lyrical selections from the 'Prometheus,' 'The Cenci,' 'The Revolt of Islam,' and so on.

—In this preface, also, Mr. Stopford Brooke takes occasion to discuss briefly the value of "selections." He is not disposed to think it very great, we gather from the way in which he speaks, and it occurs to us that he is the only editor of "selections" that we remember who has possessed this excellent qualification for his work—a correct appreciation of its importance, namely. Or rather, we should say, he avoids an over-estimation of its importance, for we can hardly agree that "the only valid reason and excuse for selections from a poet" is to "present in a brief compass enough of his poetry to induce those who are ignorant of it to read the whole." This is a humble view, certainly, to take of his office; but we suspect very few people are thus stimulated, and that, if Mr. Stopford Brooke's book induces any one ignorant of Shelley to read him, it will be through its preface rather than its selections. There are two considerations—however many there should be—for the success of such volumes as this, we imagine: the convenience and the cheapness of their multum in parvo character. Almost any one, for example, can now own Shelley's most characteristic lyrics and carry them in his pocket, if he choose. The publication of a small volume called 'Stray Moments with Thackeray: His Humor, Satire, and Characters. Being Selections from his Writings, prefaced with a few Biographical Notes. By William H. Rideing' (Appleton) reminds us, however, that neither of these considerations is possible in all cases, and that sometimes, even if they both were, the corresponding disadvantages would substantially outweigh them. Mr. Stopford Brooke says the main objection to selections is the necessity of reading all a poet's work if he is to be known truly. Thackeray was not a poet, but he is easily chief among his English intellectual compeers as an artist in fiction, and no attempt to make a book of Rochefoucauld maxims from his works, even if it were as well done as this is ill done, can fail to jar on one as a particularly unhappy literary mistake. Mr. Carlyle, we remember, recently expressed his confidence that a similar selection from his books would be valuable from a missionary point of view; but Mr. Carlyle, besides praying "May the devil fly away with the fine-arts," lends himself to selections more easily than writers who have as much regard for form as Thackeray had. Thackeray was, it may be, prouder of his "week-day sermons" than of his masterpieces; but to make a volume of "elegant extracts" from his works, the organic quality of which is, in the main, important, though it is not always obvious, is a proceeding which he would have known how to characterize aptly.

—The North American Review for July contains articles by several contributors more or less well known, among others Prof. Goldwin Smith, who writes a few pages for the purpose of protesting against the anti-American feeling which Sir Francis Hincks and many other Canadian politicians think it advisable to keep alive among the citizens of the Dominion. It was undoubtedly the policy of the late Beaconsfield government to cultivate this sentiment, and it is as undoubtedly a very unadvisable sentiment for any party to cultivate. As Mr. Goldwin Smith points out, the tendency of Canada and the United States has been towards a commercial union, which is only hindered by political considerations. It cannot be disputed, however, that underlying all the professions of good-will between England, the United States, and Canada, there is a good deal of latent hostility, which it only requires some local wrangle, like that over the fisheries, to fan into a flame. It is the part of statesmanship, little recognized either in England or this country, to permit as few occasions for such wrangles as may be. With regard to the rest of the number, it seems to have been made up, as most numbers of the North American are made up now, by securing contributions as far as possible from persons of well-known names, without much regard to whether their contributions have a value either permanent or temporary. Mr. James E. Thorold Rogers, for instance, writes an article about the English House of Lords, which does not contain any information that cannot be found elsewhere, while Count de Lesseps sends three pages from Paris on the Panama Canal, which might easily have been written in New York. Moritz Busch has something to say about Prince Bismarck, "as a friend of America and as a statesman," from which it clearly appears that the Prince is and has ever been both the one and the other. Mr. A. K. Fiske contributes an article on "Profligacy in Fiction," apropos of Zola and Ouida. A writer who is ready to insist so warmly on the duty of literature to be free from offence in all respects ought to be more careful of his own use of language. He should not, for instance, call Zola that "genius of the muck-rake," because this is rather abuse than criticism. It is hardly fair criticism either to trace the effect of "Ouida's peculiar training" in her books, or to call her a "much travelled adventuress of no nationality." Miss M. A. Hardaker writes a very sensible article on the "Ethics of Sex"; coming from a woman it is a presentation of the argument against woman suffrage which a few years since would have commanded a good deal of attention. That it is not likely to do so now, is largely due to the decline of interest in the enfranchisement of woman among the reading classes.

—The closing of the Jesuit establishments in France, appointed for this week, gives the fillip of timeliness to an article in the current Contemporary Review on "The French Republic and the Catholic Church," by M. Edmond Scherer, who is always worth attention whether especially timely or not. M. Scherer is a literary critic of such natural distinction that it is only while reading such a paper as this that one does not feel regret that he concerns himself with anything else than literature. But it is probably due to the reciprocal influence of his turn for literature and his turn for politics that both his literary essays and his utterances as a publicist are as able as they are: the first are as noticeable for their application of "the historic sense" as the latter are for their literary finish, their absence of rhetoric, and their admirable temper. This essay is an attempt to set English readers right upon the true position which the French Republic has taken up towards the Catholic Church; and since it is learned without pedantry, bold without arrogance, courteous without special suavity, and equally graceful and direct, we should say it could hardly fail of its designed effect if it were not that so large a part of the audience to which it is addressed find it difficult to associate the notions of stability in democratic institutions and republicanism in France; as M. Scherer points out, the Government of M. Grévy seem to them "the genuine children of the Jacobins of 1793," whereas Lord Palmerston and "public opinion in England were decidedly opposed to the Jesuits and their cause" during the Swiss civil-war of 1847. A struggle similar to the present one in France has been passed through of late years, M. Scherer recalls, in every country where Catholicism has been powerful enough to attempt to regain by education what it had lost by pursuing bolder methods—Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Italy, and Belgium. He says plausibly enough that the Austrian Concordat of 1855 "remains as the official programme of Catholicism," and after thus premising that the present proceedings "are but an incident in the battle actually fought in all Catholic lands between the sovereignty of the state and the theocracy of the Church," he proceeds to discuss "the real issue"—i.e., whether the French Government has right as well as precedent on its side. This he does briefly and originally, but we must remain content with calling our readers' attention to his argument without attempting to summarize it.

—Liberty, toleration, and "the rights of man" are such frequent watchwords—indeed candor might add "catchwords"—with us in America, however, that we should like to quote a few sentences from what so ardent a Liberal as M. Scherer has to say about them generally. The main objection, he rightly says, to the Ferry bill and the subsequent decrees is that they are a violation of the rights of the citizen especially inconsistent in a republic. M. Laboulaye, who opposed them, he explains, "is known to be crotchety, unsafe, a blind admirer of American principles and institutions"—as if to say: "In America the ideas that Jefferson absorbed from the philosophers of '89 are still held rigorously and fixedly, and it would be dangerous as well as eccentric for us to retrograde so far as to imitate them." They cannot in France, he argues, arrive at a "principle" intuitively and deduce institutions from it without constantly testing the principle by experience. And what he says upon the point, though it has perhaps a text-book elementariness, must be admitted to be so well put, whether we agree with it or have a transcendental horror of it, or neither, that we shall venture to quote it:

"Is liberty a first principle, a religious dogma, placed above all contestation and limitation, or is it simply the balance of conflicting interests, the adjustment of opposite claims, a matter of expediency, a right susceptible of augmentation and diminution, subject, like every exercise of human activity, to the conditions of social life, to the security and welfare of the commonwealth? To put the question is to answer it. I forget who was the orator who, in the days of our first Revolution, uttered the celebrated exclamation: 'Let colonies perish rather than a principle!' Well, is there, I ask, any one to say: Let France and her institutions go to ruin rather than suppress a number of monastic orders or deprive them of the right of teaching! Or shall we be met by that favorite plea of the doctrinaires of Liberalism, according to which liberty has in itself the power to remedy the evils to which it is liable? . . . It is with that saying as with another famous aphorism, according to which martyrs are the seed of the Church. All very well, but the Church has nevertheless been in many cases and places eradicated by persecution."

Certainly if M. Edmond Scherer be a fair example of a French radical of 1880 that person is scarcely to be called "a genuine child of the Jacobins of 1793."

—With the better knowledge which comes of personal examination, we venture to recur to the admirable publications of the Society for Photographing Relics of Old London, now numbering forty-eight in all. The Society is not a commercial body, but issues its photographs to subscribers only, at a small advance over cost to cover necessary expenses. Its establishment was due to the desire felt by a few artists and others to secure a permanent record of the Oxford Arms Inn, in Warwick Lane, Paternoster Row, the site of which was advertised for sale in 1875. The publicity given to this desire soon rallied sufficient support to enable the work to be continued systematically, with the result above stated. Great vigilance is now exercised by the Society's members and friends in anticipating the destruction of old and interesting buildings; negatives are taken if necessary in advance of the year of publication; and not a few portable relics have been secured for South Kensington. Assistance in the choice of subjects and in the fixing of points of view for the photographer (which is always most carefully done) has been given in different instances by Mr. Wallis and Mr. Boyce, both members of the Society of Painters in Water Colors, by Mr. George Henry Birch, a well-known architect and antiquary and the Hon. Secretary of the London and Middlesex Archæological Society, and by Mr. H. S. Marks, R.A.; the general arrangements being under the care of the brother of the last-named, Mr. Alfred Marks, of Long Ditton, Surrey, to whom we are indebted for the series upon our table. The first half of the views (which are permanent autotypes) were taken by Messrs. Bool, the remainder by Mr. Henry Dixon; and when one considers the smoky atmosphere of the great city, the narrowness of its old streets, and the incessant traffic in them, one can but marvel at the brilliancy of these prints. Some of the interiors, indeed, were so badly lighted that Mr. Dixon succeeded only by the use of the dry gelatine plates. The Cloisters at Charterhouse (No. 40) is an example of the difficulty overcome, though possibly this was not the most trying instance.

—Two sets of greater importance stand apart in this series—viz., the first, the Oxford Arms (Nos. 1–6), and the Charterhouse (Nos. 37–48); a third, St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, and adjacent houses in Cloth Fair (Nos. 13–18), is interesting, but has fewer associations than the other two. Of all exterior views the palm would, we think, be unanimously awarded to No. 6, if that can be called "exterior" which gives us a look into the quadrangle of the Oxford Arms from the Old Bailey, with St. Paul's dome and towers high in the distance. For chiaroscuro, harmonious lines and masses, and general picturesqueness, nothing could be more felicitous. The galleries of the inn, here seen under a light of singular purity for London, which date back only to the great fire of 1666, but mark as well the inn of Shakspere or of Chaucer, are again strikingly caught in Nos. 3, 4, and 5—No. 4, in perspective, showing the huge brackets of the weatherboards. On the other hand the Charterhouse outranks every other subject by its interiors, though we can commend also the exteriors, particularly No. 41, the Great Hall, with its fine old sundial. Of extraordinary beauty is this same hall viewed from within in Nos. 42, 43, 44, with its high panelled wainscoting and arched ceiling and massive (rather than elegant) fireplace; still finer the Governor's Room, in which both Elizabeth and James held court—the gem of the interiors, wonderfully lighted. The Founder's Tomb, No. 48, is another noble subject, and so in a different way is the Grand Staircase, No. 45. The associations of the Charterhouse with Thackeray in particular are matched by those of Barnard's Inn with Dickens, who introduces it in his 'Great Expectations.' No. 28, showing the court, is attractive enough. Literary and picturesque considerations unite again in Canonbury Tower (Nos. 25, 26), Goldsmith's refuge against his creditors, and the place where he is said to have written the 'Vicar of Wakefield.' Ben Jonson is connected by tradition with No. 12, Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, as plying his mason's art on the building; Pope sings of the church of St. Mary-le-Strand, shown in the distance in No. 10 ("Old Houses in Drury Lane"); Dr. Johnson worshipped in St. Clement Danes, seen in No. 7 ("Old Houses in Wych Street"), a charming perspective, rivalled by another bearing the same title (No. 8); of Lord Shaftesbury's town house, designed by Inigo Jones (No. 32), Locke must sometimes have been an inmate. We conclude our still imperfect enumeration with Temple Bar (No. 19), and a grille in Leadenhall Street (No. 20); the latter an impressive symbol of aldermanic state in days gone by.

—At the end of its first semester Le Livre indulges in a self-gratulatory retrospect, having found already a wider support than it dared dream of obtaining in ten years. In France, nevertheless, its reception has been less spontaneous than elsewhere. According to the peculiar division of this periodical the "modern part" now finishes a volume, of which the table of contents will be furnished with the next issue. Among the interesting matters of this June number we remark a sketch of the characteristics, as a collector, of the late Count Octave de Béhague, whose extraordinary library was recently sold for $186,000; the announcement of a new edition of the unsavory 'Contes' of La Fontaine with Fragonard's designs, both those which accompanied the Didot edition of 1795, and 36 hitherto unpublished, of which last Le Livre gives a sample etching; the announcement of a typographic exhibition at Caen, during the present month, under the auspices of the Normandy Antiquarian Society, in honor of the four hundredth anniversary of the introduction of printing into that province; and what looks like a mystification in regard to the Iron Mask, who, according to a pencilled note in a contemporary edition of Molière, written by one Luise de Gramont, "princesse de Monaco," was "Monsieur de Louzoua, . . . le frère du grand Roy Lois quatorzième."

—The monument fever is still raging in Germany. Scarcely had the newspapers ceased discussing the Beethoven monument in Vienna and the Schumann monument at Bonn when Berlin announced to the nation that her Goethe monument was ready to be unveiled. The ceremony took place in the Thiergarten, in the presence of the Emperor and many noted men of letters. There were addresses by Geh. Rath von Loeper, the mayor of the city Von Forckenbeck, and others; and members of the Singacademie contributed some vocal music. The statue is the work of Prof. Fritz Schaper. The Berliners are now happy in the thought that they have done their duty towards their two greatest poets, Schiller having already been monumentalized in 1871. The ceremony in the Thiergarten was followed by a festive banquet, which, however, thanks to the work of Johannes Scherr, the "Rabelais of the nineteenth century," turned out a complete fiasco. In No. 21 of the Gegenwart Paul Lindau had published an extravagantly sarcastic article directed against the painful pedantry of the Goethe scholars, and entitled "De botulo sive sanguiculo insaniente, d. i. die Abhandlung von der wahnsinnigen Blutwurst, von Minutius Quisquilius von Pimperling. Ein unentbehrlicher Beitrag zur Goethe Literatur." This article gave great offence to some members of the festival committee, and the proposal of Hermann Grimm that Paul Lindau should not be invited to the banquet was accordingly accepted by a majority vote, although Herr von Loeper, who had perhaps particular reasons for resenting Scherr's articles, objected to such a proceeding. Some other writers fairly entitled to an invitation had also been omitted from the lists, and when this became known almost all the leading authors, including Auerbach, Spielhagen, E. Dohm, Hugo Bürger, H. Kletke, Th. Fontane, K. Frenzel, Hans Hopfen, A. L'Arronge, R. Lowenstein, Rudolf Lindau, Julius Stettenheim, and Joh. Trojan sent in their non-acceptance of the invitation. The only noted authors present were accordingly Rodenberg and H.

Kruse, and they only because they had not been informed in time of the proceedings of the committee. Besides these and the journalists only one "creative writer" appeared on the scene, the author of 'Unüberwindliche Mächte,' whose name, as Lindau remarks in the last Gegenwart, "to save the reader the trouble of looking it up," is Hermann Grimm.

—In No. 131 of the Deutsche Zeit- und Streit-Fragen Dr. Ludwig Schwerin discusses the admission of women to medical practice, and establishes the intellectual capacity of woman in general by a number of interesting examples in the latter half of his essay, and for medicine in particular by the case of Dr. Dorothea Christiana Erxleben, née Leporin. The author's use of these instances in support of his argument was anticipated by his allusion to the washerwoman's brain dissected at the same time with the mathematician Gauss's, and which outweighed the latter's. The writer maintains with poetic fervor, but with now somewhat familiar arguments, that women should be allowed to practise among women and children, and without exception wherever male physicians are not to be had, especially in the country—of course having reference to Germany. He also thinks that the interest of the state requires their free admission to the army and the battle-field, and to the places of the men absent in war. The argument, however, that the cause of delicacy, chastity, etc., demands female physicians to attend the female sex seems to be in rather dangerous company when it is coupled with the demand for the opening of male medical schools to them, and instruction by male professors.

KOSSUTH AND THE ITALIAN CAMPAIGN OF 1859.*

THESE 'Memories' disclose a curious episode in the inner life of English domestic politics. They cover the period during which the campaign of Magenta and Solferino was begun and ended, and the first great step towards the unity and independence of Italy successfully accomplished. From the world's present standpoint it is hard to believe that a prospect of this most beneficent result should have kindled distrust and dislike in any nation or government outside of the limits of the Austrian bureaucracy. But the world, according to a late utterance of Lord Beaconsfield, is governed by "sovereigns and statesmen." This, though hardly a true statement now, would have been a much truer one in the year 1859; and it is the special prerogative of "sovereigns and statesmen" to identify the crazy and perverse arrangements which at any time it may suit them to make, with the everlasting order of the universe. By the treaties of 1815 a brutal, unenlightened Austrian despotism had been set over some of the fairest provinces of Italy; and, the thing having been done, the royal and diplomatic intellect could not conceive of an Italy existing otherwise than in this bleeding and manacled condition. The proneness of the Italian to conspire against the Austrian and thrust him from Italian soil was set down not to the character of Austrian rule, but to the innate depravity of the Italian people. It was argued that the cruel and alien despotism which produced occasional excesses was, in fact, the only power which could restrain those excesses within tolerable limits. The royal and diplomatic mind could not conceive the notion of imperfection as inherent in any arrangement which had received the seal of its august sanction; and, therefore, the troubled state of Italy was obviously due to the Italian character and not to the treaties of 1815. The countrymen of Dante were worthy of no better fate than to be the slaves of an Austrian bureaucracy; the land which could produce a Cavour, a D'Azeglio, a Manin, a Garibaldi, and a Mazzini was, according to the diplomatic theory, peopled by a horde of wild revolutionists and cowardly assassins. The consequence was that when the late Emperor of the French announced his determination to liberate Italy "from the Alps to the Adriatic" sovereigns and statesmen all over Europe were cast into a condition of extreme consternation. Mrs. Browning described their sensations in one of her later poems:

> "Then sovereigns, statesmen, north and south,
> Rose up in wrath and fear,
> And cried, protesting by one mouth,
> 'What monster have we here?
> A great Deed at this hour of day?
> A great just deed—and not for pay?
> Absurd, or insincere.
>
> "'And if sincere, the heavier blow
> In that case we shall bear,
> For where's our blessed 'status quo,'
> Our holy treaties, where—
> Our rights to sell a race, or buy,
> Protect and pillage, occupy,
> And civilize despair?'"

A Tory Cabinet, with the late Earl of Derby as Prime Minister and Lord Malmesbury as Foreign Secretary, then held office in England. The proposed expulsion of the Austrians from Italy moved the British Tories with the same righteous and humane indignation as, in later days, the proposed expulsion of the Turk from Southeastern Europe. They strove desperately to preserve humanity from the effects of such a catastrophe; but in vain. War broke out, and the feeling in Great Britain compelled them to issue a proclamation of neutrality; but this neutrality, it was understood in Europe, was subject to certain conditions. The war must remain "localized." If it extended beyond the boundaries of Italy—in other words, if the Hungarians, under the instigation of the French Emperor, recommenced the struggle for their independence, which the intervention of Czar Nicholas had compelled them to relinquish in 1849—then it was expected that the British Cabinet would exchange their neutral policy for one of active intervention in the interests of Austria. Out of the expectation of such intervention arose the leading incident which is set forth in these 'Memories.'

Louis Napoleon prefaced his Italian campaign with the announcement that Italy was to be liberated "from the Alps to the Adriatic." A rising in Hungary was one of the means by which he hoped to accomplish this programme, and, with this object in view, he opened negotiations with Louis Kossuth and other Hungarian exiles at that time residing in London. Kossuth was willing to enter into his project, but only on certain well-defined conditions.

"My view of the matter," he writes, "was always this, that what is permissible and may even be judicious in the case of a nation rising merely to change the form of its government, or to transform its internal organization, is neither judicious nor permissible when the end in view is national independence and delivery from foreign dominion. In the former case revolution does not really mean war. It is but an internal contest, in which the people are confronted only by governmental power; and such a revolution has in more than one instance been decided by a few days' fighting in the streets. But in the latter case revolution is a real war against a foreign enemy, whose centre of power cannot be reached in the country because he has at his disposal armies and resources outside the country. Such a war cannot be decided by fighting from behind barricades. In this case activity of patriotism must confine itself to keeping alive the aspirations for independence, and to taking care that the nation may be in readiness to seize such an opportunity for the realization of its aspirations as will make the probabilities of success, according to human calculation, depend solely upon the will of the people. . . . To organize local outbreaks is a political error by which no reasonable purpose can be gained; and from a moral point of view it is to be condemned, for it unnecessarily compromises those who are ready for sacrifice, and the lives of such should not be risked in vain. These views served to guide me under all circumstances since I became a refugee, and from them I have never swerved."

In consistency with these convictions, before accepting the overtures of the French Emperor, Kossuth insisted upon knowing the precise character of the offers he had to make.

"We want," he told Prince Napoleon, "a material guarantee that the instigating of Hungary to insurrection is not solely intended to make a diversion in order to weaken Austria's force in Italy, and thereby to facilitate victory in that country; we want a guarantee that the Emperor and King Victor Emmanuel look upon the independence of Hungary as an object of this war co-ordinate with the object of Italy. . . . We want an assurance that if Hungary takes up arms against Austria on this understanding she will not be left in the lurch, and that in case of victory no peace shall be concluded with regard to Italy without Hungary being liberated from the rule of Austria and made an independent state."

On all these points the Emperor professed his willingness to give such assurances, material or otherwise, as Kossuth considered to be satisfactory. But England was an obstacle in the path which had first to be removed.

"To extend the war so far," such were the words in which, according to Kossuth, the Emperor addressed him in reference to this matter, "would mean to strike out for ever the Austrian dynasty from the list of the Great Powers, and the English Government cling obstinately to that dynasty. The antiquated notion that the existence of the House of Hapsburg as a great power is essential to the maintenance of the European equilibrium, is one of the traditional maxims of English policy. I have reason to believe that England would even be capable of actually intervening against me, and that I cannot risk. Please take this into consideration."

Kossuth, to the profound amazement of the Emperor, undertook to remove this difficulty and obtain an assurance of the neutrality of Great Britain under all circumstances. He pointed out that while in the British House of Commons the Tories had a slight numerical superiority over the Whigs properly so called, there was an independent party—the "Manchester School"—which numbered no less than ninety, and which, by a coalition with the Whigs, could, whenever it pleased, drive the Tories from office. Kossuth undertook to proceed to England and bring about such a coalition on a basis of absolute non-intervention in the struggle between France and Austria, no matter to what portion of the latter's territory the war might extend. This undertaking he seems to have accomplished with equal dexterity and success. Kossuth's relations with Cobden and men of his political opinions were exceedingly intimate, because the doctrine of "non-intervention," which was the leading principle of the foreign policy, was that which Kossuth also relied upon for working out the independence of Hungary. Hungary was not independent because European intervention had stepped in to hinder her becoming so. To Mr. Gilpin, the member for Northampton and a leading Cobdenite, Kossuth made known, confidentially, the plans of the Emperor Napoleon and the fears he had of English intervention in case the war extended to Hungary. Mr. Gilpin, an intimate friend of Kossuth, and an ardent advocate of Hungarian independence, pledged his word to do all he could to bring about a coalition between his party and the Palmerstonian Whigs on a basis of rigid abstention from interference in the Continental war. Mr. Cobden was at this time travelling in the United States. Parliament assembled after the general elections of May, 1859, on the 7th of June; and Kossuth gives the following account of the overthrow of the Derby Ministry immediately after:

"My late lamented friend, Mr. Charles Gilpin, took the matter in hand. He was in constant communication with me, and once more conferred upon the conditions with the more influential members of his party, notably with Mr. John Bright, who, in the absence of Mr. Cobden, was the leader of the party, and, in accordance with their mutual agreement, he assured Lord Palmerston of the support of his party on these conditions:

"1. That the Tory Ministry should be overthrown expressly on a question affecting foreign politics.

"2. That Lord Palmerston, as well as Lord John Russell, and any other member of the future cabinet whose selection might have been already determined upon, should each address a separate letter to Mr. Gilpin binding themselves that the basis of their foreign policy would be the absolute neutrality of England, not only while the war is confined to Italy, but also in case it should extend from the Po to the banks of the Danube and Theiss.

"3. That in order to ensure this neutrality two members of the future Ministry should be chosen from the party on whose behalf Mr. Gilpin was negotiating.

"Lord Palmerston accepted these conditions, and the next day he, as well as Lord John Russell and the other three members of the new Cabinet whose selection had already been decided upon, handed the letters referred to in the second point of the agreement to Mr. Gilpin (who immediately handed the originals of the letters to me, authorizing me to make discreet use of them, and more particularly to show them to the Emperor Napoleon); and Lord Palmerston also declared in his letter that, in conformity with the third condition, Messrs. Richard Cobden and Milner Gibson would be nominated members of the future Ministry."

In consequence of this alliance a vote of want of confidence was moved by Lord Hartington in the House of Commons, and after an animated debate was carried by a majority of 13. The Earl of Derby resigned and Lord Palmerston reigned in his stead.

"What," writes Kossuth, "the Emperor Napoleon had wished for had come to pass. England's neutrality was secured. The obstacle which stood in the way of the cause of my country's freedom being taken up had been removed. Thanks to the assistance of my English friends, I had redeemed my promise. . . . I left England on June 16."

The independence of Hungary was, unhappily, still far off. But we must reserve for another notice Kossuth's narrative of the part he played in the Italian campaign of 1859. It is full of interest.

MASSON'S MILTON.*

MR. MASSON has at last brought his life of Milton to a successful close, and gives us what we may without question pronounce one of the most important historical works of the day. Six thick octavo volumes, covering a period of history inferior to no other in interest and importance, would be a noble contribution to literature even if their author had more faults as a writer than he has. But even these faults he has mainly rid himself of in the progress of his work, and in the present volume they are hardly noticeable. We have not observed a single conspicuous case of the inelegant colloquialisms that characterized the earlier volumes; nor is the course of the narrative obscured in the same degree by irrelevant or, rather, unimportant detail.

Mr. Masson's method of depicting an epoch is admirable in conception, if defective in some details. It is very largely biographical; the historical narrative is made graphic and perspicuous by full portraitures of the personages concerned in them, so that we are, so far as is possible at so distant an epoch, made acquainted with the motives and personal inclinations that lay at the bottom of the events. Of course this method has its inconveniences: the narration is necessarily interrupted by it, and the attention distracted in the multiplicity of obscure names and incidents. But on the whole Mr. Masson manages this skilfully, and on the whole the result justifies his method. In one respect, however—and that the principal one—the result is unsatisfactory, and that for a reason inherent in the nature of things. The history of the time and the life of Milton are told in two sets of chapters, which are kept wholly distinct from one another. You read first a history of Clarendon's administration, then a literary history of the same period, and then a life of Milton during these years. Of course this is the right order, and of course this is the only way in which the life of a literary man can be "narrated in connection with the political, ecclesiastical, and literary history of his time"; when we come to the events of Milton's life we go over again the same years and with constant reference to the events which we have just gone over twice before. The method is cumbersome, causing constant breaks in the main narration, and often confusing the reader by the necessity of going backward and forward, and touching upon events out of the order of their occurrence. Still, we do not know how this could have been avoided.

We think that the best part of the present volume is the chapters which contain the literary history. These form, as it were, a connecting link between the historical and the biographical chapters, and it is here that Milton's place in his generation belongs. For, however close his relation to political circles in the earlier period, in this period, at any rate, it is only as a literary man that he interests us. The literary history of the "Restoration" is treated elaborately, with the careful comparison of dates and grouping of names that are so distinctive a characteristic of this work, and as a result we have a picture of this period which is probably unequalled. Taken in connection with the equally elaborate analysis of the government and political history, the account of these fifteen years needs only more court gossip and more detail of "manners and customs" (both of which can well be spared), joined with a higher capacity of combination and description, to make this a very complete view of the Restoration period. Mr. Masson's estimate of the literature of the Restoration as such is not high. He first takes up the list of authors now flourishing, and shows by an elaborate study of their ages and their works that most of them can in no sense be called the creation of this period—the work, by the way, which Mr. Buckle did for the age of Louis XIV., and which might be done equally well for the age of Augustus.

"The best of old Hobbes," he says (p. 322), "the best of Sanderson, nearly all Wither, all Herrick, nearly all Bramhall, the best of Izaak Walton, all Brian Walton, the best of Howell, the best of Shirley, the whole of Fuller, a great deal of Waller, all Browne of Norwich, nearly all of Jeremy Taylor, the best of Dr. Henry More, a full half of Baxter and Owen, much of Wilkins and Wallis, nearly the whole of Denham, the best of Cowley, the best of Henry Stubbe, and at least the fully announced beginnings of a number more lie chronologically on the other side of the Restoration. Jeremy Taylor the bishop belongs to the Restoration, but the Jeremy Taylor of English literature belongs to the twenty years of the Civil Wars, the Republican Government of the Rump, and the sovereignty of Cromwell."

He next proceeds to examine the Registers of the Stationers' Company of London, in which all new publications should by law be registered; and, after showing that "under a government like Clarendon's . . . the possibility of clandestine publication must have been reduced to a minimum," adds (p. 324): "Here, certainly, is no proof of fresh outburst and abundance after the Restoration, but rather of arrest and paralysis." Of the seven years before the Restoration, the largest number of registrations in one year is 562, the smallest, 181; of the seven years after the Restoration, the largest number is 141, the smallest 58 (in the two years of the Plague).

An interesting passage is that, in connection with the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, in which the question is raised, How did Milton escape being on the excepted list? Perhaps Mr. Masson exaggerates Milton's prominence as a politician; still, there is no doubt that men far less prominent than he were honored by being placed upon the list, and Mr. Masson shows at considerable length that Milton was not overlooked, that he was pursued by Prynne and others with great bitterness, that he barely escaped by a curious combination of circumstances, and that he kept himself in hiding for several months until the danger had passed. The author of 'Eikonoklastes' was too determined an opponent of Charles I. not to run the risk of being classed as a regicide. His biographer, after a detailed narration of the whole series of events, and a statement of the influences at work for and against him, comes to the conclusion "that Milton's escape was the result of a powerful organization in his behalf, uniting a number of influences, and most skilfully and cunningly conducted (p. 187)." The thing was managed, he thinks, by Marvell and Davenant, and Hyde "must have given his consent to the proposal that Milton should be spared."

Among other literary men of the time considerable space (sixteen pages, pp. 423 to 439) is given to Bishop Gauden, whom Mr. Masson accepts without question as the author of 'Eikon Basilike.' We are not ready to form a judgment upon a literary controversy hardly less hotly disputed than the authorship of Junius's letters; but we cannot help feeling that the matter is by no means so certain as Mr. Masson considers it, and that, so far as we can see, he has the judgment of the most competent authorities against him. Opinion appears to be settling in favor of the king's authorship. In the strictly historical portions of the volume there is no part more valuable than the account of the anti-Catholic reaction called out by the secret Treaty of Dover and the Declaration of Indulgence of 1672. This has, moreover, a close relation to Milton's political career, as it brought him back for a moment into his old work of political pamphleteering, in his short treatise of 1673, entitled 'Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, Toleration, and the Growth of Popery.' In connection with this we have (p. 587) an entertaining account of the relation of the Quakers to the acts of tolerance and intolerance:

* 'The Life of John Milton: narrated in connection with the political, ecclesiastical, and literary history of his time. By David Masson, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh.' Vol. vi., 1660–1674. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880. 8vo, pp. 840.

"It was their boast that their worship, from its very nature, could not be stopped 'by men or devils.' From a meeting of Roman Catholics, they said, you have but to take away the mass-book, or the chalice, or the priest's garments, or even but to spill the water and blow out the candles, and the meeting is over. So, in a meeting of Lutherans or Episcopalians, or in a meeting of Presbyterians, or Independents, or Baptists, or Socinians, there is always some implement or set of implements upon which all depends, be it the liturgy, the gown or surplice, the Bible, or the hour-glass; remove these and make noise enough and there can be no service. Not so with a Quaker meeting. These men and women worship with their hearts and without implements, in silence as well as by speech. You may break in upon them, hoot at them, roar at them, drag them about, the meeting—if it is of any size—essentially still goes on till all the component individuals are murdered. Throw them out at the door in twos and threes, and they but re-enter at the window and quietly resume their places. Pull their meeting-house down, and they reassemble next day most punctually amid the broken walls and rafters. Shovel sand or earth down upon them and there they still sit, a sight to see, musing immovably among the rubbish. This is no description from fancy; it was the actual practice of the Quakers all over the country."

This was utterly baffling to the authorities, and no less so the position taken by the Quakers, alone among Nonconformists, towards the Roman Catholics. Other Nonconformists were suspicious of the Declaration of Indulgence. "Only the Quakers were thoroughly thankful, regarding the refusal of the boon because it came from prerogative as an excess of constitutional scruple, and seeing no reason, in their simple theory, why toleration should not include the Roman Catholics."

The last twenty-three pages of the volume are devoted to Milton's posthumous treatise 'Of Christian Doctrine,' discovered in 1823, in which he takes a strongly Arian, Arminian, and anti-Sabbatarian position. There has been some controversy as to whether this was an early or a late work of the author, but Mr. Masson has no difficulty in proving—and, indeed, it is a self-evident fact—that it belonged to the last years of his life. With regard to this work he uses the following words, with which the volume ends:

"It would be a mistake to say of Milton, on any of these accounts, or on account of his anti-Sabbatarianism and Latitudinarianism generally, or on account of the extreme boldness and heterodoxy of some of his speculations, that he did not belong most truly and properly to the great Puritan body of his countrymen. We have seen sufficiently in these pages what English Puritanism really was, through what phases it passed, what multiform varieties of thinking and of free-thinking it included. Only an unscholarly misconception of Puritanism, or total ignorance of the actual facts of its history, will ever seek, now or henceforward, to rob English Puritanism of Milton, or Milton of his title to be remembered as the genius of Puritan England."

Mr. Masson has done good service in showing that Milton was not without honor in his own generation. "The statement that it was these criticisms of Addison that first awoke the English nation to a sense of Milton's greatness ought to have been exploded long ago, and owes its continued vitality only to that inherent sheepishness of human nature which will persist in repeating everything whatever that has once been strongly said" (p. 787).

The book would be improved by cross-references (e.g., p. 177), especially where the events of the historical chapters are alluded to in the literary and biographical chapters. It is not always easy to turn at once to the passages referred to. On p. 505 the date June 16 must be January; and on p. 608 the date should read 1678–9.

RECENT NOVELS.*

'LA DÉGRINGOLADE' is by no means one of the best, though it is one of the longest and one of the most elaborate of Gaboriau's stories. It opens, of course, with a mystery—a midnight attack upon a young man by unknown assassins. This of itself is perhaps nothing out of the common way, but the young man no sooner recovers from his wounds than he receives an anonymous communication which directs him to follow a man whom he will meet at a ball wherever he leads. The man at the ball conducts him and his friend, Dr. Legris, to a cemetery, where at the dead of night they are witnesses of a singular transaction. A party of strangers scale the wall, a tomb is opened, a veiled lady, addressed as Madame La Duchesse, exclaims in tones of wild delirious joy, "Empty! the coffin is empty!" and the party thereupon retire. Raymond Delorge and Dr. Legris examine the stone, and find inscribed upon it, "Marie Sidonie. Died at the age of twenty-seven. Pray for her!" Neither of them knows of any person named Marie Sidonie, nor why Delorge should be supposed to be interested in ascertaining that her tomb is empty. This is the mystery, the key to which is kept back for about a thousand pages. Not till the very end of the novel do we discover that Marie Sidonie is the name of the wife of the wicked De Combelaine, who the day before the Coup d'état of 1852 foully murdered Raymond's father, the valliant General Delorge, in the garden of the Élysée. The sole witness of this murder was Laurent Cornevin, who received the victim's last words and a written message to his wife. When we find in 1869 that the son of the general loves the beautiful Simone de Maillefert, and is loved in return, and that De Combelaine has contrived an iniquitous intrigue to force her to marry him to save the honor of her family, we feel pretty sure that the plot will be defeated; and so it is in the end foiled by the excellent Cornevin, who, after years of exile, has returned to Paris in time to avenge the general. The marriage is to take place on Tuesday morning, and the only thing that prevents its taking place is the sudden announcement by Cornevin that De Combelaine has another wife living, Marie Sidonie by name, supposed to have been buried in the Cimetière du Nord. This furnishes the clue to the grave-opening scene. The astute Cornevin desired to have the Duchesse de Maillefert and Raymond as witnesses of the fact that the tomb was empty. The secret is well kept, but the truth is that it is not sufficiently connected with the main plot of the book to interest the reader very much. The long interval between the scene in the cemetery and the final revelation of the identity of Marie Sidonie is occupied with a story which has not on the surface the faintest possible connection with her, and the consequence is that the scene is nearly forgotten when the explanation comes. Still the book is remarkable for the characteristic ingenuity with which the many threads of the plot are managed by the author.

Anything from Mr. Hardy's pen, however slight, is worth reading; 'Fellow-Townsmen' is very slight indeed, but it has unquestionable literary importance as stories short and long go. There is little that is dramatic in it, which is unusual, and the women are rather shadowy, which is still more so; but there is the same insistence upon the irony of fate, and the same intimation that if you let things take their course in this world (and whether you do or not they will be pretty sure to take it) they will turn out sadly and impotently, but in general bearably—or at least that this happens oftener than other novelists are apt to think. How different this is from the moral of the agonizing novel no one needs to be told; and all that we have to say concerning Mr. Hardy's latest statement of it is that he should be increasingly careful about so preparing his mechanism that his moral may appear spontaneous, and not as if it had become a cherished notion of the author's.

To any one who knows only the pessimist novels of Alphonse Daudet the bit of extravagance which narrates the prodigious adventures of Tartarin of Tarascon will be a surprise, perhaps, but it is marked by the same literary finish of manner and the same delicate perception of character. The points to notice about it are the sensitive tact which prevents the fun with which it is brimming from becoming hilarity, and saves the ludicrousness of its hero from contempt or pity; in these respects (it is a great deal to say, but it is scarcely exaggeration) it suggests its inspiration—'Don Quixote.' Tartarin is two men, Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, in one, and they naturally pull in different directions. He is the great man of Tarascon, the greatest "cap-hunter"—in the absence of game the Tarasconians shot at their caps—the greatest singer, and the authority on all subjects. He has never travelled, but once thought of going to Shanghai, and talked so much of it that

"—— in sooth at length the brave man was not very sure that he had not gone to Shanghai.

"But then your Tartarin was merely a dreadful liar?

"No! a thousand times no! Tartarin was no liar.

"Ah! the only liar in the South, if any there be, is the sun; everything he touches he exaggerates. What was Sparta in the days of her splendor? A village. What was Athens? At best a subprefecture. And yet in history they appear to us like enormous cities. See what the sun has made of them!'

'Mrs. Beauchamp Brown' contains enough material for a dozen ordinary novels, but barely saves itself from commonplace by a flashiness which will only prove "exciting" on summer-hotel piazzas, we judge and trust. In the opening chapters the heroine, a rich young lady, admired and a coquette, rejects the addresses of the Hon. Mr. Forsyth, newly-appointed American Minister to Spain, and, to escape from a world that offers no other excitement to a pretty woman, plans with her aunt, Mrs. Beauchamp Brown, and two younger nieces of the latter, a summer campaign in the wilds of a Maine village. Fate interposes with the masculine element, and she finds herself on arrival provided with a lover in the person of a rejected admirer, who has come there to get over the opium-habit and the effects of her coldness, and with a deadly rival in his sister; Forsyth is also promptly on hand to try his luck again; and she rescues from drowning and nurses back to life still another lover, who proves to be a ritualist clergyman and the conquering hero. Enter here another clergyman with celibate views, and a Catholic (Roman) priest as bear-leader to an English lord, who travels incognito as Mr. Smith and falls in love with one of the younger girls. She is further presented with two Harvard students of sensibility, and a third student is given to the remaining niece. To these constantly shifting couples Mrs. Beauchamp Brown plays propriety with much dignity in general, but with some serious and inexplicable lapses, during which she is liable to make stale jests of questionable taste, to talk of "del. tre.," and address the Harvard students with an "I say." The action covers the Maine village, Boston, and New York, the troop of lovers following from place to place their several load-stars. There are three attempts at murder by a madman, a fire, a hint at some priestcraft, dark plotting by the malicious rival, small-pox for the wicked and varioloid for the innocent, Sisters of Charity as nurses; and the outcome is the founding of a church and three weddings. The style is alternately flippant and encyclopædic, and the view of life is from the point of profound inexperience illuminated by sensational novels.

An almost entire and therefore refreshing contrast is afforded in 'Christy Carew,' which is a quiet and simple Irish story, told with much native wit and a true Celtic flavor; e.g., "There's elegant drowning at the end of the pier, Master Lanty, if you'd only consider it," is the remark of an exasperated nurse to a veritable enfant terrible about to "go fishing" thither. The characters are well distinguished and set forth with much ease, evidently from life in many cases, and though the book is too long and the author neglects the elementary maxim that all episodes should conduce to the general action, and though we must regard as premature the judgment of an admiring critic who thinks her the successor of "George Eliot," we can cordially commend the book as more interesting and decidedly abler than its class.

'Second Thoughts' is a disappointment; it is more sensible and therefore less characteristic than its predecessors; there is no heart-breaking sequel to a life begun buoyantly; no harrowing struggles between ardent love and respect for the marriage-laws of Great Britain. Everything, in fact, is surprisingly tame. The writing of tame stories, however, it need not be said, is so far from being Miss Broughton's forte that it is the opposite of it, and the three stories she has now given us since 'Goodbye, Sweetheart' indicate as clearly as the predecessors of that tale did that her genius then reached its culmination of merit. Every one who knows how rare good examples of the novel of passion are, and who recalls how good a specimen of it 'Goodbye, Sweetheart' was, will regret this.

In 'Dr. Heidenhoff's Process' Mr. Bellamy has wasted upon an ingenious but whimsical metaphysical notion, according to which a man's moral responsibility depends upon his identity and that in turn upon his memory, some unusually good work. The first scene of his novelette is worthy of a recognized expert in realistic fiction, and in style it is singularly felicitous for a writer so inexperienced as we judge Mr. Bellamy to be. Where, later on, he comes to deal with passion, to deal successfully with which imaginativeness is demanded as well as observation, he betrays an immaturity which such a scene as that of the prayer-meeting and such a character-analysis as that of George Bailey belie, and which they indicate is curable; it is a good or bad sign according to the point of view, but it is apparently true of Mr. Bellamy, that part of his failure to be impressive is due to his failure to conceive his task seriously enough.

About the experience of the author of 'Her Ladyship' there is possibly less doubt than of his genius, but his book may be called a fair instance of what would be meant by the phrase, "the Ohio novel." A Southern girl at a New York boarding-school falls in love with a Columbia student, whom she sees from her window and whose name she only gathers from the initials on his trunk as it is ruthlessly borne away from her sight. Four years later a Union officer walks into a Virginia bank where a dazzlingly beautiful young girl has fallen asleep. As he bends over her she awakens, and, throwing her arms around his neck, exclaims, with the direct trustfulness of girlhood: "I knew you would come back to me, my darling! my dear R. A. from Toledo." This is perhaps the pearl of the story, but much of the rest, which is bathed in the romantic sentiment now become almost peculiar to Southern and border literature, is nearly as good.

'Alva Vine' is written with a loftier purpose, but is even more entertaining; it is designed to supply an adequate study of "a suggestive woman of this Republic." Alva possesses a wonderful voice, which she wishes to cultivate for the stage, writes for the papers, and captivates a man whose views of woman's sphere are nevertheless narrow. She proceeds to travel in Europe, where she rebukes superstition in Catholic countries; instructs statesmen; declines court presentation because she "appreciates a man or woman for what they are and not for what they have"; and delights Bright, Thackeray, and Buckle (A.D. 1867) with her conversational brilliancy, as might be inferred from her remark that Mozart's music "touches the affectuous part of the mind more than the intellectual." She finally returns and marries her adorer, though it is hinted that many equally brilliant women are crushed by "the deadweight of a husband," finding themselves superior to whom wifely duty dictates a "continuous watch" lest they "overshadow" him. The four illustrations are as unaccountable as the text, to which they have no relation. To the reader who can get no amusement from the book it may serve to show how wide is the range of writing that can somehow get printed.

'The Verdendorps,' the preface announces, is a work of pure fiction. "It will be as fallacious to consider either in the light of pure analogues as it is, to many minds, fallacious to consider the general question of special creations in the light of supposed analogues." This, if we catch its drift, obscures the design of the author in spelling his title with a "V," otherwise tolerably plain to New-Yorkers from the story itself, which is something as follows: Basilius Verdendorp, an uneducated but shrewd and resolute man, acquires an enormous fortune, controls legislatures, and owns thousands of miles of railroads. His eldest son, Richard, desires to "control" him and gain possession of his estate. This unnatural crime he accomplishes by means of a couple of adventuresses, May Craven, an irregularly divorced woman, and her mother, the former of whom Richard induces his father to marry. He then alienates "the old man's" affections from his other son, Basil, by reports of Basil's misconduct, of which he has informed himself through a detective. After this it is easy for him to supplant his sisters. "The old man" dies, leaving a will in favor of Richard, with small legacies to his daughters and to Basil, the property of the latter to be held by Richard as trustee. There is a report of the funeral sermon by the pastor to whom he had given a church, a description of the autopsy, and, finally, a long contest over the will by Basil and his sister, Mrs. Latour. Richard gains the case and Basil shoots him, is tried for murder and acquitted. Mure Street plays havoc with the Verdendorp property, and poetic justice is generally and summarily executed. The author, it is needless to add, is Basil himself, but he does not explain his motive in writing the book.

'Magnum Bonum' adds 661 more pages to the Yonge literature, whose characteristics are so well known that they do not need to be particularized as here freshly displayed; and certainly no one who read 'The Heir of Redclyffe' before his (or her) days of algebra and the Latin primer would consent to say anything ill of them. As its alternate title may denote, this latest story of this amiable author is mainly about children—perhaps more so than usual; but it may be read by adults with safety.

From the two optimistic idyls, 'Marcella' and 'Esfira,' it might fairly be inferred that Russia was the true home of romantic devotion of the rich to the poor, but we prefer the inference that they are of value as romance solely. The old story of King Cophetua is the basis of each, and the two together make a volume to be read in an hour and forgotten.

Henry Gréville's latest novel, contributed to "Juliette Lamber's" Nouvelle Revue, is about divorce, which it favors by implication, but it is not much either of an indirect argument or a novel, and will tend to confirm the suspicion that the author has written herself out.

Hints on Advocacy, intended for Practice in any of the Courts. By an English Barrister. Revised and adapted from the second English edition by an American lawyer. (St. Louis, Mo.: William H. Stevenson. 1880.)—This book will be found of considerable value to young lawyers, and contains a good deal of information on a subject which many persons not lawyers are interested in. It covers a different field from that treated in books on rhetoric. These, of course, are of use to any one whose business it is to employ the arts of persuasion; but writers on rhetoric continually forget that the greater part of a lawyer's work does not consist in making speeches, but in bringing out the facts of the case, by examination and cross-examination, in such a way as to produce a desired effect upon the minds of the jury. many reasons, which we have never seen thoroughly explained, the old-fashioned method of haranguing juries, of making direct appeals to their sympathies or prejudices, has almost altogether disappeared from reputable practice in England and America, and rhetorical practices which early in this century were regarded as perfectly legitimate are now looked upon as disgraceful. Much as has been said about the ignorance of juries, we cannot help believing that the jurymen of to-day are both more intelligent and more sceptical than their grandfathers. A juryman fifty years ago was not a reading man; now he almost invariably reads at least the newspapers, and although this may not make him an impartial or fair-minded man, it makes him infinitely more a man of the world than his predecessor. He is familiar with many things, he has a theory of life and man formed not only by his own experience but also by that sort of half-liberal education now furnished everybody by the press. Besides all this, the jury is not nearly so irresponsible a body as it was fifty, and still more a hundred, years ago. It is governed by rules as fixed and rigid as those which govern courts; its passions and excesses are much more carefully watched over and guarded against than they formerly were. The exact limit between law and fact is every day being more carefully defined. It must be remembered, moreover, that the jury is not, as it was in a multitude of cases early in this century, the only barrier between the liberty of the subject and the tyranny of the executive. It has long since ceased to be an every-day affair for the reputation and liberty and life of respectable men to be protected from the assaults of irresponsible power solely by the sympathy of a jury. All these causes have contributed to make old-fashioned oratory seem out of place in a modern court.

It has followed from this that the modern art of advocacy is much more the art of presenting evidence well than of making speeches. The greatest lawyers of to-day have made their success chiefly by a mastery of this art—an art which involves a knowledge of all the resources of oratory, and a good deal more besides. The author of this book gives an analysis of Sir A. Cockburn's opening in the trial of the poisoner Palmer as an instance of a masterpiece of advocacy, and it is undoubtedly a memorable instance; and yet there is not a trace of passion or feeling in it. Its effect lies in the absence of anything of the kind. It may seem to any one not versed in the subject that opening a case is a simple matter. Yet there is nothing which is so often mismanaged, and there is perhaps no faculty more rare than that of clear oral statement, even among practising lawyers. But the statement of a case is not so difficult as the examination of witnesses, nor the examination so difficult as the cross-examination. There is no change which has come over legal practice greater than that relating to cross-examination. The popular theory about cross-examination which has been handed down to us from a former generation is, that it is a sort of right which each side has to torture the witnesses of the other; the screws and the boot being applied by the legal inquisitor, while the jury listen eagerly for any admissions of perjury or misrepresentation which may fall from the victim. Cross-examination, as practised by a skilful modern advocate, is a very different thing from this. Its chief maxim is, first to cross-examine as little as possible, and, second, to make the character of the cross-examination depend upon the character of the witness. There are as many different kinds of witnesses in the world as there are different kinds of men and women, and any attempt at a complete classification would be useless. The author of the book before us mentions several classes, as the reluctant witness, the hesitating witness, the flippant witness, and the lying witness, and gives some excellent examples of the dangers to be met with in dealing with them. But human nature is infinite in its variety, and no rules or descriptions given in books will ever make up for want of knowledge of men. Even this will not always answer. Of all American lawyers Choate has the reputation of having been the best trier of cases; yet if the story of the answer of the witness who had scuttled the ship is true, he was capable of making serious errors. The suit was on a marine policy of insurance, and Choate represented the plaintiff. The defence was that the vessel had been scuttled. The witness had testified for the defence that he had himself been engaged in the scuttling. In the course of the examination it came out that he had been much urged by the captain to join in the plot, and that the latter had used some convincing argument to which he had yielded. Being pressed to state what this was, he showed great reluctance; but on Choate's insisting that the language should be repeated, he stated that the captain had urged him to join on the ground that if they were detected and the worst came to the worst, they must be tried in Boston, and that "Choate would get them off." Choate was here committing a very elementary fault—that of pressing a reluctant witness. A beginner at cross-examination has almost an irresistible inclination to do this, probably from the feeling that the witness's reluctance to testify arises from the fact that what he is keeping back may be unfavorable to his side of the case. But experience shows that the reluctance may come from a great variety of causes; and, as the cross-examiner cannot tell in advance what the real source of it is, he is much safer in not pressing for an answer when he is not at all clear that it may not injure him. Indeed, the art of cross-examination may be said to consist in extracting from a hostile witness everything as to which you have reason to believe in advance that he must testify in your favor.

With regard to the duties of advocacy the author of these 'Hints' makes some suggestions in criticism of Lord Brougham's famous declaration which have the merit of being original reflections on a very old topic. Lord Brougham's words were that it was part of the "sacred duty" of the advocate to disregard "the alarm, the suffering, the torment, the destruction which he may bring upon any others. Nay, separating even the duties of a patriot from those of an advocate, he must go on, reckless of the consequences, if his fate should be to involve his country in confusion for his client." The author of this manual points out that an advocate can hardly claim a higher privilege than his client were he defending his own cause, and adds the extremely practical suggestion that an advocate who casts destruction broadcast may involve his client too in the general ruin, and "is sure, in any event, to injure him in the estimation of the jury."

Amateur Theatricals. By Walter Herries Pollock and Lady Pollock. [Art at Home Series.] (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1879. Crown 8vo, 71 pp.)—Lady Pollock has contributed to the English reviews various interesting papers on different phases of histrionic art. Mr. Pollock, who is the author of a volume of lectures on some of the later French poets, is also a careful student of the French stage, and published in Paris in 1878 a little book on the chief performers of the Comédie-Française. From the collaboration of two such writers one might reasonably expect a handbook of amateur acting of permanent value; nor is this expectation balked. It may be said at once that the book before us is an admirable manual, full of sound knowledge and wise suggestions. Its advice is altogether practical and obviously the result of experience. The hints thrown out for inexperienced actors are just what the amateur needs but does not seek, and the instruction he will gain is not the less effective from the urbanity with which it is given.

We know of no guide to private theatricals which contains so much fresh matter as this. Indeed, the effort to leave the beaten track has led to the introduction at odd intervals of illustrative citations from the history of private performances, from the actual acting of "Comus," written by John Milton for a band of amateur actors, to the fictitious representations in Miss Austen's 'Mansfield Park' and Miss Edgeworth's 'Patronage.' In the latter novel the spectators ask "if there is to be any clapping of hands?" In explanation of which request for information Miss Edgeworth tells us "that at some private theatres loud demonstrations of applause were forbidden. It was thought more genteel to approve and admire in silence, thus to draw the line between professional actors and actresses and gentlemen and lady performers." This is a characteristic custom which one is not surprised to find obtaining among the English gentry of fourscore years ago. Miss Edgeworth's comment on it is a good specimen of Irish wit: "Upon trial, however, in some instances, it had been found that the difference was sufficiently obvious without marking it by any invidious distinction."

Such extracts as the authors of this little volume make from the unwritten history of private theatricals are always amusing in themselves and pertinent to the instructive intent of the book. Of the histrionic advice perhaps the most valuable portion is an account of M. Delaunay's method of instructing his class at the Conservatory. We have heard before of Mr. Pollock as a friend of M. Delaunay's. This fine actor, besides practising his art at the Théâtre-Français, teaches it at the Conservatory to those who may one day succeed him in the honorable office of upholding the traditions of the House of Molière. The remarks on mounting an amateur piece are excellent and may save much trouble; following Mr. Pollock's advice may greatly shorten the Course of Time. It is suggested that in regard to scenery it is "perhaps best to recur to the method in vogue on the public stage in Shakspere's time, and indicate the change of scene by placards." To do this is but to rely on a primitive convention instead of the more elaborate modern convention—for convention it is, more or less like reality, in either case; and an audience will accept any convention frankly offered to them. The illustrations do not in any exact sense illustrate the book. One is a picture of the stage in Shakspere's day. The others are quaint and pretty little drawings by Miss Kate Greenaway, to whose pencil we owe the delightful 'Under the Window.'

Principles and Portraits. By C. A. Bartol. (Boston: Roberts Bros. 1880.)—We have never heard Dr. Bartol preach, but after having examined the eleven "principles" and six "portraits"—all sermon-like, if not all sermons—of this volume of nearly five hundred pages, we feel disposed to apply to it Jefferson's criticism on Patrick Henry:

"Although it was difficult when he had spoken to tell what he had said, yet, while he was speaking, it always seemed directly to the point. When he had spoken in opposition to my opinion, had produced a great effect, and I myself been highly delighted and moved, I have asked myself when he ceased: 'What the d—l has he said?'" (Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster, p. 367).

This failure to make a distinct impression, to offer something tangible for reflection or argument, as the result of an hour's discourse, is precisely the characteristic of Dr. Bartol's style as displayed here. But the father of this sort of pulpit oratory is not Patrick Henry but Emerson. We will not affront Dr. Bartol by classing him among the more or less conscious imitators of the author of the Address to the Cambridge Divinity School in July, 1838, the Monadnock secret of whose eloquence has seemed to so many ministerial candidates within their grasp. Sentences like these, again, which abound in Dr. Bartol's pages, may be denied an Emersonian quality: (p. 317) "Benjamin Paul Blood says we learn more as we come to after anæsthesia than from Fichte or Hegel. But Shakspeare dwelt in the land of surprise, and was coming to all the time"; (p. 342) "It will soon be thirty-seven years since the subject of this essay died, or disappeared. But I observe, after longer lapses of time, the figures walk down from their frames in our parlors or in Faneuil Hall for every new crisis of action or thought." Still, conceding the writer's individuality, these chapters form beyond question a part of the literature of Concord Transcendentalism, both in their doctrine and their rhetorical expression. Of their doctrine we shall say nothing, because the field is too broad, and of the vehicle in which it is conveyed we shall say no more than we began by saying, except that it seems more appropriately used in a portraiture of Weiss than of Channing. Indeed, we regard the analysis of the former as much the best in the volume, though it will hardly propitiate his admirers. A praiseworthy candor shines through all Dr. Bartol's judgments of his personal friends. His intimacy with Weiss, Channing, Bushnell, and Hunt the artist gives a special weight and value to their portraits; of Garrison he could speak less at first hand. In treating of the personality of Shakspere he has no advantage, that we can perceive, over his predecessors.

Oxford: Brief Historical and Descriptive Notes. By Andrew Lang. With etchings and vignettes by Brunet-Debaines, Toussaint, and Kent Thomas. (London: Seeley, Jackson & Halliday. 1880.)—Such of our readers as are not deterred by a comparatively high price will derive much entertainment from Mr. Lang's work. The author's reverential affection for his alma mater, although strong and abiding, does not blind him to her imperfections. He has endeavored to convey truthfully his impressions of Oxford, past and present, in a series of brief sketches, arranged by epochs. In writing of this character the tone is, of course, everything. We do not look to an album in black-and-white for minute scholarship or for philosophic continuity. We can apply to the author this test only: Has he made us feel for a brief space that we are living over again some of the joys and trials, the academic unrest and abandon, of the generations that have passed or are passing? Tried by this test, Mr. Lang has succeeded abundantly. In his chapter on the Renaissance and the Reformation, for instance, or his High-Tory Oxford, or his Poets at Oxford (Shelley and Landor), we do not discover new facts and names, but we do catch the pulse of Oxford life and thought. We understand better than before how it is that the old University must make a lasting impression on the character of all who come within her sway. Stronger minds, like Johnson and Shelley, react healthfully; weaker ones lapse too often into conventionalism. Minds of an unpoetically radical turn, like Gibbon, turn away in impatience. Mr. Lang is not a doctrinaire; he has carefully banished from his book rancor and partisan invective. We suspect, indeed, that no one who is a dutiful and loving son of Oxford can be wholly bad in his eyes. The only person of whom he writes with evident bitterness is Gibbon, whose unpardonable offence is, not so much his 'Decline and Fall' as his pithy sneer: "To the University of Oxford I acknowledge no obligations, and she will as cheerfully renounce me for a son as I am willing to disclaim her for a mother." Without involving ourselves in a defence of Gibbon, may we not ask Mr. Lang if Oxford of the eighteenth century was anything more than an overgrown school? The contrast between its Pharisaism and inertia and the glorious promises held out by the German universities, is an unpleasant chapter in the history of English thought. The diligent observer of Goethe's life knows full well that Leipzig and Jena were anything but models. Yet, with all their blundering crudeness, they strove at least onward and upward, whereas Oxford was intellectually dead. The breath of resuscitation came, not from within but from without, from the great Revolution and the Napoleonic wars.

The concluding chapters, "A General View" and "Undergraduate Life," are full of interest. Mr. Lang, without indulging in epigrammatic wit, is clear and concise. His brief allusions to Evangelicalism, the Tractarian Movement, and Liberalism are fairly proportioned to the limits of his book. The outlook of Oxford study appears to him still obscure. On the one hand he is evidently no friend to "cram" and the excessive strain of examinations on both pupils and teachers. On the other, he is sceptical as to the possibilities of "endowed research." We quite agree with him in the reflection that the obstacle to original research at Oxford does not lie so much in the want of men and means as in the unwillingness of Oxford tutors and fellows to sacrifice creature comforts to abstract and pecuniarily unprofitable study. As for the illustrations, they are what one should expect from the names of the artists: they are in good taste. The only objection that might be made to them is that they are perhaps more suggestive than explanatory. That is, they will recall Oxford life to the graduate better than they will present it to the stranger. Yet they are very pleasing to the eye, and in harmony with the spirit of the text.

A Complete Concordance to the Odyssey and Hymns of Homer. By Henry Dunbar, M.D., member of the General Council, University of Edinburgh. (New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.)—Students of Homer ought certainly to be thankful to Dr. Dunbar for this book. It gives under every word all the lines in which it occurs, quoted in full, with number of book and line. For the statistical method of study it is of great value. It shows at once how a given word is inflected in the 'Odyssey' and 'Hymns,' how its use is distributed over different books, what position in the line it has generally or always, etc. It is easy to sneer at all this sort of thing as "index-learning," but of course it is not so much the acquisition of such facts as the use made of them that shows scholarship. For such investigations this book offers a welcome aid, better in some respects than the old stand-by Seber. It is ungracious to find fault with such a work, especially from the hand of one who is not by profession a classical student, but we cannot help regretting that so much space was wasted by the method of printing in cases where the same line is repeated often in the poems. The room saved by condensation in those cases might well have been used to diminish the number of cases where but one line is quoted to represent a number in which a word occurs. The number of these latter cases is much larger than in Seber, including, for instance, αἰεί, αἶψα, αὖθι, αὖτως, ἄφαρ, ἦν, ὅθεν, ὁμῶς, τοίσδεσσι, τόφρα, ὑπέκ—the very class of words as to the Homeric use of which some student would seek full information. The proof-reading seems to have been very carefully done.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 8, 1880.

The Week.

THE "campaign stories" already begin to make their appearance with a certain luxuriance, but they are mostly about General Hancock. Senator Hoar recently held him up to odium as just the kind of man that is produced in profusion by the effete despotisms of the Old World —that is, an educated soldier, following soldiering as a profession, and unsuited to a republic like this. But unfortunately Mr. Hoar is himself, for similar reasons, a monarchical product, educated at the expense of his parents at a university, and passing in the study of dead men's writings the time which General Garfield passed in driving a mule on a tow-path. Kearney and his friends think Mr. Hoar as odious an excrescence in a republic as Mr. Hoar thinks General Hancock. Would it not be well, by the way, to leave the denunciation of men because they have been carefully trained in an honorable calling to Kearney and his kind? Is it possible that Senator Hoar thinks any real interest of a civilized community is helped by this sort of thing even in a Presidential campaign? It is also told of General Hancock that he invited General Beauregard to dinner, but the latter refused to come as long as the United States flag was flying over General Hancock's door, whereupon General Hancock promptly lowered it.

Mr. Boutwell has reappeared on the surface for the first time since the unhappy result of his "boom" at Chicago, and seems, in spite of his conviction of last spring that General Grant's election was necessary to save us all from ruin, to be reasonably cheerful and hopeful for a person naturally so pessimistic. He made a speech the other day at Lowell, Mass., which was interesting as indicating the line the Grant men mean to take in the canvass. It will probably surprise most people—but it is a good sign of the times—that the first point he took up was the danger to civil-service reform in case the Democrats come into power. To be sure, his own definition of civil-service reform is not very luminous, but it contains the acknowledgment that the "spoils" system is a bad one and ought to be abandoned. He denounces "competitive examination," "life tenures," "and courts of enquiry before removal," but would have no person appointed to office until he had passed "a satisfactory examination by an independent and competent board of examiners." This is a good deal of a concession from such a quarter. He shirked the silver question and the greenback question, and castigated the Democrats for their hostility to the national banks, so that his position about the currency is not as yet clearly ascertainable. He concluded with some energetic observations on his favorite theme—"the solid South" —showing that it means not only "the rule absolute of a minority of the fifteen old slave States, but the probability of a like absolute rule over the whole country." How a man of Mr. Boutwell's age can talk in this way when he knows that the census now being taken will probably reduce "the South" to complete insignificance both in the House of Representatives and in the Electoral College, is hard to understand. It is worthy of note that he did not once "wave the bloody shirt."

An effort has been made to keep Mr. Don Cameron in the Chairmanship of the Republican National Committee, but we are glad to see that he declines it. He does so in a very cold note from the White Sulphur Springs, where he is sojourning on account of his health, which he declares much broken down. He promises, however, "as far as his health will permit," "to do all he can to keep the Republican party in power." This is rather vague, and we doubt if he will do much. Mr. Conkling is said to be feeling poorly also, but has said he will do as much for the Republican ticket as the Administration does, meaning, we presume, that unless the President lets the officeholders loose for the canvass he will do nothing. We believe there is a good deal of sickness among all the Bosses, and they are likely to stick very close to the watering-places and mineral springs this summer. In other words, we are likely to witness during the next three months some illustrations of the remark we made not long ago, that a Bonapartist takes little interest in the affairs of his country if his own chief is not at the head of the government.

The Times, with a singular indifference to party harmony, continues to pursue Secretary Sherman with exposures of his little revenges for official disloyalty at Chicago. In South Carolina, according to one of its correspondents, "ex-Congressman 'Bob' Smalls, who deserted the Sherman colors before the Convention, has lost his lucrative appointment as Special Agent, while 'Bob' Elliot, who violated instructions to please his chief, has been advanced a grade, and now, it is said, receives eight dollars per day." Three hired Sherman boomsters have had to retire from the Charleston Custom-house, for no better reason, so far as we can make out, than because they are no longer needed. The Secretary's attempts to "get even" with Mr. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are next in order. Hitherto Mr. Raum has had the appointment of two or three score of employees engaged in the manufacture and handling of revenue stamps. Last week this was taken away from him and resumed by Mr. Sherman, who also issued a special notice that applications for the office of gauger, storekeeper, or inspector of tobacco in the internal-revenue service must hereafter be addressed directly to himself, and that no removals should be made by any one else. Finally, Mr. Sherman is held up as interfering with the patronage of another department, and seeking to remove a U. S. District-Attorney in Alabama, named Mayer, in favor of one Smith, who was "an ardent supporter of Secretary Sherman, and contested his way into the National Convention on the district idea," while Mayer was a prominent Grantite. Mayer refuses to recognize the former, on the ground that the Senate failed to act on his nomination, and that his temporary appointment during the recess was illegal, because no vacancy had "happened." Of course, in all this the Secretary from his point of view is simply "standing by his friends," and is entitled to all the advantage which he chances to possess over General Grant's "standing"—the lofty virtue of which can never be sufficiently commended.

The point raised by the recalcitrant district-attorney in Alabama is not a new one; but as often as it has been raised it has been decided in one way, and that adverse to the narrow interpretation of the clause of the Constitution empowering the President to make appointments during the recess of the Senate. It has just come up again in the case of ex-Governor Hartranft, whom the President nominated for the Philadelphia collectorship after the expiration of Collector Tutton's commission but during the session of the Senate. The Senate adjourned without taking action on the nomination, and before countersigning General Hartranft's commission Secretary Sherman appears pro forma to have consulted Attorney-General Devens as to the legality of it. Mr. Devens shows that the uniform construction by his predecessors of the phrase "all vacancies that may happen during the recess" has been that "may happen" is equivalent to "may happen to exist"—not necessarily to begin; and he quotes from a former opinion of Mr. Evarts, holding that the Tenure-of-Office Act seems to recognize this construction. He concludes, therefore, that the appointment in question is perfectly legitimate. The injury which might result to the public interests if an opposite conclusion were arrived at, almost precludes the need of argument.

President Hayes was present at the last Commencement at Yale College, and made, for him, a long speech, in which he brought to light some interesting facts with regard to the relations of his Administration to the college. He said that when puzzled, on taking office, as to the course he should pursue looking to the pacification of the South, he wrote to Dr. Woolsey for his advice, got it, and followed it implicitly. He also mentioned that he had offered the English Mission to President Porter, who had refused it, and spoke flatteringly of the fact that Mr. Clarence King, the head of the Geological Survey, and Professor Walker, the head of the Census, were Yale graduates, as also Mr.

Andrew D. White, the Minister at Berlin, and Mr. Putnam, the Minister in Belgium. Mr. Hayes could not have had a better adviser than Dr. Woolsey; we only wish he had asked for his advice more freely—about civil-service reform, for example. We feel sure that he would thus have been encouraged to stand up to his civil-service order, to keep Silas B. Dutcher off the stump, and to refuse office to the wretched band who did the counting in the Southern States at the last election. All these things we believe Dr. Woolsey would have recommended, and had he recommended them successfully Mr. Hayes's Administration would have left no reasonable man any ground for serious complaint.

The letters of acceptance are still in the keeping of the candidates, and we do not know as categorically as would be desirable how far, to use Col. Codman's phrase at the late ratification meeting in Boston, General Garfield is "better than the platform" or "the platform's best embodiment," or how far this may be true also of General Hancock. The tendency of both parties to substitute a standard-bearer for a creed, or to set his excellence over against its defects, marks a decline in propagandism similar to that observable in religious circles to which no tests of belief are required for admission. In politics this decline of course indicates an artificial division on non-essentials, pending a reorganization on new and vital questions. The mischief of it is that the Presidential campaign, which should be par excellence the season for propagandism, is closed to all initiative that aims to get the real issues before the people. The insincere or meaningless platforms furnish no text to speak from, and the candidate's letter cannot safely enlarge them by introducing controverted topics, such as, in the present crisis, the currency and the tariff; at most he can lay stress on and develop some plank in the platform, but he has no directing power over the oratory of the canvass. So that, while it may be a happy accident that the man is greater than the declaration of sentiments he is supposed to stand for, we cannot rejoice in it as a healthy symptom.

There is undeniable force in this passage from Senator Bayard's speech at Wilmington last Friday, endorsing heartily the nomination of Hancock:

"Garfield is no unknown man. He has a long record. He has been long a leader among the advocates of force bills, suspension of habeas corpus, military usurpation, and every other means resorted to by his party to prolong their power. There has not been a measure tending to exalt the military above the civil power, not a question tending to create animosity between the sections, in which James A. Garfield was not on the same side. All this we propose to end by placing in power a man who, although a distinguished soldier, never forgot that his citizenship was a higher distinction."

Waiving the entire accuracy of this statement, the argument lies, however, not more against General Garfield than against any Republican leader who had to face the reconstruction question. But, as we pointed out last week, the opportunity for military usurpation at the South has gone by, and General Hancock's merit in this particular does not furnish an inference as to his fitness for civil administration, while we have the immediate example of Grant as a warrant for apprehending the contrary. The source of Grant's failure, by the way, is hardly to be ascribed to his rating the soldier above the citizen.

There is a strong likelihood of three electoral tickets in Virginia this fall, owing to the present complicated politics of that State. The "Readjusters," who now have the legislature and profess to comprise a majority of the voters, are disposed to put a third ticket in the field to demonstrate their strength and keep their organization intact, in order to elect their candidates for Governor and other State officers in 1881. The "debt-payers," or Bourbons, as the foes of their household call them, have already chosen their electoral candidates, and, though both tickets will be pledged to the Cincinnati nominees, there will apparently be a chance for the Garfield ticket to slip through by a plurality, unless one of the Democratic factions withdraws its candidates. This, however, will probably be done, as the rank and file of both may be assumed to share the sentiment expressed by the Richmond Commonwealth, according to which journal "It would be simply horrible if we, alone of all the States of the South, should throw our State in favor of Garfield by dividing the white vote between two electoral tickets for Hancock." But in any event such a dire catastrophe is unlikely, as even with two Hancock tickets in the field the Republican vote, owing in part to the disfranchisement of the negroes by the poll-tax qualification, and in part to their affiliation with the "Readjusters," would probably be the smallest of the three parties. It is estimated, on the basis of the election of 1876, that there are 165,000 qualified voters in the State, of whom 135,000 are Democrats; figures which make the Commonwealth's anxiety seem unnecessary.

Mayor Cooper's efforts to change the composition of the Police Board have been definitively frustrated during the week by a decision of the General Term, Judge Davis dissenting, confirming Judge Lawrence's reinstatement of Commissioner Nichols, and one by Judge Daniels reversing the action of the Mayor in removing General Smith. The Board will now consist of two Custom-house Republicans and two Tammany Democrats, and as these two factions are in sweet accord there is substantial reason for supposing that their share of municipal management will be conducted with the most exemplary decorum, free from all exasperating interference from the Mayor's office, and in certain directions restrained only by the individual consciences of the Commissioners. If, as will probably be the case, the Tammany and anti-Tammany (or now "regular") Democrats nominate distinct local tickets, the latter will be compelled to rely for success upon other "agencies" than favorable election inspectors and poll-clerks, and will be, so far as these are concerned, considerably worse off than they were last fall. What is of a good deal more importance, however, is the change which these decisions involve in the position of the Mayor; the fact that he is at the mercy of a "combination" among the aldermen in regard to appointments has been already abundantly illustrated, and it is now patent that he cannot be held responsible for any municipal misconduct in any department but his own. This general result is of far greater consequence, of course, than the question of Mayor Cooper's particular motives in removing General Smith from the Police Board.

The sad accident by which two spectators of the Yale-Harvard race at New London, last Thursday, lost their lives seems to have been due rather to the heedlessness of one of them than to any official mismanagement or lack of precaution. The arrangements were all proclaimed in advance to passengers of the train; each car had a brakeman at either end and a conductor in the centre, while four chief officers of the road were personally in charge. Mr. Lincoln, however, appears not to have exercised ordinary prudence, and to have overlooked the circumstance that his special car had no guard-rail. As he was the President of the Boston & Albany Railroad, he might have been assumed to be capable of looking out for himself, and we believe the failure of any official to warn him of his carelessness is explained on the ground that it would have been a breach of "railroad etiquette" to proffer advice to a railway president on his own car; at any rate such a feeling can be easily understood, and there is really no expedient yet invented which in such circumstances can wholly take the place of individual discretion. The "observation train," by the way, was not repeated for the Freshman race yesterday, simply because the grand stand offered ample accommodation to the crowd present, and not because of any conviction that it is an unsafe contrivance.

The exports of domestic products continue very large, and on one day during the week ships leaving New York took out about one million and a quarter bushels of grain, the largest amount ever exported in a single day. A great deal of grain was held back by the "bull speculation" which carried prices so high last winter, but this speculation has broken down, and the full facilities of the railroads and water-ways are now taxed to get the grain to the Atlantic ports. This deferred movement of grain explains in part the unusually heavy tonnage of the railroads, and the weakness of the foreign-exchange market at a time when, if at all this year, it should be strong. Prime bankers' sterling bills were again reduced this week, and rates are now nearer to the gold-importing than to the gold-exporting point. The increase of loanable funds in this market is also notable. The July interest and dividend disbursements are larger than usual, with the exception of those of the Treasury, which pays out less in July than before so large a part of the debt was refunded. The other disbursements of the Treasury during July will be large to satisfy the pension and other appropriations; so that there is every prospect of a continued easy money market, especially since the banks show a disposition to expand their accommodations and prevent the surplus reserve from getting above $17,000,000 to $18,000,000. At the Stock Exchange the week was broken by the July holidays. Investment securities were strong, but speculation was neither active nor decided in tone until the close, when it became strong. The price of silver bullion in London advanced to 52⅞*d.* per oz.; but here the bullion value of the buzzard dollar closed at about 89 cents ($0.8894).

The Bradlaugh affair has ended in the House of Commons by the adoption as a standing order of a resolution moved by Mr. Gladstone, allowing all elected members to affirm instead of taking the oath. This is what ought to have been done when Bradlaugh first presented himself and objected to the oath, or at least announced that to him it was meaningless, and is what would have been done if the Tories had not hoped in some manner to saddle the Liberals with the shame of him or the responsibility of him. Nobody has gained by the opposition to him but Bradlaugh himself, who now stands higher both with enemies and friends than he ever stood before—with the former because he made an able speech at the bar of the House, and with the latter because he has been figuring as a martyr of freedom of opinion.

Now that the Bradlaugh trouble is over, the British Ministry is face to face with its next difficulty—the Irish Disturbance Bill, as it is called, which is likely to try its strength severely, as it is undoubtedly troubling the minds of many of the English Moderate-Liberals, so much does it bear the appearance of an attack on hitherto untouched rights of property. We have already described its main features. Mr. Gladstone's Land-Tenure Act now in force gives the Irish tenant compensation if a landlord "distraits"—that is, evicts—him from his holding for any cause but non-payment of rent. The present act proposes to treat eviction for non-payment of rent in certain districts as "disturbance" in the eye of the law if the court—a single judge—is satisfied that the non-payment was due to distress. The power this gives the court is very great, and it imposes on some landlords a burden with regard to their tenants which it does not impose on others, and makes some landlords contribute to the relief of distress on a scale far beyond that which others are compelled to contribute, besides diminishing their control over their property at a time when they, too, necessarily find themselves less able than usual to meet their liabilities. The mortgagees of an estate, for instance, or the annuitants holding liens on it under a marriage settlement or a will, will not make concessions to the landlord because he has to make them to the tenants, and there is a good deal of force in the Tory question, Why are not the other creditors of the tenant—the storekeeper and money-lender, for instance—compelled to make him an abatement also on account of his distress? If the bill passes, as it doubtless will, in the Commons at least, it will undoubtedly prove the beginning of much more serious attacks on landed property in Ireland, and cannot but lower its value in the market.

The French Ministry are in hot water over their project of plenary amnesty for the Communists and persons implicated in the Communist insurrection. A large number of these have been already pardoned and allowed to return home, but exception was made of persons accused of what would be in ordinary times violations of the ordinary law—that is, offences other than simple resistance to the troops. As long as there were any unpardoned, however, the agitation about them was kept up, and the amnesty was made a capital question by the Extreme Left of the Chamber, led by Clemenceau. At last the Ministry determined to give way, and brought in their bill for plenary amnesty in the Chamber of Deputies, which was supported by a powerful speech from Gambetta, whose principal argument was that the country was tired of the question, and, much as it detested the Communists, was not afraid of them, and that it was most desirable to get the whole subject out of the way before the next election a year hence. In the Senate, however, the measure has met with unexpected opposition, led by M. Jules Simon, who on this subject, as well as on that of the expulsion of the Jesuits, has separated himself from his Radical brethren. He has denounced the amnesty on the ground that it pardoned murderers and incendiaries, and as he was evidently carrying the Senate with him the Ministry offered an amendment to the original bill giving them discretionary power in the matter instead of amnesty pure and simple. But this, too, was rejected by a majority of twelve, and another amendment, granting amnesty to all except assassins and incendiaries, was passed by a majority of five. This brings the Senate and the Chamber, as well as the Senate and the Ministry, into collision, and the situation would be serious if, as before the last election, the majority in the Senate was Conservative. But as the majority in both houses is Republican a way out of the difficulty will probably be readily found.

The French Government has carried out its threat by expelling the Jesuits from their establishments in France on the day named, June 30. In Paris some of the fathers behaved in a foolish manner by locking themselves in their cells and compelling the police to force the doors, a proceeding which was not necessary to secure evidence of compulsion. A large crowd of young Legitimists was present in the Rue de Sèvres in Paris and hooted the police, and got the fathers' blessing. The Jesuits talk of appealing to the courts, but it is difficult to imagine on what they ground their hopes of success. The decrees are not a Republican invention; they are based on laws long on the statute-book, and whose constitutionality has never been questioned. The notion that there is something illegal about the proceeding apparently grows out of the strong feeling in Legitimist circles that somehow the Republican government has not the same powers as other governments, and is not entitled to the same respect. The extent to which this is unconsciously held even by people in good society who wish well to the Republic, was well illustrated in the Prince of Wales's public reference to the possibility that the late Prince Napoleon might have come to the throne, coupled with the assertion that if he had he would have made a good ruler. The Prince of Wales is usually a model of tact and good manners, and would have instinctively avoided this if Prince Napoleon had been a pretender to a throne then occupied by a sovereign. But as Napoleon was only a conspirator against a Republic the objection to the suggestion did not occur to him. Apropos of this, a resolution is pending in the House of Commons, and is thought likely to be carried, expressing disapproval of the erection of a monument to Prince Napoleon's memory in Westminster Abbey.

After a long conference at Madrid the principal European Powers have for the first time succeeded in making a general convention with the Sultan of Morocco, resembling the Capitulations with the Porte, regulating the position and powers of the foreign consuls, and the rights, privileges, and immunities of the foreigners and other persons protected by them and resident in Morocco. There is nothing in the Treaty sufficiently different from the Capitulations with the Porte to call for remark. It is mainly noteworthy as the first successful attempt to bring Morocco into close and formal relations with the European Powers. The Sultan is now the most perfect specimen of the old Mahometan despot remaining. He has no ministers or cabinet, not even a vizir. His family has occupied the throne for three centuries, and he says he is a sherif, or descendant of the Prophet, which is doubtful, but for obvious reasons has never been disputed in Morocco. He claims the position of Caliph of the West and assigns to the Turkish Sultan that of Caliph of the East only, and as his subjects are almost all Mussulmans, and the remainder Jews, he has a much happier time, from the Mussulman point of view, than his Turkish brother. His people are ferociously fanatical, especially towards Spaniards, but the country being very rich in natural resources, and the English, Spanish, and French traders eager to get at it, and the security for foreigners hitherto very small, the establishment of consuls with regulated powers in the chief towns is an important matter. England has now most of the trade, and has the handling of a considerable portion of the customs duties as security for an advance made to pay the Spanish indemnity after the war of 1860. The Sultan's internal revenue has been estimated at $3,000,000; but this is very doubtful, as there is no regular system of taxation. The usual plan of replenishing the treasury is to lay hold of anybody who is believed to have a little money, and chastise him with a stick until he agrees to contribute of his means to his sovereign's necessities.

GENERAL GARFIELD AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

THE course of President Hayes towards civil-service reform, after being elected on a platform in which a leading plank was devoted to it, and after writing a letter of acceptance in which it was the most prominent feature, we presume must always now remain a mystery. Nobody is competent to explain it but himself, and no explanation of it is likely to come from him. The only defence offered for him by his friends is, that his Cabinet was divided upon the question, only one of them, Mr. Schurz, caring anything about it, the others being indifferent or hostile. To this there is the ready reply, that Mr. Hayes's Cabinet was not dropped down on him from the sky; he selected it himself, and if civil-service reform had in his mind the importance he seemed to assign to it in his letter, he ought to have selected a cabinet which would co-operate in carrying out his views on the subject. We are bound to suppose that he gave more attention to the subject in his letter than on further consideration he thought it really merited, for the sake of conciliating the Independents, whose support was not at first certain; and that having put them in good humor, he, to a great extent, dismissed the subject from his mind, in the feeling that the bulk of the party would never hold him to a very strict accountability about it. This is a more charitable hypothesis than that of the Stalwarts and Democrats, who used to maintain that the necessity under which he found himself of rewarding the Southern counters and "workers," to whom he was indebted for his election, forced him into using the public patronage at the very outset of his administration in a way which would have made any subsequent display of zeal for reform seem insincere and ill-timed. At any rate, whatever the reason of his course, the fact remains that, after making all allowance for the improvement which he undoubtedly has made in the mode of manning the New York Custom-house, so far from having done anything to increase the hold of civil-service reform on the minds of the men most active in politics, or give it the appearance of a coming question, he allowed it to assume, when the Chicago Convention met, the appearance of an exploded whimsy, which it would be not only safe but expedient to ignore utterly in concocting a new platform. But for the persistence of the Massachusetts delegation it would have received no notice from the Convention whatever. But the fact that the Convention was afraid to refuse formally to consider it, and was compelled to give it a place in the platform, showed that the majority were by no means sure that it did not still retain more or less hold on the popular mind, and that their action with regard to it would not influence a good many votes.

Beyond this the plank which was accorded to it can hardly be said to have much importance. It will bind nobody to anything. It will not of itself lead to any legislation. It will probably receive little notice on the stump from the ordinary politicians; although Mr. Boutwell's taking it up at Lowell the other day would seem to indicate that even this class were beginning to think it well to mention it. Congressmen, as a general rule, cannot afford to be very active or outspoken about it. Most of them owe their seats, and think they owe their continuance in public life, to the system which civil-service reform seeks to overthrow. If they declaim against the management of caucuses and conventions by office-holders they are very apt to fall foul of their own best friends and most indispensable supporters. There are, in fact, but few Congressmen to-day who can well afford to take this subject up without considerable risk to their own fortunes, until it is forced on them by public opinion. That public opinion—that is, the opinion of the main body of either party—is not very much excited about it, there is no question. That it is bestowing more and more attention on it we think is undoubtedly true; but the principal reason why party conventions take any notice of it is that the Independents—or the small body who in close States turn the scale at elections—are believed to have it much at heart. The policy which most politicians, therefore, have marked out for themselves to-day with regard to it is to say about it before elections whatever seems necessary to placate this class, but when the election is over to do nothing about it whatever.

The comparatively small amount of interest which the subject has thus far excited in the popular mind is, we believe, due to want of belief in the practicability of reform as desired by its friends. There is hardly an intelligent voter in either party, not directly connected with the Machine, who would not admit that Government business ought to be conducted like private business; that efficiency in the Government service, like efficiency in private service, calls for selection for merit and knowledge, and retention during good behavior; that it is dishonest for a man who is drawing a salary from taxes contributed by the whole people, for work due to the whole people, to devote a part of the time he is paid for to working for one party only; that it is fatal to discipline and mutual confidence for subordinates to denounce on the stump candidates whom the election may convert into their official superiors, or to work on the stump for official superiors whose duty it is to criticise their official work. Nobody denies these things. Few deny that the conversion of public servants into party electioneering agents is a fertile source of corruption both for the public service and for public men. What prevents all these considerations going to form a weighty party issue is the widespread belief that no improvement is possible, that the present state of things is one of the unavoidable accompaniments of democratic government, and that we must learn to put up with it, and grow and prosper and be happy in spite of it. The very first thing to be done, therefore, to rouse public interest, is to show people that the reform is possible, and that men in high places, charged with the conduct of important branches of the Government, believe that it is. No officer can do so much to show this as the President. He holds, directly or indirectly, the control of the whole army of civil servants. He knows exactly what the difficulties are in the way of improvement. He knows the extent of the mischief worked by the present system, and he understands the influences by which it is maintained and defended. Any show of real zeal in behalf of change on his part would rouse popular interest as nothing else would. If every appointment he made was plainly made with an eye to efficiency and could be explained as being so made; if he rigidly refrained from dividing the appointing power with Congressmen, even at the risk of some obstruction in other things; if, in short, he made it clear that he was aiming at the efficiency of the whole service, he might fall far short of his ideal, and might array Congress for a time against him, but he would rouse the public in favor of what every American understands—a business government doing its work on business principles; and if the public were roused, Congress would not resist for one session.

If General Garfield has civil-service reform at heart, we trust he will make this fact known in his letter of acceptance. He cannot make it known more clearly than by using the language which President Hayes used in his letter. But if he does not mean, if elected, to live up to his creed, and to be willing to suffer inconvenience and bear obloquy on account of it, we trust he will make no allusion to it in his letter. He will have among his supporters a good many men who believe civil-service reform to be the great question of American politics to-day, and who believe the stability of the present form of government to be dependent on some early action in the direction of such reform. Whether he does or does not share the views of these men (and we believe he shares them), he owes it to them not to bring ridicule on the cause they have at heart by empty approval of it, or by making promises with regard to it which he does not seriously intend to keep. The presence of General Arthur on the ticket only makes it the more necessary that the assurances of the Presidential candidate, with regard to the abuses with which General Arthur has been so long identified, should be clear and emphatic. Those who have this reform at heart are necessary to Republican success, and this time they are entitled to something more substantial than fair words.

THE RESURRECTION OF GREECE.

THE Gladstone Ministry has more than fulfilled its promises with regard to Greece by bringing to pass the Conference which has just traced a frontier line, considerably in advance of that recommended by the Congress of Berlin, which the Turks have thus far successfully avoided yielding, and not far short of the utmost extent of Greek expectations. In fact, it hardly falls short of them except in refusing enough coast-line on the mainland to give Greece the full command of the Straits of Corfu. Of course the transaction is not yet completed. The Conference has directed Turkey in somewhat peremptory fashion to accept its decision, but it has made no provision for the contingency of Turkey's refusing to obey. In the ordinary course of things it would be the duty and privilege of the Power to which territory was awarded by European concert to march in and take it, as Austria did in Bosnia and Herzegovina, but Greece is not in a position to do anything of the kind. Even if she had the men and money to contend successfully with Turkey on land—which is doubtful—she could not afford to expose her coasts to bombardment by the Turkish ironclads. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary, in order to give her any chance at all of asserting her rights on land, that she should receive some assistance at sea, and if the report be true that an Anglo-French fleet has been ordered to the Ægean it would seem as if it had been determined at least to give her an opportunity of showing her capacity on shore. Turkey calculates evidently, and not without reason, on the reluctance of all the Powers to see any more fighting within the limits of the Empire. Austria has had enough of it in Bosnia and is not yet ready to advance any further south, and the other Powers know that if Turkey gets involved in another armed conflict it will probably be the signal for risings in various quarters—Rumelia, Syria, and Arabia, for instance—which might lead to a total break-up of the Empire, and force on Europe the exceedingly delicate and dangerous task of making some disposition of the débris.

Nevertheless, however great the difficulties in the way of the execution of the decree of the Conference—for decree it really is—may seem, there can be no question that it will, before long, be executed somehow. Either the Turks will abandon all resistance to it, or the Powers will protect the Greeks in carrying it out, and when carried out Greece will be at last in the position in which the Allies ought to have placed her at the close of the War of Independence in 1828. She was then sacrificed to that same Western jealousy of Russia and dread of the overthrow of Turkey of which the late Beaconsfield Ministry made itself the exponent between 1876 and the late election. When the war closed in 1829 the representatives of England, France, and Russia, by an agreement embodied in a protocol, recognized Greece as a semi-independent state, paying tribute to the Sultan; but when forced by Russian successes to go further, Lord Aberdeen insisted that the acknowledgment of complete independence in 1832, on payment of an indemnity, should be attended by a diminution of territory. The line finally settled on was a better one, but was suggested mainly by the limits of the theatre of military operations. It left under Turkish domination large districts inhabited mainly, or almost exclusively, by Greeks, simply because there had been little or no fighting in them. These, too, were among the most fertile and valuable; for irregular troops, such as those with which the Greeks carried on the conflict, are generally compelled to cling to the mountains, and a government dependent on them is therefore apt to fare badly if the uti possidetis rule is adopted as the basis of peace. The result was that Greece came out of the struggle, not only with a very small and unproductive territory, but a territory almost literally drenched in blood and covered with ruins. The war had been as ferocious as any in history, had spared nothing that men value, and had lasted ten years. On this little patch of wretched land, off which a third of the population had perished, the allies founded a kingdom, and clapped on it a public debt of $15,000,000 by guaranteeing bonds, and of this nearly $2,500,000 was paid to the Sultan by way of indemnity. It is true the debt thus contracted did not burden the Greeks, for they took little notice of it, but their failure to make any provision for it long discredited them in the money markets of the world. Unfortunately, too, the war of independence produced no leader of first-rate capacity, and the period between the first deliverance from Turkish rule and the establishment of the kingdom was passed under the dictatorship of Capodistrias, a man trained in Russia and ignorant of any but Russian methods of Government. King Otho, the Bavarian, to whom the allies gave the throne in 1833, ruled also for ten years, not only as a despot, but as a despot whose agents were all foreigners. His ministers were Bavarians and he had a Bavarian army, and his laws were really the dicta of the Bavarian lawyers who formed his council. One of these dicta was that the new king had succeeded to all the Sultan's rights, and the Government was really administered as if he had. He was compelled by a popular revolution to get rid of the Bavarians in 1843, and he then promised to govern constitutionally, but he did not keep his promise, and was finally expelled in 1862. The throne, after much king-seeking, was then offered to and accepted by a son of the King of Denmark and brother of the Princess of Wales, who has recently been travelling about Europe seeking support for his adopted country in its controversy with Turkey.

It may be said, therefore, that Greece has, since the foundation of the kingdom in 1833, labored under the immense disadvantages of being confined to a small and poor territory, containing only a portion of the Greek race, and offering no inducements to the rest of the Greeks to come and settle in it, and of being not only badly governed but governed by a monarch who remained essentially foreign in his ideas and methods. The Greeks have, it is true, made enormous progress since then. Their advance in civilization has, in fact, been very great indeed, and is only underrated by those who do not know or do not choose to recall what the condition of the country was under Turkish rule. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the Greeks have not gained in the public opinion of Europe as they have become more known. They have not retained the sympathy, or even a respectable portion of the sympathy, which was lavished on them when they came out of the war of independence. The reasons of this are various, and they are by no means all discreditable. The Greeks are unquestionably one of the two markedly and pre-eminently able—that is, intellectually acute and versatile—races of the world, the other being the Jews; and both are disliked for very much the same reason. The more energetic and ambitious Greeks have been ever since the fall of Constantinople compelled to seek their fortune by subserviency to the Turks, and by diligent practice of the arts of chicane and corruption. In fact, it was only by bribing or bamboozling the Turks that they could obtain either office or power, or even personal security. With the aid of these they were enabled for nearly three centuries to secure a considerable and very profitable share in the administration of the Ottoman Empire, but we need hardly say that they could not secure it by these means without great damage to character and reputation. Then, too, the insecurity of all country districts under Turkish rule early gave the more enterprising Greeks a drift to the towns, and the narrowness of the commercial and industrial horizon in the Greek towns again sent the bolder Greek youth abroad to the great ports and manufacturing centres of France, England, and Germany, in which they have achieved great success. Moreover, the race has preserved the talent of making money and "operating" for which it was remarkable in the days of Ulysses, so that it is now, we believe, accepted as a sound business maxim in most parts of Europe that nobody but a Jew has much chance against a Greek competitor, though in the Levant much less confidence is felt in the Jew's powers in such a struggle, and it is there a common saying that a Greek is a match for any two Jews. However this may be, it is certain that the Greek has a genius for trade, and that it covers a much wider range than the Jew's. The Jew is apt to stick to banking and stockholding, but the Greek, while fully able to hold his own in these fields, also shines in foreign commerce and shipowning. He is as ready for great ventures as the Englishman or American, and is as painstaking and industrious and as good a linguist as the German. In fact, there is nothing the Greeks have had a chance to try within the last half-century in which they have not given unmistakable evidence of being one of the great races of the world even now, and have not qualified themselves to disregard the most ponderous demonstrations that they are not descended from the countrymen of Themistocles and Pericles, but are a mongrel herd, left behind by the great mingling of the peoples which accompanied the slow decline of the Eastern Empire.

That such a race should have no country behind to receive its allegiance and grow great in its triumphs has always been a greater mortification for the Greeks than for the Jews, because their religion does not furnish them, as it furnishes the Jews, with a great political history and with claims on the respect and interest of the Christian world, which the most rabid Christian despiser of the Jews can never wholly cease to respect. In fact, there is, perhaps, no race in the world to-day which has greater need of a country to bring out its full powers, or which would work more devotedly for a country's fame than the Greek. This very exuberance of vitality has, however, been somewhat injurious to the little kingdom of which Athens is the capital, by concentrating in it far more brain and mental activity than it has use for. There is enough political fuss and heat and turmoil, and enough schools and colleges, and, above all, enough newspapers and "editorial" writing, at Athens to supply the wants of the Eastern Empire, if it were revived. In fact, the Greek politicians have got into the way of talking and thinking as if they were in possession of Byzantium, and the Turks were still roving on the steppes of Central Asia. The result, when observed at a distance by those who only know of the Greek Kingdom that it is about two-fifths of the size of New York, and has considerably less than half the population, is somewhat ridiculous. But with the enlargement of the kingdom, and the quickened activity in every field which must come from increased material resources, and from the political hopefulness bred by additional territory and population, there is hardly a doubt that immigration from Turkey into Greece proper will become very rapid, and that the number of rich Greeks who, having made fortunes abroad, will retire to Athens or other Greek cities to spend them will be very large, and the development of every branch of industry very great, and the Greek race make itself felt as a positive and brilliant addition to the forces of civilization. The Greeks have in their scenery alone a mine of wealth, and they will now, we may be very sure, find it out rapidly and act on the discovery. The enormous sum which the thrifty Swiss extract every year from travellers by simply keeping up good roads and keeping them clear of robbers, not improbably falls much below what the Greeks might pocket if tourists could wander through their far more famous valleys with the same sense of security. We have little doubt the end of the century will witness this consummation, and that "Sunium's marble steep" will be a place on which wanderers of both sexes from the farthest West will sing the Old Hundred and become engaged on moonlight evenings, no brigands daring to interrupt them.

THE COLLEGE BOAT-RACE.

New London, July 1, 1880.

TO any one who had been in New London last year and the year before, it was obvious this morning that the public interest in the Harvard-Yale race had greatly diminished. The crowd had fallen off, and though the race was generally expected to be a close one, there was not nearly the excitement over it that had prevailed either in 1878 or 1879. The three successive defeats of Yale had had the natural effect of dampening the enthusiasm of the partisans of that college, while the monotonous success of Harvard had had the evil consequence of creating a languid indifference to the result on the part of Harvard men.

The arrangements for seeing the race were even better than before. The "moving grand stand," instead of being moved up the course long before the start, reached Bartlett Point almost exactly as the two crews came up to the starting-boats. There was no tedious waiting in the hot sun; the word was given, and the crews were off. The start was a good one—so good that it was difficult to make out which boat had the best of it, though Yale appeared to lead slightly. There was barely time for a spectator to assure himself of this when Yale suddenly stopped rowing, and one of the crew held up an oar, showing that either his rowlock or his oar was broken. To those on the cars this seemed to be the end of the race, as, under the usual rules, the start having been a fair one, there was nothing for Harvard to do in order to win but to row over the course. At first this appeared to be the view taken of the matter by the Harvard captain; his crew continued to row down the course, followed along the shore by the moving grand stand, which was, however, soon cut off from all view of the water by the intervening bluffs. It was at this point that the distressing accident occurred which cost two of the spectators their lives. Whether this disaster might have been avoided or not it is probably idle to speculate; but it is perfectly safe to say that there is always considerable danger of such accidents, for, although the train never moves very fast, it frequently stops and as frequently starts, while the passengers during a great part of the time they are in the cars are in an excited state which causes them wholly to forget that, if they stand up to see what is going on, a jolt may easily pitch them headlong out.

The accident, and the fear that the race would not be rowed out, created a great feeling of depression among the crowd on the train, which was not decreased by the fact that for a long time it was entirely impossible to find out what had actually happened, or whether the train itself was in a condition to be moved down the track even if the umpire should decide that the race must still be rowed. After a considerable lapse of time, however, it was definitely ascertained that under a new rule the umpire had decided that Harvard could not claim the race, but that the boats must start again. This decision was most fortunate for the interests of rowing at New London.

The second start was more in favor of Harvard than the first. For the first mile the race was a good one, but after that it somewhat resembled the race of last year, with the positions of the boats reversed. In other words, Yale steadily drew away from Harvard, increasing her lead from the first-mile flags to the finish, coming in, according to the official time, nearly three-quarters of a minute ahead. There is really only one explanation to be given of the result: the Harvard crew was fairly outrowed. On technical points there may be great room for differences of opinion. Yale, I was informed on very good authority this morning, had resorted to several little devices which may or may not have conduced to her victory. Her oars, for instance, were considerably shorter than Harvard's, the object being to get a greater number of strokes in the same space of time. Again, her stroke was shorter and less "swingy" than Harvard's. It was also less uniform; the boat from the start presented a more "ragged" appearance. On the whole, the "form" of the Harvard crew was almost identically the same with the "form" of last year's crew, and was superior at all points to that of Yale. But that was all. The "form" remained, but everything else had gone. Only two of the old Harvard crew were in the boat, and the new men were not up to their work. It is one of the disputed points in rowing whether it is better that an eight-oared crew should be very heavy or only of medium weight. However this may be, the Yale crew this year was the heavier, as the Harvard crew was last year.

The time, it will be seen, is not remarkable. But four-mile races have not been rowed long enough on the same waters in the United States to furnish a normal standard by which to judge of time; and, besides this, the tide at New London will always make comparisons difficult. There have now been five of these races, two at Springfield and three at New London. Of these Harvard has won three and Yale two. Undoubtedly the most interesting technical point mooted at present is, which college has the true stroke, or whether there is any such thing as a true stroke. To any one who witnessed the extraordinary results of the monstrous intercollegiate regattas at Saratoga, in which there were as many different kinds of strokes as there were colleges, and in which it was by no means the best "form" that won, it might perhaps be permitted to be sceptical as to there being any such thing as a correct stroke. Nevertheless, if tradition is worth anything, the Harvard stroke ought to be better in the long run than such a stroke as Yale rowed this afternoon. There are one or two facts which confirm this belief. In 1878 the Harvard time was 20.44. In 1879 the official time was 22.15; but it is understood among boating men that this was wrong, the actual time having been a minute better, or 21.15. Considering that during the era of three-mile courses eighteen minutes, or anything less, was considered extraordinary time, it cannot be disputed that 20.44 and 21.15 at New London for a four-mile course look very much as if the results of the gradual process by which the present Harvard stroke had been "evolved," ought not to be abandoned heedlessly. Allowing for the wind and tide, it can hardly be doubted that the Harvard crew of last year, had they been in the boat this year, would have won the race, or, in other words, that the crews being equal (for the Yale crew of this year can only be compared with the Harvard crew of last), the Harvard stroke would have won. It will probably require a few more races to settle the matter one way or the other, unless Yale adopts the Harvard stroke, which after this year's race she is hardly likely to do. All this is not said for the purpose of belittling Yale's victory. It was a fair race, fairly rowed and fairly won, and no one who saw it could doubt that had it been rowed a dozen times the result would have been the same.

Admirable as are the arrangements for seeing the race at New London, there is one serious drawback to this annual regatta, and that is, that there is not enough of it. To see it at all, for New-Yorkers or Bostonians, twenty-four hours at least have to be given up, and for the devotion of so much time the "event" is a very brief one. If some other races could be had at the same time the interest would be greatly increased. Of course, the difficulty about this is the uncertainty of the water; but there is always this difficulty, and it would be, at any rate, worth trying. While it would be a mistake to think of going back to the confusion of the intercollegiate regatta system, it would certainly greatly add to the attractions of the annual university racing at New London if it lasted longer and embraced more "events."

A MONTH OF BLUNDERS.

London, Saturday, June 19.

LORD BYRON wondered how the first married couple got through the first twenty-four hours in Paradise, and the successors of Adam and Eve have sometimes expressed a retrospective astonishment at the fact that somehow or other they got through the much longer period of the honeymoon. They are disposed to say with Heine, "I have endured, but ask me not how." A similar difficulty exists in the beginning of many other alliances. The first month of a new ministry meeting a new parliament is a month of trial, and very frequently of failure. There are little misunderstandings, tiffs, strained relations, until the matrimonial fetters begin to wear easily. Mr. Gladstone has now had a month's experience of the new Parliament, and the new Parliament, by necessary consequence, has had a month's experience of Mr. Gladstone and his administration. "Unbroken happiness" is not, perhaps, a phrase which would best express their mutual relations. They have not yet, perhaps, learned to understand each other quite thoroughly, or to apply that principle of give and take which is one of the most necessary and at the same time one of the most difficult lessons of human life. The new Parliament is not only in a certain sense strange to Mr. Gladstone, but is also strange to the House of Commons. A large number of members enter that assembly for the first time, and their involuntary breaches of order, such as passing between the Speaker and the member who is addressing the House from the first or second benches—the third bench is supposed to be visible by the Speaker over the heads of interposing members; turning their backs upon him as they go out without the preliminary removal of the hat; referring to their colleagues by name and not by reference to the constituencies which they represent,—these and other solecisms have created those indignant and abused cries of "Order" which from time to time resound through the House. The offending member is generally in a state of calm self-possession, wondering who it is that has done something wrong, but not in the slightest degree aware that he is the sinner; or else he is terrified out of his life, having a misgiving that he has erred, but not having the remotest comprehension how or when. The inexperience of a large portion of the new House makes it difficult to deal with. Inexperience certainly cannot be attributed to Mr. Gladstone, but he has known comparatively little of the House of Commons for the past half-dozen years. He was only a casual visitor to it, and more or less an indifferent observer of it, during the greater part of Lord Beaconsfield's administration. He had not to manage the proceedings of any section of it while he was in temporary retirement from the functions of leader of the Opposition. But the House of Commons is not to be known merely by looking at it now and then. The art of managing it can be acquired only by managing, just as there is no learning to swim except by getting into the water, and no learning to ride otherwise than on horseback. Since 1874 a new element of disorder has been introduced into the House of Commons in the shape of the Irish members who claim Mr. Parnell as their chief, or dispute the Parliamentary leadership of what now claims to be a third party with him. Mr. Gladstone has, therefore, since his resumption of office had to deal with conditions new even to his large knowledge and varied experience. It cannot be said that he is handling them altogether successfully, but he has made no mistakes which are irretrievable, and he will probably learn something even from his own blunders. Mr. Gladstone is not merely like the hero of Mr. Browning's poem, "ever a fighter"; he is also always a learner, and it is quite probable that the disturbed honeymoon of his new political marriage will be succeeded by months and years of sober happiness.

It is certain that more than a usual amount of mistakes to which an incoming administration is liable have been committed, some of them by Mr. Gladstone personally and others by his colleagues. It is a moral certainty that immediately after the formation of a new Government one of its members will commit an appalling indiscretion, and it is an interesting question for cool observers to speculate upon whom the lot will fall. Mr. Fawcett was the victim of destiny in this instance. His first speech to his constituents, after his acceptance of office as Postmaster-General, contained a reference to a supposed despatch upon the Indian deficit, incriminating the late Ministry, and unhappily for him no such despatch existed. Mr. Fawcett had next day to write a letter to the newspapers admitting his error. He had not learned the art of holding his tongue and waiting to be assured by physical evidence of the truth of allegations of which he was morally convinced. The late Government were as wrong as Mr. Fawcett supposed them to be, but the particular proof of guilt did not exist, and false evidence for a true accusation is for a moment supposed to acquit the persons incriminated of the guilt which is really theirs. Mr. Fawcett was not long left alone as a ministerial blunderer. Mr. Gladstone soon proceeded to keep him company. His letter to Count Karolyi, the Austrian ambassador; his refusal to recall Sir Bartle Frere; his appointment of Lord Ripon and Lord Kenmare to offices for which their qualities did not in any very striking manner designate them, and his recent attempt to silence Mr. O'Donnell by moving that he be not heard—all these things were instances of that want of tactical perception which mars the effect of Mr. Gladstone's really great and noble qualities of mind and character.

The old Latin line which says that no divinity can help you if you have not prudence, applies to Mr. Gladstone's character and career. In all the mistakes which he has committed since his accession to office he was right in principle, but wrong in the manner and occasion on which he gave effect to principle. It was proper that he should convey to the Austrian ambassador an assurance which would heal the unhappy irritation that one of his Midlothian speeches had created in the mind of the Emperor Francis Joseph, his ministers and his people. But the manner in which the expression of regret was communicated was somewhat too humble, not to say abject. Mr. Gladstone seems to revel in apologies. He has apparently a sense of Christian virtue in making confession that he has erred. He likes his penitence to be conspicuous. It pleases him to walk abroad, metaphorically speaking, with bare feet, in a white sheet, and with a lighted taper in his hand. But this temper of mind is not that of the English people, and they do not like to be placed by their Prime Minister, or to see him placing himself, in a too humble and contrite attitude towards foreign Powers. With regard to Sir Bartle Frere, there is even less excuse to be made for Mr. Gladstone, but there is still some. He is almost always under the domination of one leading idea. When he was out of office it was the necessity of overthrowing Lord Beaconsfield's Government, of preventing the development of their policy, and of transferring the conduct of affairs at home and abroad to other hands. Now that he is in office the old official sense returns to him. It is the maxim of English administration that each successive Government inherits the obligations and must respect the results achieved by its predecessor; otherwise a change of ministry would be a little revolution, and each cabinet would be occupied simply in undoing what the cabinet that went before it had done. Instead of steady progress there would be a series of shocks and jolts, and the parliamentary train would be either thrown off the lines or shunted in the wrong direction. The sense which Mr. Gladstone has very strongly in office, of maintaining the continuity of policy and of administration, is a sound one. But he has exaggerated it in a degree incompatible with thoroughly rectifying what he proclaimed to be wrong in the conduct of Lord Beaconsfield's Government and with his own personal consistency. As regards Mr. O'Donnell, certainly it was very desirable that his attack upon the newly-appointed French ambassador to England should not be tolerated within the walls of Parliament. It was desirable, in the interests of decency and in that of a good understanding with France, that he should be put to silence. But in such questions as that which occupied Parliament on Monday night and up to an early hour on Tuesday morning there is only a balance between evils. It would certainly have been better that Mr. O'Donnell should have been allowed to make a speech politically indecent in the highest degree than that the Prime Minister should move that a member not ruled by the Speaker to be out of order be not heard. Such a motion as this, if carried, would be a precedent fatal to freedom of speech. It is a grave evil that it should have been moved, and that it should have been put from the chair. It is impossible to say that a case cannot occur in which the conduct and character of a foreign ambassador may not be a fit and necessary topic of discussion in the House of Commons. If a man were appointed to represent any foreign court here whom it would be a scandal for the Queen to receive, or who might be suspected of engaging in intrigues against the country to which he was accredited, the House of Commons would be more than justified in entertaining a motion on the subject. It would be bound to investigate the matter. But then the question should be treated as involving a vote of censure upon the Ministry for receiving as the representative of a foreign country a man inadmissible at court or in society, or whose presence might be dangerous to the country. To discuss the private conduct or the personal antecedents of a foreign ambassador, in and for themselves, is an impertinence both in the etymological and the conventional sense of the word. Unfortunately, this consideration did not occur to the Speaker of the House of Commons early enough. If it had been present to his mind he would doubtless have disallowed on Monday the question which he unfortunately permitted Mr. O'Donnell to put upon the paper, and to address to Sir Charles Dilke. On Thursday, when Mr. O'Donnell proposed to repeat his offence, he was met in a proper manner. The Speaker stated that the questions which Mr. O'Donnell wished to ask, but which he would not allow to appear on the notice-paper of the House, were rejected by him on the ground that they referred to matters beyond the cognizance of the House itself, or of the Queen's Government. If this principle had been acted on on the earlier day the Speaker would have avoided falling into a serious mistake himself, and would not have given occasion to the impulsive motion which Mr. Gladstone proposed for putting a member of the House to silence. This motion was afterwards withdrawn, but it had been submitted to the House, and is now recorded in its journals, where it remains a dangerous precedent for a despotic minister commanding a large majority.

In the appointment of Lord Ripon and Lord Kenmare Mr. Gladstone was honorably anxious to show that the disabilities of Roman Catholics were not merely removed in law, but that they had ceased in fact. His own strong theological feelings are well known, yet he was the first prime minister who appointed a Jew to be a law-officer of the Crown, and afterwards to occupy one of the highest seats upon the judicial bench. If Lord Ripon had been a statesman of the highest rank, instead of a statesman who has filled high places without any particular distinction, his Roman Catholicism ought not to have weighed against him. But the fact is that to the majority of the English people he is known chiefly as a 'vert—that is to say, a *con*vert or a *per*vert, according as the religious inclinations of the person using the monosyllable may mentally supply the omitted prefix. Lord Kenmare is not known to the public at all except as a Roman Catholic. Though they were really appointed, the former to be Governor-General of India, the latter to be Lord Chamberlain, in spite of their being Roman Catholics, a large section of the public will have it that they were appointed because they were Roman Catholics. It was certainly desirable that a protest against the intolerance of Exeter Hall, Lord Shaftesbury, and the Record should be made. Mr. Gladstone has generously and at some sacrifice to popularity made it. It is to be regretted that, in the selection of persons and offices by which this confession of absolute religious equality was set forth, there should have been something of his too frequent failure in tact and in perception of character.

It is probable that Mr. Gladstone will commit a good many mistakes during his term of office similar in character to those of which I have spoken. They are in the nature of the man. They are a part of that weakness in him which is closely allied to the sources of his noblest strength. He is full of generous impulses which are not always consistent with each other, or with reason and prudence. He wished to shield an absent man in the case of M. Challemel-Lacour from an ungenerous and unmanly attack, and for a moment he did not perceive what he probably saw five minutes afterwards, that he was endangering for a passing accidental exigency the permanent privilege of freedom of speech in Parliament. He was desirous of showing that he did not wish violently to overthrow all that had been done by the late Government, and that he had no vindictive feeling to the men who were the instruments or authors of their policy. He therefore resolved to maintain Sir Bartle Frere at the Cape, although he himself and all the members of his Cabinet, with the accidental exception of the Duke of Argyll, who was not at the time in England, had when in Opposition spoken and voted for Sir Bartle's recall. He wished to allay angry feeling in Austria, and by a too-diffusive apology he succeeded in raising resentment in England. Mr. Gladstone understands the House of Commons when he is in the act of addressing it. In his character of orator he knows it as an audience. He can evoke, and respond to, and play upon its feelings, or appeal to its reason, with the nicest perception of its changing moods. But this is only while he is on his legs. When he resumes his seat or before he rises he seems to have no understanding of it at all. To him it is a group of men like any other. The sense which Lord Palmerston had in a very high degree, and which Lord Beaconsfield possessed in an equally signal manner, of permanent currents of feeling seems to be wholly wanting to Mr. Gladstone. This lack of perception prevents his being a consummate parliamentary leader. It ensures his making from time to time a vast number of mistakes which delight his enemies, which mortify his friends, and which scandalize old politicians in the House itself and in the clubs. He has not the art of abating the friction and allaying the heats of parliamentary conflict. But though by no means a consummate, or even in the whip's sense an ordinarily good, parliamentary leader, Mr. Gladstone remains the greatest parliamentary statesman of his generation. The qualities which have enabled him to achieve the almost unparalleled legislative work he has accomplished—unparalleled in its quality as well as in its amount—are made more conspicuous by his almost ludicrous defectiveness in the art of managing men individually and in groups. Without the instruments which smaller men found indispensable to the accomplishment of smaller labors he has done a great work—a work which there is no reason to think is yet finished. The past month has been spent in a rather copious sowing of wild oats, and it may be hoped that that business has been pretty well done. Rather it might be proper to say, while Mr. Gladstone has been sowing wheat the enemy who lies hid in the infirmities of his own noble and upright character has been sowing tares. It is to be hoped that the wheat will choke out the tares, and that there will be an ample harvest of good grain. †††

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

PARIS, June 22.

THE session of the French Chambers continues laboriously. Most of the sittings have been devoted to subjects of commercial policy and military organization, except the time lost in idle interpellations, whose only aim is to create scandal. The Bonapartist deputies are past-masters in this art. The most audacious among them is M. Paul de Cassagnac. The other day, about some unimportant events that had occurred during the excitement of an electioneering contest, in which, however, his brother had come off victorious, he again lavished insult on the Republican Government by comparing it to an encampment of gypsies pillaging and devastating the country. Nothing can express the arrogance of his manner in the tribune. He assumes the attitude of a prizefighter, turning up his sleeves. Having no real talent for argument he substitutes invective for discussion, addressing himself by turns to the President of the Chamber, the ministers, and the deputies of the majority. He has only one oratorical mode of proceeding—that is, to hit out at random. One feels that the sword's point lies beneath his harangue; a practised duellist, he is always ready to provoke his adversaries. His newspaper, the Pays, is now pre-eminently foremost in insulting the Government. He does not recoil from any outrage, and the very day of M. Thiers's death M. Paul de Cassagnac declared himself ready to dance over the grave. This violence does not hinder him from setting up to be the defender of the Church, and his language is never more abusive than when he pretends to espouse the holy cause. For this reason in particular he strenuously opposes Prince Napoleon, who, since the unfortunate death of his cousin, is the leader of the Bonapartist party. It is well known that the Prince is hostile to clericalism, and is a partisan of the decrees of March 29 against the non-authorized confraternities. Since then he has been overwhelmed with insult from M. Paul de Cassagnac, who contributes more than any one to embitter the divisions of the Bonapartists. In his violent way he has recently entered upon an animated polemic with M. Émile Ollivier, former President of the Council at the time the war of 1870 was declared. The two adversaries mutually taxed each other with the criminal folly of declaring war. "It is you who urged it on, through your paper," said the former minister to M. Paul de Cassagnac. "You," answered the latter, "deceived the country and made France believe herself ready for this terrible war; you are guilty by your incapacity and lies." Alas! both are right, and the country must dismiss them together. The divisions of the Bonapartists are manifested on all occasions. When there was a question of holding a religious service in memory of the young Prince Imperial's death, the Jeromists had a Mass apart. Their opponents hastened to celebrate another, which they termed the only right one. It may be inferred they prayed against each other, if hatred can be called a prayer. It is important to point out these dissensions, for they form an important incident in our present politics, and one which is greatly to the benefit of our institutions.

M. Léon Say's election to the presidency of the Senate, and the appointment of M. Challemel-Lacour in his place as ambassador to London, have been warmly discussed by the press. M. Léon Say had scarcely arrived in London when the resignation of the former president, M. Martel, induced him to put himself forward as one of the candidates. His party also desired the place for him, and it must be admitted he is perfectly qualified to fill it. Grandson of the famous economist Say, possessed of a large fortune, he belongs to that rich, liberal bourgeoisie which was the chief prop of Louis Philippe's monarchy. After our misfortunes in 1870 he immediately joined M. Thiers's political party, which he served as Prefect of the Seine. Subsequently, as Minister of Finance, he displayed rare qualities as a financier. A good speaker, of an easy temper, possessing the manners of a perfect gentleman, devoid of passion but not without conviction, he has all that is needful in order to be an excellent president. His nomination was particularly agreeable to M. Gambetta, who feared above everything the election of M. Jules Simon to this post. M. Jules Simon is his personal enemy, and with marvellous cleverness he follows a policy entirely opposed to M. Gambetta's. M. Challemel-Lacour's appointment as ambassador to London caused our old governmental aristocracy to utter loud cries, as they have always regarded these high diplomatic posts as their monopoly. In place of such men as the Duc de Broglie or the Marquis d'Harcourt, it seems scandalous to them to send as ambassador to London a mere bourgeois, a former college professor, who, during the Empire, was compelled to live by literary work; who is, besides, a decided republican, and not likely to speak in a jesting tone of popular government at foreign courts. M. Challemel-Lacour's literary works are distinguished by their rare merit, and reveal a perfect knowledge of the country where he is going to represent France. He was Prefect of Lyons during the most terrible circumstances at the time of the war, and, in spite of odious calumny, he did all that was possible to maintain order at that moment of great exasperation, and showed himself to be one of our foremost political orators. His speech, cold and brilliant as steel, transfixes his adversaries by an irresistible logic; his face is fine and intellectual and his manners distinguished. The English aristocracy has too much good sense not to welcome this eminent representative of the French Republic, and will not think it strange that we should have chosen as ambassador a republican who is neither duke nor marquis, but a self-made man.

The amnesty for the remainder of the convicts of the Paris Commune has just been carried in the Chambers by a majority of two hundred votes, after an incomparable speech of Gambetta's, who, for the first time, left the president's seat to deliver it. It is a great event. We are yet waiting for the vote of the Senate, after which I will endeavor to characterize this important political crisis and its hero. É.

THE PENIKESE SCHOOL.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The article entitled "An American Seaside Laboratory," by Prof. E. Ray Lankester, in Nature for March 25, contains the following statements:

"A liberal American offered to the late Prof. Agassiz the island of Pennikese as a site for a 'zoölogical station.' . . . A class of students were landed on Pennikese, and, after a sort of holiday picnic of a few weeks, returned home. No money was forthcoming to build the necessary laboratories and to maintain the necessary staff of scientific and other employees, so the Pennikese Station was quietly and very wisely dropped."

Having had the honor of giving instruction during both the sessions of "The Anderson School of Natural History at Penikese Island," and having at hand all the official publications of the directors and trustees, with many of the newspaper reports of what was said and done respecting the school, I fail to find any warrant for the slurs cast by the words quoted upon the founder of the school, upon the directors and their associates, and upon the students in attendance.

1. The gift of Mr. John Anderson included the island and the buildings thereon, together with the sum of $50,000. One-half of this sum equals that which Prof. Lankester estimates as the original cost of a "zoölogical station" in England, and the interest of the remainder, at six per cent., is nearly half of what he regards as the proper annual outlay.

2. Of the forty-four in attendance at the first session of the school all but four were professors or teachers in colleges or schools. During both sessions it was necessary for the instructors to restrain their determination to utilize each moment of the valued time. Never have I witnessed greater zeal for self-improvement than was displayed at Penikese. To no school-session could the words "a sort of holiday picnic" less fitly be applied.

3. The words "zoölogical station" are placed in quotation marks as if employed by Mr. Anderson or Prof. Agassiz. The phrase does not occur in any of the printed documents, nor do I remember hearing it in public addresses or private conversation. From first to last the object distinctly specified and kept in mind was the instruction of teachers and those intending to become teachers of natural history. Nor has the occasion yet arisen in this country for occupying a column of a scientific journal with an explanation of the distinctions between a "Zoölogical Station" and a "Summer School of Natural History." Notes.

For the English-speaking race, wherever planted, we should have supposed Nature to be a sufficient scientific medium, and entitled to universal support. We are partly confirmed in this view by the quotations from Nature in the first number of Science, a quarto weekly journal, edited by Mr. John Michels, and published at 229 Broadway, in this city. Nevertheless, the editor's statement that the enterprise has been begun "after consultation with many of the leading scientists in this country," and his list of co-laborers, seem to point to a real want, and to entitle this new "record of scientific progress" to a friendly welcome. Its present size is 16 pages, including the advertising sheet. The opening article, on the United States Naval Observatory, is from the pen of Professor E. S. Holden.——In connection with the Yale College (Winchester) Observatory a Thermometric Bureau has just been established, which undertakes to receive thermometers for comparison with the standards at the Observatory, and to certify the verification as in the case of time-pieces. It is hoped by this means to improve the accuracy of chemical, meteorological, and other thermometers employed for scientific purposes, whether by guaranteeing the standards of makers, or regulating from time to time those of hospitals and other institutions. In regard to terms, mode of transmission, etc., application should be made to Leonard Waldo, Astronomer in Charge.——Mr. R. R. Bowker, who for some years will make his residence abroad, has assigned the editorial conduct and business management of the Publishers' Weekly to his associate, Mr. F. Leypoldt.——The New England Historical and Genealogical Register for July opens with an interesting sketch of the family descent and checkered career of the late Joel Munsell, the well-known Albany publisher. A good likeness is prefixed.——The quarterly Bulletin of the Hartford Library Association, edited by the librarian, Miss C. M. Hewins, continues to be noticeable for the care bestowed in it on children's reading. The July issue is prefaced by suggestions for "The Children's Vacation," for which parents ought to be thankful.——Mr. Edward Walford's magazine, the Antiquary, completed last month its first semester (London: Elliot Stock; New York: J. W. Bouton). In addition to its varied articles, the department called "The Antiquary Exchange" and the advertisements offer the subscriber a substantial return for his money. Moreover, the Antiquary's subscribers alone will have a chance to put down their names for the 350 copies of fac-simile reprints of the first editions of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress,' Walton's 'Compleat Angler,' and George Herbert's 'Temple,' after unique copies in the case of the first and third.——The Athenæum states that Mr. Moncure D. Conway has now in press a new and enlarged edition of his 'Demonology and Devil Lore.'——The English Dialect Society have published, through Trübner & Co., Part 2 of the 'Dictionary of English Plant-Names' compiled with infinite labor by Messrs. James Britten and Robert Holland. It ends with the letter O. In readableness, which is a quality not often ascribed to dictionaries, it falls something short of Part 1. Noticeable is the list of grasses, filling more than a dozen pages. "Meet-her-i'-th'-entry-kiss-her-i'-th'-buttery" (Viola tricolor) is thought to be the longest plant-name in the language; "Our Lord's flannel" is certainly among the queerest. Part 3, with a complete index, will appear early next year.

—Professor Eaton's 'Ferns of North America,' illustrated by colored figures and descriptions of all the species, published by Cassino, of Boston (formerly of Salem), is now completed, in two quarto volumes, with seventy-one plates and one or two extras. We noticed with praise the earlier parts of this truly classical fern-book. It began well and has gone on better, the author's part having been admirably sustained throughout, the drawings and their reproductions in colors having improved to the close. Mr. Faxon's drawings are especially commendable. A conspectus of all our ferns, with diagnostic characters, in systematic order, is appended to the second volume, to the great convenience and benefit of the users of the work, who have a summary of the latest views of a masterful pteridologist. The work is gracefully dedicated to Professor Gray. May he and his whilom pupil live to see the rest of the cryptogamic plants of our country as well elaborated and illustrated.

—A part of vol. xi. of the Journal of the American Oriental Society is already printed. This volume will contain miscellaneous contributions. Prof. Whitney's Index Verborum to the published text of the Atharva-Veda will form vol. xii. The books relating to the East, forming part of the library of the late Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, were bequeathed by him to the Society, and arrived at New Haven before the end of the last year. The number of titles in the collection is 365; the volumes, bound and unbound, numbering 284, the pamphlets, 122. The works relating to Egypt form the most important part of the collection, and include many costly publications. At the May meeting of the Society longer essays were read on "Palestinian Archæology," by Rev. Selah Merrill; "The True Site of Nineveh," by Porter C. Bliss; "Index Verborum to the Atharva-Veda," by Prof. Whitney; "Remarks on the Method and Processes of Comparative Mythology," by J. Luquiens; "Cataletic Vedic Verses of Seven Syllables," by Prof. C. R. Lanman; "Noun-inflection in the Sabean," by Prof. C. H. Toy; "A Certain Phonetic Change in Zend," by Mr. Luquiens; and "Rules of External Combination in Sanskrit," by Prof. Whitney.

—The Board of Trustees of Columbia College adopted, last month, a resolution committing that institution to the immediate establishment of a School of Political Science. The importance of this step, which will honorably distinguish the college above all others in this country, is self-evident The details of the conception are as follows: The course will be three years, and will be open only to collegians who have satisfactorily ended their Junior year (whether at Columbia or at some other college of equal grade). Pursuance of it for one year with credit will entitle the student, upon examination, to the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy; while the degree of Doctor of Philosophy will attest full and successful graduation. The studies will be thus distributed: First year—Physical Geography; Ethnography; History of the Literature of the Political Sciences; History of Philosophy; General and Special Political and Constitutional History of Europe and of the United States. Second year—The Roman Law; Comparative Jurisprudence of the existing Codes derived from the Roman Law; Comparative Constitutional Law of the principal European States and of the United States, as well as of the several States of the Union. Third year—History of Diplomacy; International Law; Comparative Administrative Law of the principal States of Europe and of the United States, as well as of the several States of the Union; Political Economy in all its branches; and Statistics. President Barnard and Professors Burgess, R. M. Smith, Alexander, E. M. Smith, and Bateman will constitute the corps of instruction. The annual tuition fee will be $150, except for seniors of the Columbia School of Arts and for students of the Law School, of whom no fee will be required. The term will begin on the first Monday in October, the previous Friday being assigned for matriculation. Students of Political Science will have the benefit without fee of the courses of instruction contemplated for "graduates of this and other colleges, in a large variety of subjects," according to a programme to be published shortly. We wish the new school all possible success. Its example cannot fail to bear fruit.

—Dr. George Ripley, whose death occurred in this city on the 4th inst., was a native of Greenfield, Mass., and had nearly attained his seventy-eighth year. For the past thirty-one years he has been the literary editor of the Tribune, with rare intervals of foreign travel. He graduated at Harvard in 1823, taught mathematics for a time at the college while completing his studies at the Divinity School, and in 1828 was settled over a Congregational church in Boston. In the division among the Unitarians which was signalized in 1838, he sided with the Transcendentalists, and when, in 1840, the Dial was founded Mr. Ripley was one of its editors. The next year he retired from the pulpit and took the leading part in the Brook Farm socialistic experiment, and held to it loyally till 1847, being the president of the association, of which the later phases were Fourieristic. Transition to service under Mr. Greeley was thus made easy, and Mr. Ripley joined the Tribune staff in 1849. His literary activity made him a contributor also to numerous periodicals, and he was one of the founders of Harper's Magazine. In connection with Mr. Charles A. Dana he edited the first and second editions of 'Appletons' Cyclopædia' (1858–63 and 1873–76). Before the close of his ministry he had directed the publication of a philosophical series entitled 'Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature,' in fourteen volumes, begun in 1838. As a reviewer he was the type of the "genial critic," much given to what the Tribune calls "expository reviews," not meaning by that mere scissors-work, but fluent—perhaps too fluent—summaries of the contents of the work under consideration. The fault of this habit was not alone its tendency to diffuseness, but its destruction of the sense of proportion. Nor can we regard it as fortunate for Dr. Ripley's reputation as a critic, or for the authority and variety of the Tribune's judgments upon books, that he was so exclusively the literary editor of that paper. The realm of criticism is emphatically a divisum imperium.

—An intelligent, and in some respects even striking, article in the Cornhill Magazine for June will remind discriminating admirers of Thoreau of the rather singular circumstance that, though he has now been dead nearly twenty years, and has been much written about, almost nothing to the purpose has been said of him. Almost every one who has praised or depreciated him has done it ill. Mr. Lowell's essay was certainly inadequate, as we believe Mr. Higginson pointed out at the time, without, however, wholly supplying its defects and omissions himself. Mr. Emerson prefaced one of Thoreau's books with a charming and even touching memoir, of which, nevertheless, the real summing up was contained in this lament: "Wanting ambition, instead of engineering for all America he was the captain of a huckleberry party. Pounding beans is good to the end of pounding empires one of these days; but if at the end of years it is still only pounding beans! . . ." Over two years ago an Englishman, Mr. H. A. Page, with characteristic good intentions, made a monograph upon Thoreau, chiefly to explain the miracles of St. Francis, or, as he said, to "illuminate one of the puzzles of the Middle Ages." Lately Mr. James in his 'Hawthorne' declared that Thoreau was "worse than provincial—he was parochial," and that "it is only at his best that he is readable." The essay in the Cornhill is, perhaps, better than any of these essays or allusions; it is signed only by the initials, "R. L. S.," which we remember to have seen but once before, though then appended to a remarkable article, unusual in both character and finish of literary manner, on "The Admirals of England." It makes many good points, the chief of which, perhaps, is the nature of Thoreau's egotism; "A more bald-headed view of life, if I may so express myself, or a more selfish, has seldom been presented." "The secret of his retirement lies not in misanthropy, of which he had no tincture, but partly in his engrossing design of self-improvement, etc."; "He had not enough of the superficial, even, at command; he could not swoop into a parlor and, in the naval phrase, 'cut out' a human being from that dreary port"—we are tempted to quote many instances of the original and searching way in which the writer examines on all sides Thoreau's well-known lack of geniality. Even here, however, where he is most acute, he fails to see that his "prig" and "skulker" really exhibits the same abandonment and elastic freedom upon the "bald-headed" plane on which he lives and moves; and that his surrender to his ideal is as complete and unselfish as if the ideal were more human and hearty—more "English" one may add, under the circumstances. But his main error "R. L. S." shares with all who have written about Thoreau; he conceives his subject as a philosopher rather than as an artist. Partial atonement for this is offered in omitting to consider Thoreau's "philosophy" as a practical code of conduct; he does not demonstrate anew the great truth that it would not do for everybody to live on Walden Pond and decline to pay his poll-tax. But this is a detail; the mistake of his general attitude is illustrated by a remark, that he finds it "curious and in some ways dispiriting that a writer may be always best corrected out of his own mouth."

—Nothing is more really elementary in criticism than the necessity of precisely the opposite attitude to this—at all events in dealing with what is called a "fine spirit," as Thoreau indisputably was. It is not there certainly that one seeks for a body of doctrine, some "Morrison's Pill," any complete and coherent system of independent and consistent principles. It is indeed Thoreau's distinction among the Transcendentalists, with whom he was contemporary and is always classed, but with whom he could never get along, that he was so far from having a system that he can scarcely be said to have had a method, whereas it was their distinction that a new and inner revelation had provided them with a scheme of the universe in the spiritual mortising of whose different parts no scrutiny could detect a flaw. To discover in his disjointed aphorisms, "thrown out" upon impulse at wisdom as it flies, or even in his reasoned reflections, direct contradictions, is inevitable; but to find this inspiriting rather than the reverse, to see that it is the pledge of their sincerity, their value, their poetic truth as it were, is the first step towards a sympathetic appreciation of Thoreau. No one could otherwise conceive of Heine's body of doctrine, to take an extreme instance. And if Thoreau's lack of humor, which was absolute, led him to misconceive himself, that surely is no reason for his readers doing so. "R. L. S." notes an exaggeration in him which he says "puts the reader on his guard"; as if all books worth reading and not text-books were to be read in any other way, and as if there were not a tonic property in the charm thus obtained never to be got from reading with implicit trustfulness. "R. L. S." again notes: "All fables, indeed, have their morals, but the innocent enjoy the story" as a two-edged apothegm discouragingly inconsistent in Thoreau's mouth. The point is that the apothegm is singularly felicitous and lights up a fact of experience with poetic truth. What Thoreau says apparently in the teeth of it has also its truth, and it is the reader's attitude of being "on his guard" that enables him to get something from both. The unanimity with which writers on Thoreau have, to our mind, gone wrong in this way is, indeed, a signal instance of reading him while off their guard and unconsciously applying in criticism of him what is now known as "the historic method"—the limitations of whose value, by the way, Thoreau aptly illustrates. We said just now that he was an artist rather than a philosopher, because it is unsafe to term loosely a poet any one whose highest expression does not seek some sort of metrical form. But he was certainly a poetic artist, and whoever writes of him adequately will not fail, as hitherto his critics have failed, to note the relative importance of that part of his writings which does not deal with ideas at all—e.g.:

"It is almost the only game which the trees play at, this tit for tat, now this side in the sun, now that, the drama of the day. In deep ravines under the eastern sides of cliffs Night forwardly plants her foot even at noon-day, and as Day retreats she steps into his trenches, skulking from tree to tree, from fence to fence, until at last she sits in his citadel and draws out her forces into the plain."

It is clearly a forgetfulness of some of the beauties of our not over-rich American literature, whose first thought about the writer of even such "pretty imagery" as doubtless these lines might be called, is that "he was worse than provincial; he was parochial."

—M. de Mas-Latrie, a member of the Académie des Inscriptions, communicated to that body in May some highly important discoveries made by him in the archives of the Venetian inquisitors—namely, loose sheets of reports of the sessions of the Council of Ten, always profoundly secret. The special evidence which they afford is of the willingness of the Council to entertain, through their ambassadors and agents, propositions for poisoning their enemies, whether Christian or infidel. The Turks, with whom the Republic was in 1477 at war, were sorely pressing it all along the Adriatic coast; so that when the Jew Salamoncini and his brothers offered to arrange the taking off of Mahomet II. through his physician, Valcho, also a Jew, the Council, on the 9th of July, voted to entertain the proposition. As the text reads: "Quod oblatio Salamoncini hebrei et fratrum dandi scilicet necis imperatori Turcorum per operam magistri Valchi hebrei, acceptetur." What the assassins demanded in return for their service was certain privileges of banking and trade without the customary exactions, and to these the Council assented, if assured that Mahomet's death was clearly the work of the undertakers: "Et, auctoritate hujus Consilii, promittantur sibi omnia quæ ipsi petierunt, cum observatione eorum quando, interveniente morte Turchi, ostendere erit illum per operam prefati magistri Valchi mortuum esse." It is to be noticed that six of the Doge's college who, with the Doge himself, had the right to attend these sessions, were actually present; and theirs may have been the three negative and three blank ballots recorded against the ten affirmative. On the 9th of November the sixteen voters were unanimous in favor of accepting an offer of two Turks to poison two officers conducting the siege of Croia; and the chiefs of the Council were charged with transmitting the poison. Early in 1478 one Amico was allowed to name the terms on which "the Turk" should be poisoned in the course of a year. Troublesome banished Venetians were made the objects of similar attempts in 1525–6. On the 3d of July, 1518, the ambassador of the Republic at Rome forwarded a proposal on the part of one Agostino dal Sol to proceed to Germany and poison Prince Eugene, brother of John of Lusignan, and an aspirant for the throne of Cyprus. M. de Mas-Latrie promises to examine what remains of the archives still more minutely.

—Prof. Hillebrand's second article on English life, published in the June Nineteenth Century, is devoted to the church and religious phenomena. To say that it is in the highest degree original and plain-spoken, is to convey but an inadequate idea of its character; it seems, in fact, as if the writer had taken upon himself the task of performing, on a considerable scale, what Mr. Matthew Arnold's mythical Prussian attempted in an experimental fashion some ten years ago. Prof. Hillebrand's key-note is struck on his first page, where he remarks that England "is the only country in Europe where the passions, interests, and ideas which animated the countrymen of Luther are still living." Intolerance is the predominant intellectual feature in England, as polite and respectful indifference is on the Continent. In France and Germany, of course, intolerance is to be found, but it is ex-officio, not individual; "it is entirely limited to the clergy in Germany, it is wholly political in France." In the former country, especially, religion has become purely mechanical: "The restoration of authority is the only aim and only interest both in the Catholic Church and in the Protestant. It is the only surviving principle of positive religion; and if the Pope to-morrow, the Oberkirchenrath the day after to-morrow, should declare that the sun turns round the earth, the whole clergy, and all the laymen who use the clergy as an instrument for social and political conservatism, would accept the decision."

—In England, of course, Prof. Hillebrand finds the reverse of all this, but it is worth while to follow him in his explanation of the contrast. In Germany, religious development "has been a regular one from rigid orthodoxy to religious enthusiasm, from religious enthusiasm to a religious sympathy, and from that to absolute indifference as to positive religion"; while "the admirable pacific development of old England in the last century has been violently interrupted [by the Evangelical movement]; you have been thrown back a hundred years, and the defenders of secular science, who might have taken off their hats reverently to Christ and Christianity, as Locke and even Hume did, and as the Germans generally do, are obliged to attack them if they do not want to be oppressed themselves, not by laws and policemen, but by social convention." Wesley, Prof. Hillebrand points out, was by no means original in his views, for "he came fifty years after Spener and Francke, and learned the chief article of his creed from their followers," so that the Germans "have a religious start of at least fifty years." But the Evangelical movement was not the only separating influence; the different character of the English and German clergy has been an almost equally strong one. "The English clergy are far more refined than the German, but this very refinement, if it brings them into closer contact with the gentry, separates them to a certain degree from their humbler congregations, and thus . . . unfits them for the work of educating mentally those who are so far beneath them. . . . I have no doubt, too, that the great majority of your clergy possess far stronger religious convictions and a deeper earnestness than ours; but the whole condition of England shows that they have failed in doing what ours have done—that is, in preventing the spread of an ignorant and morbid religious fanaticism." Even the middle classes, Prof. Hillebrand thinks, are now threatened by the rising tide of scepticism; and since, with them, "religion is the one ideal interest, and religious services their only recreation," he enquires sorrowfully, "What will be the result when they lose at once all their amusements and all that has lent their lives a higher interest?"

DANGEROUS AMERICAN TENDENCIES.*

THE essays of which this volume is made up originally appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, and it would not be difficult to guess from internal evidence, even if the authorship were not now well known, that they were written by a clergyman. It is not, however, from the religious point of view that they are interesting. The author's chief gift is one of description. His pictures of American life contained in the volume are exact photographs, though they are photographs almost altogether of American life in its moral aspects.

Perhaps the fairest way to look at the picture presented by him is to dissociate it entirely at first from the United States and think how it would strike us if we did not know what country it represented. The details of the picture are as follows: A nation, democratic in government and social organization, emerged fifteen years ago from a protracted and bloody civil war, which destroyed hundreds of millions of property and left a debt of some two thousand millions behind it in addition to this destruction. For a generation before the war this country had been absorbed in a political struggle over the institution of slavery, to the exclusion of all other social or economical questions. This struggle over slavery had been carried on on the successful side under the lead of a small band of "humanitarians," whose methods of reasoning on this and other subjects were intuitive. The creation of the debt having been accompanied by an inflation of the currency, the war was not followed by retrenchment and economy, but by extravagant expenditure and recklessness. Everybody seemed to be growing rich at once, although everybody was, as a matter of fact, poorer than he had been fifteen years before. This condition of things had its natural effects in the domain of morals. Steady industry of all kinds came to be regarded as in a great measure unnecessary, and numbers of men who had down to the time of the war gained their daily bread by honest work now began to live by their wits, and by organizing and controlling enterprises and schemes of all kinds for the investment of other people's money. Wages went up with prices, and encouraged profusion and waste even among workingmen. Everybody became intoxicated with a fancied prosperity to which there seemed to be no limit.

The nominal faith or religion of this happy country had always been what is known as Evangelical Protestantism, but "the real religion of the people was already, to a great extent, a decorous worldliness." In fact, the religious force in the community was gradually dying out. Many ministers and multitudes of the more intelligent members of the churches had become sceptical even in regard to the cardinal doctrines of the faith they professed. Preaching became everywhere more and more speculative and rationalistic. Below the sceptics there was a large class of people "in whom prehistoric or savage thought still survived, with very slight modifications from science or any other modern influence." These believed in luck, omens, dreams, signs, and wonders, and in the presence and influence of the dead, whom they from time to time consulted in various ways. They had usually a scorn of historical and, indeed, of all other facts, as well as a profound aversion to scientific methods of investigation. Thoroughgoing sentimentalists, they depended on intuition and "the great instincts of humanity" to guide them, and thought that it would be a great gain "to stop trying to patch up the old systems of religion and law, and begin anew." These queer people's only form of religion was their adoration of a "free platform," and they were willing to make all kinds of experiments under its inspiration. They have, among other things, tried some sexual experiments of a character which has hitherto been regarded as criminal, but these were generally the result of a devotion to theory rather than of ungoverned passion. This class is now busily engaged in educating the country, and as they have to a great extent abjured the doctrine of individual responsibility for wrong-doing, and have a great fluency of extempore utterance, they are very successful in making converts; "they have many organized societies, travelling lecturers and missionaries, and a score or two of newspapers, besides an enormous literature of their own, if one may apply the word literature to their productions." "It is a great and successful movement for the propagation of uneducated thought, the spectacle of the untaught classes and disorganizing forces of the time taking possession of the printing-press, of the rostrum, and of the ballot, and attacking modern society with its own weapons. It is a wide-spread revolt against civilization." This class numbers several millions. Among other theories they incline to think all labor unnecessary, and regard employers as oppressors. Here, of course, they are followed by a large number of the working-class, "who have no theories or ideas of progress, but who have done little honest work since the great inflation of prices a few years ago." These regard the capitalist as their natural enemy, and what they most desire is to advance the interests of labor by crippling capital in every possible way. They are taught to regard works of art and science, and the products and appliances of refined wealth, as causes and symbols of the laborer's degradation. Their immediate point of attack is the currency, which they have been for some years endeavoring to bring under the immediate control of the people in mass-meeting assembled. Beyond this they have a general desire to destroy the constitutional and representative character of the Government, so that if it seems desirable everything may be decided anew at each election. Meanwhile religion is not extinct, but is constantly losing ground. Morality based on religion has "to a fatal extent broken down." Multitudes of religious men are dishonest in the private relations of life. Abuse of trust and defalcation have become common offences.

Such is the depressing picture of a country which shall be nameless, drawn by the author of this volume in his first essay. The question suggested by this picture of course is, What ought to be done? Is there any salvation for such a country? or must it go on in its downward path until civilization becomes extinct, or until it falls a prey to some hardier and better-governed race? The remedy suggested by the author, the publication of "broadsides" and newspapers devoted to the cultivation of an elevated public sentiment, is so palpably inadequate that it would be hardly worth mentioning, except as an illustration of the remarkable confidence that all clergymen have in exhortation as a means of social improvement, and of the national reliance upon the efficacy of popular "movements" to effect all social objects. As a matter of fact, no answer can be given to the question. The forces which are described are so enormous and so pervading that it would be as idle to talk about restraining or impeding them by any set plan as to talk of altering the laws of nature. It is obvious that in the country described what are vaguely called the "forces of modern society" have got the upper hand, and are carrying everything before them. It is the delusion of the author of this volume that they can be effectively opposed by "getting up a movement" against them. But a movement of any kind requires popular support, and popular support is just what those who oppose popular tendencies cannot have. If, as the author seems to think, the world, or a certain part of it, is really entering a new dark age, in which a rising tide of barbarism will threaten the very foundations of the social order, the forces which must be relied upon to preserve civilization are those which have hitherto preserved it and made it what it is. What Mill called Individualism is what the democratic forces of to-day are threatening with extinction, and Mill saw very clearly that civilization depends upon individualism. In the last hundred years the world has become so accustomed to the identification of popular improvement with uprisings of the people and the vote of the majority, that it has almost forgotten that popular movements are worth nothing except so far as they are guided by reason, and that reason is the slow product of the individual search for truth. It is the old story of Socrates drinking hemlock for teaching doctrines disagreeable to the Athenians. The Athenians were the most enlightened people of the fifth century before Christ (and they were accustomed to boast of their enlightenment very much as the nineteenth century after Christ does), but the name of Socrates has lived and those of his accusers have perished. On the principles which, according to the book before us, are becoming the guiding principles of a certain country, the Athenians were right and Socrates was wrong.

It is not necessary that everybody who fights against the evil tendencies of popular ignorance and superstition which always threaten civilization should be tried, or should drink poison; but it is necessary that those of one generation who receive the torch of civilization from their predecessors should feel that it is a trust received in the interest of right, reason, and truth, and individual liberty of belief, which they are bound to defend at all costs against ignorance, tyranny, and superstition, whether of the few or of the many. This is individualism as opposed to the rule of the mob, and its cultus is fortunately reinforced by selfish as well as disinterested considerations. To sum up what we have said, the tendencies which the author of this volume deplores are the tendencies, in great measure, of modern civilization. If the finest and most beautiful thing in the progress of the world is the production of individual excellence in character, in intellect, in art, or in science, then these tendencies are evil, and they must be resisted, as they always have been resisted, by the devotion of civilized men to these objects, without regard to consequences. A popular movement in favor of individualism would be an excellent thing, but it would be an anomaly even in the singular country described in this volume.

We have not left ourselves room to speak of the remainder of the volume as it deserves. The author is, as we have said, a born observer, and his studies of New England factory life, and workingmen, workingmen's wives, and the "Nationals" are well worth reading. He observes, too, as few people do, beneath the surface, and is consequently able to present to his readers the moral complexion of what he studies. As an illustration of this faculty we may mention that in a chapter on "Sincere Demagogy" he points out the curious resemblance—which as soon as it is stated proves itself—between much of the social speculations of the gifted author of 'Émile' and that of our blatant demagogues who lead "workingmen's movements." It is, as he says, highly improbable that this resemblance proceeds from familiarity on the part of these thinkers with the writings of Rousseau. They are most likely unacquainted even with his name. They think as he did because both he and they represent what the author very justly elsewhere calls the "prehistoric" order of thought.

KOSSUTH AND THE ITALIAN CAMPAIGN OF 1859.—II.*

THE remaining portions of this interesting volume of 'Memories' deal with the campaign in Italy, and are richer in elements of dramatic interest than those which came under notice in our preceding article. We are not actually brought upon any of the great battle-fields. We perceive, as it were, the smoke of these great struggles rising on the horizon, and the roar of the artillery comes to us only from a distance. But we are allowed to watch the emotions with which a people followed the accomplishment of their emancipation; we learn the mingled hopes and fears with which Italian and Hungarian refugees followed the campaign through each successive phase, until the armistice of July 8, like a blow from an iron mace, seemed in a single moment to smite them out of conscious life. As Kossuth passed from city to city, on his way to Napoleon's headquarters, the Italians greeted him with enthusiasm. They recognized the champion of the same cause in which they were fighting—the enemy of their enemy. These receptions are very vividly described by the hero of them in a series of letters to his wife, the unstudied character of which brings out very clearly the single-minded patriotism of Louis Kossuth. While he had been negotiating in London, battles were being fought and won in Italy.

"I arrived," he tells us, "at Geneva from England on June 22, two days before the great battle of Solferino, which was preceded by the victories of Montebello, Palestra, Casteggio, and Magenta. The struggle was sanguinary. The superiority of the allies in tactics was brilliantly demonstrated. Meanwhile, General Klapka, my colleague on the committee, in one of his letters to me, expressed the opinion that the possibility of an untoward turn of events on the Mincio was not excluded; the Austrian soldier was becoming accustomed to warfare, and might sooner or later acquire a knowledge of the French method of attack, and then decision would simply rest with the superior numerical strength. These apprehensions no doubt weighed also upon the Emperor's mind, and we might, therefore, hope that he would readily assist us in our preparations. He stood in need of men who would be under an obligation to him—and where could he find such more willing than in Hungary, provided he lent us assistance?"

Kossuth did not participate in the too sanguine expectations of his friend—the defender of Komorn. He perceived no preparations being made for the despatch of an army to Hungary, without which he had resolutely declined to have anything to do with the projects of the Emperor. General Klapka, it is true, with other Hungarian exiles, had been empowered to raise and discipline a force to be called "The Hungarian Legion"; and in this legion about a thousand men had enrolled themselves. But beyond this, nothing, so far as Kossuth could see, was being done by the allied sovereigns for the cause which he had at heart. "Nearly every letter," he says, "which I received from Italy gave me the impression, to begin with, that all efforts were being concentrated to trying, through the Hungarian refugees, to influence and create dissension among their countrymen fighting in the Austrian ranks, without the allies (as a return service) identifying themselves with the Hungarian cause." The "Hungarian Legion" threatened, in fact, to become nothing more than an imposing cat's-paw to pick Austrian chestnuts out of the fire for the advantage of the allied kings. It would, of course, immensely benefit the allies if a steady stream of desertion went on from the Austrian ranks into those of the Hungarian Legion, but the cause of Hungary would be injured in the precise proportion in which that of the allies was benefited. The more completely the military strength of Austria was thus sapped, the less need would there be for embracing Hungary in the theatre of military operations. The soldiers of the Hungarian Legion were, in fact, merely compromising themselves with the Austrian Government without being of the least service to their country. Not every Hungarian was endowed with the prudence and foresight of Kossuth. To the larger part of them the infliction of an injury on the hated Austrian Government was equivalent to a service done to Hungary, and thus they were in danger of falling an easy prey to the schemes of the allied sovereigns. Kossuth resolved to strike at the root of this mischief at once. Either the independence of Hungary must be made, as he had stipulated, an object of the war co-ordinate with the independence of Italy, or, so far as he could prevent it, not a drop of Hungarian blood should be shed—at least in the ranks of the allies.

* 'Memories of My Exile. By Louis Kossuth. Translated from the original Hungarian by Ferencz Jausz.' London: Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co; New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

Almost immediately after his arrival at Geneva Kossuth started for the headquarters of the Emperor. At Turin he had an interview with Cavour, but could obtain no satisfactory assurances from that minister. At Parma he met Prince Napoleon. Everywhere the Italian people greeted him with enthusiasm. "If sympathy," he writes to his wife, "could save my poor country it would be saved, but the people can only love; their fate, like ours, is in the hands of others." He gives a very pleasing account of his reception at Piacenza. He arrived there late at night unrecognized.

"I slept peacefully, and at eight o'clock sat down to breakfast still unrecognized. At this moment the waiter brought in the visitors' list. Nicholas Kiss entered my name; the waiter says, 'Grazie,' and goes. At the door he cast a look over the names, and looked back at us with eyes that can only be compared to the first eruptions of fire from a volcano. He ran like mad down the steps, and before five minutes—no, scarcely three minutes—had passed by, the thirty thousand inhabitants knew it. They rushed into the street as if the alarm-bell had called them; they were coming from all directions, and stood underneath my window and shouted 'Evviva!' as if they intended to bring down the firmament of heaven by their voices. The mayor and all the municipal officers came into my room to pay their respects to me, to offer their services, to beg my commands; the venerable Montanelli, a late minister of Tuscany, who lost his left arm at Curtatone, where he fought as a volunteer in 1848, came accompanied by many officers of the civil guard, but he himself dressed like a private soldier; in a word, everybody came. Half an hour afterwards, when I was stepping into a carriage, everybody who could come near me kissed my hands and clothes. We moved along with great difficulty, and had scarcely reached the street when the people unharnessed the horses and themselves drew us through the town, while crowds streamed towards me from every street; thousands followed me, flowers were thrown from the windows, and the people honored the poor homeless traveller with the perfect frenzy of young liberty's first intoxication. And why? Because they identify his name with that of liberty, the perception of which runs like a current of electricity through the nerves of humanity."

At Parma he visited Prince Napoleon. He recalled the interview with the Emperor at Paris nearly two months before. Since then Kossuth had removed the obstacle which, according to the Emperor, stood in the way of a French army being despatched to Hungary. British neutrality was now assured under all circumstances. What, then, was the Emperor prepared to do? Would he send an army or not? To this the Prince gave no direct reply. The losses of the campaign had been so heavy that, at present, they had no soldiers to spare for this purpose. No positive engagement could be entered into. But Kossuth could influence Hungarian soldiers to come over and fight against Austrian. If he did this the Emperor would be under a moral obligation towards Hungary, and would not leave the patriots. To this proposal Kossuth returned a flat refusal. He would do nothing except under the conditions he had stipulated for at Paris; and after a few days' stay at Parma, he received a message from the Emperor desiring him to come to army headquarters as speedily as possible. At Milan he saw the Emperor.

"First of all," Kossuth writes to his wife, "I gave an account of the result of my mission to England. I did so only verbally, lest I should appear to be boasting; but Pietri interrupted: 'Yet the strangest part, sire, is that M. Kossuth has in his pocket the letters of the English Cabinet Ministers, by which they engage that England will remain neutral even if we go to Hungary.' 'Indeed,' said the Emperor; 'may I see them?' I handed him the letters. They seemed to interest him very much. He read them one after the other, smiling every now and again, and shook his head as if astonished. Then I spoke: 'Your Majesty can see,' I said, 'that I have not only faithfully carried out the task I had taken upon myself, but I have accomplished it with even greater success than I had promised, and I now feel compelled to ask what are your designs with regard to Hungary?'"

The Emperor declared, in response to this question, that he was "firmly decided to make Hungary independent." "Without Hungary's independence," Kossuth reports him as saying, "I should not gain my object in Italy, and should expose the future to dangerous uncertainties. Therefore, consider it an accomplished fact." These were words which meant nothing. They were spoken on the 2d of July, when the Emperor must have already decided upon the Peace of Villafranca. Louis Napoleon was, in fact, at that very moment being tossed upon the horns of the dilemma which hunted him through life. He desired to be, at once, both a king among kings and a revolutionary among revolutionaries. He wanted to tear up the treaties of 1815 in order to gratify at once the wounded pride and the democratic tendencies of the French nation; but he desired, at the same time, so to do it as not to alarm the susceptibilities of the European sovereigns. The result was to arouse the suspicions and kindle the anger of both peoples and kings. The upshot of the present interview with Kossuth was that the Emperor requested him to "send into his camp as soon as possible some battalions wearing the tight Hungarian trousers." The Emperor represented this as a matter on which he placed great importance; and Kossuth, with Pietri as his companion, returned to Turin to carry out the Emperor's wishes with the utmost despatch possible. The Hungarian legion had by this time acquired a strength of close upon four thousand men. By the 5th of July Kossuth was back in Turin; he went to Geneva on the 6th, where the Hungarian legion was being organized; and there on the 8th, as by an avalanche, his hopes were overwhelmed and crushed by the intelligence that an armistice had been concluded. At first the refugees clung to the hope that the intelligence was false:

"We went on amidst dreadful mental agony. In a few days Pietri came rushing to me with agitated mien and said, 'Malheur! malheur à nous! C'est fini! Tout est perdu! Lisez ceci!' He handed me an autograph letter addressed to him by the Emperor. I wept like a child and could scarcely read it. The contents of the letter were to the following effect: 'We have well considered the matter on all sides with the Prince and the King, and, however reluctantly, have come to the conclusion that we must make peace. This time we cannot go further. This is now an end to the war. Tell M. Kossuth that I am extremely sorry that the liberation of his country must now be left alone. I cannot do otherwise. It is an impossibility. But I beg him not to lose heart, but to trust to me and the future. Meanwhile he may be assured of my friendly feelings towards him, and I beg him to dispose of me with regard to his own person and his children.' When I came to this point of the letter, I could not control myself sufficiently to prevent my revolted feelings from venting themselves in a bitter exclamation. 'Yes, yes,' I said, 'such are those crowned heads! Such is their idea of the creature that is called "man"! To the wind with the fatherland! A bagful of money to the man, and he will console himself! Senator, pray tell your master that his Majesty the Emperor of the French is not rich enough to offer alms to Louis Kossuth, and Louis Kossuth is not mean enough to accept them. He has turned me out of my position. Well, my sons will gain our living by their work. Je vous salue.' All was over. There was nothing left to be done except to look after the honorable dissolution of our army and the personal safety of those poor brave Hungarian fellows who had enlisted in it."

We must not take leave of this most valuable contribution to history without expressing our admiration for the style in which it has been translated. The translator's English is clear, forcible, and idiomatic.

A HISTORY OF THE AGE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.*

MR. McCARTHY is an exceedingly sober and calm narrator of the events of his time and country. He seems to have completely outlived all fanaticism and enthusiasm—if he ever cherished any—as to party, country, creed, or system. In a historian of contemporary or almost contemporary events this is a considerable merit, though it is apt to deprive his work of the charms of impassioned diction and symmetrically rounded pictures such as enliven the pages of writers combining ardor with ability. Liberal, mildly optimistic, an admirer of England and her great sons, a friend of justice and peace, Mr. McCarthy manifests his predilections and sentiments with studied reserve and impartiality, and occasionally betrays a disposition bordering on indifference. Unprejudiced and almost chillingly passionless as he is, however, he is not unable to understand and make due allowance for the prejudices and passions of others in the near past. His style is strongly influenced by this calmness and absence of warmth. It is always clear and plain, never florid or glowing, sometimes flat. The views expressed are generally sound, rarely striking. There is no lack of didactic observations, but rather too much of commonplace sententiousness. Correct characterizations abound, but analytical subtlety is rarely noticeable. No reader, however well informed, will find Mr. McCarthy's portraits of Cobden or Bright, Wellington or Palmerston, Disraeli or Gladstone, O'Connell or Sheil, Prince Albert or Cardinal Newman, Czar Nicholas or Kossuth undeserving of an attentive perusal; but even he to whom much of the delineation will be new must find the execution more or less hasty and the shading defective, though a part of the figure may be excellently done. And as with men so Mr. McCarthy deals with questions. He presents the gist of the matter, shows its salient points, makes the aspect of the whole clear, but avoids intricacies, rarely pries below the surface, and cares little for details. On the whole, this history "of our own times"—which is, however, only a history of England in our time—is written for readers more or less familiar with the events and the personages of the period, and is intended to amuse and enlighten them by interesting and lucid summaries rather than to instruct them about particulars. Thus considered, the book is very good, almost excellent, though not without blemishes.

Its greatest defect as a literary production is the non-observance of a uniformly dignified tone and chaste diction worthy of serious history for intelligent readers. Mr. McCarthy is too often inclined "to use a vulgar word," "a cant phrase," "a homely phrase," or a homely comparison, as in the following: "Not many of Napier's admirers cared a rush about the merits of the quarrel . . ."; "The unhappy sheriffs were placed, as the homely old saying would describe it, between the devil and the deep sea"; "Lord Palmerston . . . has undertaken the business of the Home Office for the same reason as that given by Fritz, in the 'Grande Duchesse,' for becoming a schoolmaster"; "Palmerston is, to all appearance, what would be vulgarly called 'out of the swim'"; "The very name of Palmerston produced on Louis Philippe and his minister the effect vulgarly said to be wrought on a bull by the display of a red rag"; "Lord Melbourne . . . had grown into something like the condition of a pampered old hall-porter . . ."; "Nicholas was as much disappointed as an honest highwayman of the days of Captain Macheath might have been. . ." Nor ought he to have crowded to get, could get, and to get up into six lines (at the end of chapter viii.), or to have repeated (in chapters xvii. and xix.), a dozen times—in order to inculcate a moral lesson—how utterly wicked it was on the part of Louis Philippe to plot the Spanish marriages. Our author's treatment of this king is altogether extremely harsh, and to a high degree unjust—which is surprising in a book so remarkable for fairness and charitableness. Louis Philippe, we are told, "had a great training," but "all his promise as a man faded when his seeming success began to shine. He had apparently learned nothing of adversity; he was able to learn nothing of prosperity and greatness." "He seemed, at one time, to have no real faith in anything but chicane. He made the fairest professions and did the meanest, falsest things." "His very bourgeois virtues, on which he was so much inclined to boast himself, had been a sham; for he had carried out schemes," etc., which again refers to the Spanish marriages, and is followed by a comparison more offensive than any quoted above. Tantumne iræ in a writer so devoid of political animosity! Mr. McCarthy is also severe on the Melbourne Ministry, on Young Ireland, and especially on "the Pope's brass-band," but his strictures on all these are comparatively mild and more fully deserved. O'Connell he treats with great discrimination, and, considering the limits of the book, almost exhaustively. Here follows a small portion of the sketch:

"In many respects O'Connell differed from more modern Irish Nationalists. He was a thorough Liberal; he was a devoted opponent of negro slavery; he was a stanch Free-trader; he was a friend of popular education; he was an enemy to all excess; he was opposed to strikes; he was an advocate of religious equality everywhere; and he declined to receive the commands of the Vatican in his political agitation. 'I am a Catholic, but I am not a Papist,' was his own definition of his religious attitude. He preached the doctrine of constitutional agitation strictly, and declared that no political reform was worth the shedding of one drop of blood. It may be asked how it came about that with all these excellent attributes, which all critics now allow to him, O'Connell was so detested by the vast majority of the English people. One reason undoubtedly is that O'Connell deliberately revived and worked up for political purposes the almost extinct national hatreds of Celt and Saxon. As a phrase of political controversy he may be said to have invented the word 'Saxon.' He gave a terrible license to his tongue. His abuse was outrageous; his praise was outrageous. The very effusiveness of his loyalty told to his disadvantage. People could not understand how one who perpetually denounced 'the Saxon' could be so enthusiastic and rapturous in his professions of loyalty to the Saxon's Queen. . . . Yet O'Connell was probably quite sincere in his professions of loyalty. He was in no sense a revolutionist. He had, from his education in a French college, acquired an early detestation of the principles of the French Revolution. Of the Irish rebels of '98 he spoke with as savage an intolerance as the narrowest English Tories could show in speaking of himself. . . . His theory and his policy evidently were that Ireland was to be saved by a dictatorship entrusted to himself, with the Irish priesthood acting as his officers and agents."

The order which Mr. McCarthy observes in his book is the chronological. He rarely deviates from it, and generally only then when, as in the case of the various attempts on the life of the Queen, the single events narrated have no connection with other simultaneous occurrences, while their character naturally connects them with each other. The alternation of topics adds to the attractiveness of the work. The scantiness of dates, however, obscures the chronological order, and must here and there lead to misconceptions. Thus, the "Opium War" is so told that the reader may doubt whether it was carried on for months or years—whether in 1840, in 1841, or in 1842. All he learns as to its chronology is that in April, 1840, there was, apparently before its outbreak, a debate in Parliament on the difficulties with China, and that on March 3, 1843, five huge wagons arrived in front of the London Mint, bringing the first instalment of the war indemnity imposed on the Celestial Empire by the treaty of peace. In the account of the first Afghan war no date occurs between "October 1, 1838," and "November 2, 1840." The wars in Scinde and with the Sikhs are related without a single date. We are told only that they were waged during Peel's administration—that is, some time between September, 1841, and June, 1846. Omissions of this kind, however, can still be remedied by a chronological index at the end of the whole work. Such an index, if carefully done and made to include many facts purposely or inadvertently omitted in the text, would add considerably to the value of this interesting history. In the work as it is—owing, perhaps, in part to the infrequency of dates and other precise particulars—few inaccuracies are easily discoverable. The gravest we have noticed may be attributed to a kind of nonchalance in writing. Thus, we read of Peter the Great and Catharine II.: "He was followed, after a reign or two, by a woman of genius," etc. The fact is that between those two rulers there were the six reigns of Catharine I., Peter II., Anna, Ivan, Elizabeth, and Peter III.

Recollections of Travel in New Zealand and Australia. By James Coutts Crawford, F.G.S. (London: Trübner & Co. 1880.)—There are things in Mr. Crawford's book to strike the American with a mild consternation. Travelling about as nearly as may be at the antipodes, thirteen thousand miles or so from New York and as much from London, in the vast inchoate archipelago which we are apt to look upon too much, perhaps, as made up only of the scrap ends of creation, he comes occasionally to a city of two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, "with public buildings on a grand scale, built most solidly of stone as if meant to last for all time." It has a public library, a national gallery, an industrial museum, benevolent institutions of all sorts, a grand race-course, and suburban lines of railway conveying passengers to the seaside. This is Melbourne, Australia; and compared with it, "San Francisco, being mostly built of wood, is vastly inferior in construction." He takes the train for the interior and stops at Ballarat. Who of us has heard of Ballarat? Nevertheless it is a handsome city, substantially built of stone and brick, with parks and gardens, "really splendid public buildings," and sixty thousand inhabitants, on the site of the tents and shanties of the recent gold-diggings. Coasting along the thousand-mile stretch of his own island home, New Zealand, he touches at eight considerable towns. He sees a number of the largest things of their kinds (quite after the manner of phrasing that was wont to be American) not merely in Australasia but in the world: the largest quartz-crushing machine, and at Melbourne the largest organ. He finds the American newspapers even—but this will not be believed—inferior to the Australian. There is certainly food for reflection in this. May we not begin to look upon ourselves as, instead of the latest and freshest of time's progeny, of a certain sober middle age? These South Pacific colonies are on a tremendous scale; they have the same constituents of race as ourselves, German, Irish, Scandinavian, with the Anglo-Saxon domination; and favorable conditions of climate. While we dally over the essentially American arts and literature that are demanded of us, will the prestige perhaps be suddenly snatched away by essentially Australian or New-Zealandic ones?

Mr. Crawford's best excuse for appearing in print, we should say, is more his good fortune in having been on the ground than any special gift of observation, enlarged interest, or literary faculty. He has lived in New Zealand many years, has held the offices of resident magistrate and member of the Legislative Council, and taken part in the geological survey of one of its provinces, Wellington. It has been his habit during this time to make journeys into the interior, with now and then one by sea. They range over forty years, beginning with a transit, in charge of cattle, across Southern Australia, from Sidney to Adelaide, in 1839. Their early dates would prevent many of these from having any contemporaneous value; added to which a number were professedly made without notes. Moreover, the incidents throughout are of a very slight character. There is a great deal too much of the condition of the wind, and swollen fords, and cranky boats, on particular occasions, and small personal haps and mishaps, without dramatic interest in the telling to make them an object in themselves, seeing that they might have taken place in one part of the world as well as another.

We get an idea of the Maoris as a tractable, mercenary people, capable of considerable civilization, but rapidly diminishing. The New Zealand climate is not unlike our own. This colony professes free-trade, but the small manufacturers clamor for protection of native industry. A leading political question has been until lately a conflict between a central government and those of numerous provinces, into which the colony resolved itself in the early days when communications were difficult. Centralization prevailed, and the provinces — almost a species of separate states—were abolished; an instance, the author esteems it, parallel in its way to the result of the civil war in the United States and to recent events in Germany, in conformity with an enlightened progress. Particulars of this kind are welcome, and we should have been glad of a great many more of them. The truly fascinating work on Australasia will deal liberally with facts, figures, and dimensions for a considerable time to come. Let it not be afraid of a guide-book air. Perhaps Mr. Crawford, in writing for his own part of the world as well as ours, has feared to be trite in informing it of what it knew already perfectly well, and has thus fallen between two stools. As it is now, we should say his principal success might be with Australasian Old Settlers' Clubs.

The author has not travelled in New Zealand and Australia alone, but has twice made the journey to England also, once by way of India and once of America. He has thought proper to swell his volume with these tours in quite as full detail as the rest. They are by no means the least entertaining part of it; but in fact the greater animation of these portions furnishes room for inferences of a paucity of interest in New Zealand itself which we are not willing to draw. At the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York he observed elderly ladies with "wigs of a grey color curled or frizzled all over." The effect of this was good. There were also some elderly gentlemen "who had adopted the fashion of long hair in what we should call the poetical style. The effect of this was also good."

A Treatise on Comparative Embryology. By F. M. Balfour. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880. vii. pp. 492, xiii., 8vo. 275 figures.)—Mr. Balfour has undertaken a most difficult task, and has, on the whole, succeeded in compiling an admirable résumé of the immense mass of embryological information which has been so rapidly accumulating during the last twenty years. We have, it is true, short chapters on embryology in 'Text-Books of Comparative Anatomy and of Zoölogy,' and we have for the higher vertebrates the admirable volumes of Kölliker and the manual of Forster and Balfour; but with the exception of the 'Life Histories' of Packard there is no text-book on embryology covering the whole field of the animal kingdom. The study of embryology has been radically changed in the last twenty years; its problems have assumed an importance scarcely realized by the older writers, and it is fortunate that the first attempt to analyze and digest the often contradictory statements of modern embryologists should be made by one who is an original investigator himself, thoroughly familiar with all the recent methods of investigation, and whose embryological papers take a high rank in the literature of the subject. It has, of course, been impossible in a great many cases to decide between conflicting statements, but the points of difference are always clearly stated by Mr. Balfour, and the student will readily find for himself the subjects which are likely to yield him the richest harvest in the way of original work.

Each group of the animal kingdom is taken up separately, and the reader will find carefully analyzed the materials gathered from all that has been written up to the present time. The chapters on Systematic Embryology are preceded by a general statement of the scope of embryology, and by three chapters on the general phenomena of segmentation of the egg and the structure of its earliest stages. Wherever sufficient material is accessible Mr. Balfour has added some interesting chapters on the phylogeny of certain groups. It is very evident, however, that, except as ingenious speculations, phylogenetic theories disconnected from palæontological evidence have but little value. The present volume is limited to invertebrates; it is amply illustrated, the cuts are good and well printed. The bibliography which accompanies each chapter is one of its most important features; this has been collected as an appendix (containing over 500 titles), and will form an admirable nucleus for embryological bibliography hereafter.

If we may be allowed to find any fault with so good a book as this, it is that perhaps too great stress has been laid upon the earlier stages of the embryonic development, and that sufficient weight has not been given to the later stages of growth. This is specially apparent in the chapters on Crustacea, on Annelids, on Cœlenterata, on Brachiopods, and on Polyzoa. That part of the subject would, if somewhat more fully treated, have greatly enhanced the value of Mr. Balfour's phylogenetic speculations.

Eminent Israelites of the Nineteenth Century. By Henry S. Morais. (Philadelphia: Edward Stern & Co. 1880.)—Within the compass of 370 pages the author of this book sketches the lives of exactly one hundred Israelites part of whom are still among the living. It is an interesting portrait-gallery into which the author leads us, and he makes an efficient cicerone. His famous Israelites are of diverse origin—from Italy, Germany, Austria, France, England, the United States—and occupying various stations in life: we find among them theologians, philologians, physicians, statesmen, men of letters, philanthropists, musical composers, etc., all of whom have won for themselves more or less distinction. Yet it is but a comparatively very short time since in most of the countries named the political and, partly, the social barriers were removed which kept the Jews separated from their non-Jewish fellow-citizens, and which made it impossible for them to compete in general culture, and to enter upon the careers for which by talent and inclination they felt themselves especially suited. The author, who writes in a very appreciative spirit, and who tries to be as unbiassed as possible, has had to restrict himself in many of his sketches far too much. To some of the men of whom he furnishes miniature sketches he could hardly do sufficient justice by his meagre outlines, and could hardly indicate the deep and far-reaching influence which some of them have exercised in their own circles. Several of his statements are not correct. For instance, Auerbach's first novel was not 'Poet and Merchant, published in 1839, but 'Spinoza,' published two years earlier. Of Joseph Derenbourg, the learned Semitic scholar, of Paris, one of the chefs-d'œuvre is not mentioned, viz., 'Opuscules et Traités d'Abou'l-Walid.' Geiger did not write a monograph on Elia del Medigo, but on Joseph Solomon del Medigo. The three rabbinical conventions in which Geiger participated did not occur at the times and in the order here stated, but in 1844, '45, and '46 in Brunswick, Frankfort, and Breslau. As Steinschneider is chiefly renowned on account of his labors in the field of Hebrew bibliography, his various learned catalogues of the Hebrew manuscripts in the great libraries of Leyden, Munich, Hamburg, and Berlin deserved mention as much as his excellent 'Catalogue of the Hebrew Books in the Bodleian Library in Oxford.' The book-"Ir ha-tzedek"—a history of the Jewish congregation in Cracow and its Rabbis—is not by Leopold Zunz, but by one Je'hiel M. Zunz. Such and similar inaccuracies, however, will not hinder this book from finding a welcome reception, especially among Jewish families, but even still more widely.

Goethe's Leben. Von Heinrich Düntzer. Mit authentischen Illustrationen. (Leipzig: Fues. 1880. New York: L. W. Schmidt.)—The merits and demerits of Düntzer's workmanship are well known—great fulness and accuracy of detail, and a style void of inspiration. It is, we confess, a source of surprise to us that a life like that of Goethe should not move even the present biographer to an occasional "winged word." But Düntzer remains true to himself and his mission. He leaves to others the more attractive field of generalization, and contents himself with unearthing and grouping the facts. Certainly we can afford to be grateful, for he has produced one of the most accurate and trustworthy biographies ever written, sober in tone and replete with information, much of which will be new to the general reader. There are probably not half a dozen scholars in all Germany capable of estimating justly the amount of painful research packed away in these six hundred pages. As a whole, the work will not succeed so well as Lewes's superficial biography in conveying to the uninitiated an instantaneous impression of Goethe's extraordinary personality. Neither will it show us Goethe in his relations to the times, as Grimm's essay has done. Nevertheless, it is an exceedingly valuable—in fact, indispensable—help to the conscientious study of Goethe and his writings. We call attention to one point, where we think that Düntzer has profited by Grimm's method. We mean the significance of the first Weimar period, from 1775 to the Italian journey, 1786. This period, which Düntzer calls suggestively the Dienstjahre, is too often passed over in haste as barren and uninviting. In reality it was the formation-period of Goethe's character. Grimm was the first, to our knowledge, who brought out its significance; Düntzer has confirmed and extended Grimm's views. Those of us who have recognized in Goethe only the poet and philosopher must now prepare to admit that he was also one of the most systematic and indefatigable of practical men. In fact, we doubt if many of our legislators or railroad magnates or manufacturers could look back upon ten years so well spent. To sum up the drift of Grimm's and Düntzer's argument in a phrase, Goethe made Karl August, and Goethe and Karl August together made Weimar, and the little Saxon duchy set the tone to North Germany.

We have space in conclusion only to express deep regret that a work of this sort should be put forth without an index of names and subjects. Its absence is unpardonable.

New England Bygones. By E. H. Arr. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880.)—This little volume, written especially for children, is a record of life in a typical New-England farm-house fifty years ago. The scenes and incidents are treated with the tenderness that haunts all remembered childhood in a pleasant and long-forsaken home. The aspect of the country through the varied seasons, the routine of the in-door work, the character of the village worthies, the peculiarities of the village institutions, and the special experiences and delights of childhood are dwelt upon minutely and faithfully. The whole forms a true picture of New-England life in the more remote districts, with its stern and unamiable features unsoftened, and its strong, hardy characteristics unheightened. It stirs a feeling of respect even while it fails to attract admiration or to awaken any regret that the ideal it illustrates has passed away. And it will give pleasure despite the fact that its pathos occasionally passes into weakness, and the delight of reminiscence sometimes leads the author into triviality.

The Week.

MR. GARFIELD'S letter of acceptance is considerably longer than Mr. Hayes's, and, unfortunately, what it loses in terseness is not made up by clearness of statement or independence of attitude. Mr. Hayes's began boldly with an attack on the spoils doctrine, and so made of civil-service reform the main question of our politics. Mr. Garfield, on the contrary, with a rather slavish adherence to the order of the platform, places civil-service last among "the principal topics which are likely to become subjects of discussion," and which he therefore expresses his views upon; and in place of the strong and direct language of his predecessor in dealing with it, recommends in a round-about way legislation regulating appointments and fixing the tenure of office "without invading the authority or necessary discretion of the Executive." He even censures the President's famous order to office-holders when he says: "Without depriving any officer of his rights as a citizen, the Government should require him to discharge all his official duties with intelligence, efficiency, and faithfulness"; and he follows this reactionary sentiment with a vindication of Congressional interference with appointments. At least we can make nothing else of the following passage:

"To select wisely from our vast population those who are best fitted for the many offices to be filled, requires an acquaintance far beyond the range of any one man. The Executive should, therefore, seek and receive the information and assistance of those whose knowledge of the communities in which the duties are to be performed best qualifies them to aid in making the wisest choice."

The main question, according to Mr. Garfield's presentation, is the right of Congress to supervise the election of its own members, to protect the voter from intimidation and the ballot-box from fraud. This is also the main question of the Democrats, who call it, however, centralization and troops at the polls—or, in more elegant language, the supremacy of the military over the civil authority. It furnishes their strongest argument for the nomination of General Hancock, and they will not be displeased by having it made a straight issue. Mr. Garfield rather abstractly remarks on the cause of "the most serious evils which now afflict the South," that they grow out of a want of toleration of political opinion, but for this he proposes no remedy. He thinks the nation can aid popular education, but should give no support to sectarian schools. He refers to his previous utterances on finance, but injures the effect of this by what he goes on to say, which is, that greenbacks and gold and silver dollars are now in a happy equality that can be maintained—at least, he says "we need only to maintain the equality of all our dollars," as if it were possible; and that "the great prosperity which the country is now enjoying should not be endangered by any violent changes or doubtful financial experiments"—which may mean fiat money, or inflation, or the retirement of the greenbacks, or the abandonment of the dollar of our fathers. Mr. Garfield has here only too faithfully copied the ambiguity of Mr. Sherman. A disquisition on the tariff which will conciliate the protectionists; a hearty endorsement of "internal improvements"; and approval of the Government's course in sending to China a commission to secure a modification of the present treaty, conclude Mr. Garfield's survey of the political situation.

The letter, which reads as tamely as a message from the White House, will prove a cruel disappointment to those Independents who had hoped to find in it a trumpet-call, or at least some basis for their assertion that its author is "the platform's best embodiment." It recalls very unpleasantly General Garfield's rôle at the Convention, of moderator and harmonizer. It will tend to revive the spirits of the Stalwarts, as it gives them no ground of offence and leaves them unhindered in their choice of campaign issues. As a vital, historical document it bears no comparison with Mr. Hayes's letter, and will pass into as speedy oblivion as the platform which inspired it. It does nothing, where it might have done much, to raise the Presidential controversy above a simple balancing of the collective merits of the two opposing parties. Mr. Garfield remains a trained legislator as against a trained soldier, and this fact must still be allowed its weight. What we miss is a personal tone giving an added dignity to the canvass, and kindling in the party an honest enthusiasm for higher aims and ideals.

It is well to be on the lookout for the bloody shirt in the canvass, even in a disguised form. We think we see on the part of some of our esteemed contemporaries a determination to raise it if they can, and if not, to make the general social condition of the South a passable substitute. The Tribune, last week, brought out a Washington despatch mysteriously besprinkled with dashes, showing that the Attorney-General's office was in possession of damning facts about a Ku-klux revival in Virginia. By editorial courtesy this is regarded as the Tribune's specialty, entered with the Librarian of Congress, and therefore not to be even so much as alluded to by the Times. By the same token the Tribune would not for the world breathe a hint that the Georgia moonshiners are particularly troublesome just now, and that the State authorities are shielding them in every way, arresting the Federal officers who interfere with the distillers, etc. This is the Times's exclusive property. Still, there is no law against the campaign orator's using both these pictures of Southern demoralization as a reason why Hancock's election is to be resisted tooth and nail. The Times, more enterprising, perhaps, has also assumed charge of the indignation which Northerners ought to feel at the Cash-Shannon duel in South Carolina, and has been very liberal in devoting its space to reports and documents showing that the killing of Shannon was as clear a case of calculated murder as "the code" has ever begotten. We wish we could be quite sure that its zeal has no political tincture, and that it is earnestly striving to help the South suppress for ever a barbarism which is, after all, on the decline there. The Charleston News and Courier is manfully invoking the law for the punishment of the crime, and prints the resolutions of the Camden and Kershaw Anti-Duelling Association formed a month ago, and pledged "to enforce the laws against duelling in every case of their violation hereafter occurring within the county of Kershaw." The law disfranchises any one who gives, conveys, or accepts a challenge, or acts as second, and permits him to be imprisoned for two years, and protects witnesses compelled to give evidence, authorizing the State's attorney for that purpose to strike even one of the names of the principals out of the indictment. It does not, however, stamp a fatal issue as homicide, and punish it accordingly, and so it really offers an alternative course to a would-be assassin. Cash has been arrested and will be tried.

General Mahone appears to have managed his convention of Virginia "readjusters" last week with much shrewdness and success. His party have, it is well known, no political principles, and are held together by all sorts of forces, among which the fogyism of the Conservatives or Bourbons and the prospect of getting the offices are the chief. In one sense, therefore, he had a free field, and on national questions enjoyed the advantage of being absolutely unfettered in his action; it is generally admitted that he would have supported Grant had he been the Chicago nominee, and his choice of an electoral ticket pledged to Hancock is of course to be attributed to the most undisguised considerations of expediency. But the path of pure expediency has its pitfalls, and, aside from the obvious weakness involved in having no real national preferences to unite his adherents, he had to choose between offending potential allies in the Bourbon ranks on the one hand and the Republican wing of his party on the other. Apparently he risked the lesser danger. The disaffection with the Conservatives is widespread and increasing as it becomes more and more evident that the Mahone men "mean business," and the nomination of Hancock electors will furnish an excellent excuse for Conservative desertion to the winning side; while the ties by which the "readjusters" have bound the negroes to them are strong enough to hold many to whom material comfort is dearer than the election of "the man who beat Grant at Chicago." Whether or no enough of these will vote with their new friends to give the "readjusters'" electoral ticket a plurality it is of course impossible to tell, but it is at least certain that if most of them do, few Conservative desertions will be needed. The Conservatives see this, and their papers are denouncing the "readjusters" as bogus Democrats with a severity that would probably have more effect if the feeling that whether a man is a Democrat or not he is wise to be a "readjuster" had not recently gained so much ground.

As we said last week, we can see little opportunity for the Republican electoral ticket to "slip in" through the Democratic split, and the hope of this probably arises from the possibilities of "trading," or what the politicians call "unholy alliances," which the situation offers. Since the Convention, it is true, this breach seems wider and less likely to be healed than before the determination of the "readjusters" was made so clear; it looks now as if both Democratic factions would keep their tickets in the field, unless the National Committee should become seriously alarmed. But the only hope of success for the Garfield ticket apparently lies in the selling out of their electors by the "readjusters" in order to elect their Congressional candidates, and in the restoration of the franchise to the forty thousand negroes disfranchised by the poll-tax qualification. The latter can only be accomplished by the payment of the tax by Northern money, which, if raised, it is plausibly feared would be either stolen or misapplied; and the former is rendered unlikely by the fact that the "readjusters," as a party, undoubtedly care more for a decisive showing of their strength than for the election of any of their candidates for Congress. It should, moreover, be remembered that the temptation to the Republicans will be to help the electoral ticket of the "readjusters," for the reasons that this will leave them free to support, and with every probability of success in some instances, Republican Congressional nominations, and will also attach to them the faction from which they have most to expect in breaking the "color-line" in Virginia politics. It cannot be denied that these two objects are laudable, but, on the other hand, it cannot be overlooked that an intimate and permanent fusion with the "readjusters" means the disbandment of the Republican party in Virginia.

We were in error a fortnight since in designating Mr. Pease, now Collector of the Port of Galveston, as "the carpet-bag Governor of Texas." As a matter of fact, we are informed, he is a native of Connecticut, who went to Texas some forty-five years ago and assisted in the formation of the government of the Republic, holding office under it subsequently and under the State, of which he was twice the Democratic Governor. His appointment as Provisional Governor after the war was due to his having been a Union man. In this capacity we believe we have authority for saying that his behavior was indistinguishable from that of a genuine carpet-bagger, and very properly drew from General Hancock the letter so much talked of then and now. Before he had been Provisional Governor more than three weeks he declared by proclamation that the constitution of 1866 and all the general laws not in conflict with the United States Constitution which had been enacted during the rebellion were still in force. This was contrary to the contemporary policy of Mr. Seward and the Administration in dealing with other States, but it had the additional inconvenience of validating the claim of Throckmorton, who was elected Governor under it, and invalidating his own as Provisional Governor—an office which the constitution of 1866 made impossible. These considerations were perhaps outweighed in Mr. Pease's mind by the higher salaries of the revived constitution.

The long dispute between the Police Commissioners and the Mayor has finally come to an end by the reinstatement of General Smith. Mr. Voorhis made a feeble effort at resistance, and got an injunction from Judge Van Hoesen, of the Superior Court, which was, however, immediately vacated by Judge Freedman. With General Smith and Mr. Nichols back the Board is divided between Tammany and the Republicans, and Reformers who propose to take an active part in city politics this fall had better bear this in mind. In a Presidential year the composition of the Police Board is more than ordinarily important, and it is not made less so by the fact that one of its members is a leading supporter of the Democratic candidate, or that another is a member of an organization which is powerless in city politics except through an alliance with one or other wing of the Democratic party. This is the end to which Mr. Cooper's reform campaign has brought him, and that it would bring him to it has long been obvious. What he needed, and what any one must rely upon in such an attempt, is the force of public opinion, and this cannot be had unless nominations are made which command public confidence. The great trouble with most of the reformers who have been produced within the past few years is, that they are so accustomed to the intrigue and chicane by which "politics" in such a place as New York are characterized, that they do not see that this is what is to be reformed, and that consequently "combinations" and "deals," by which a man is put in here and another put out there, are not part of the proper machinery of reform. It seems absurd to have to say this, but there is a large number of good men who, with a sincere desire to improve municipal politics, no sooner get into power than they vie with the regular Bosses in these devices. The worst of this is that they make reform ridiculous, so that people laugh when they hear of it. Concerning the legal aspects of the Police Board muddle it is impossible to use too strong language. Judge Davis, in his dissenting opinion with regard to the removal of officials under the charter, describes the consequences of the extraordinary position into which the present condition of the law puts the government of the city. Of course, as long as the present charter remains, the law will remain, and during that period the Mayor's power of removal for cause is practically gone.

The attempt of "Dr." Tanner to go without food for forty days is receiving a great deal of attention from the press and from a certain portion of the medical profession, as well as from a large number of fanatics and lunatics of all kinds all over the United States, who pour in letters of congratulation and sympathy as the Doctor adds each new day to his score. Those interested in the experiment express a good deal of feeling against the more conservative physicians who hold aloof and refuse to "watch" Dr. Tanner starve himself. There is, however, something to be said for the doctors. The amount and variety of experiments which eccentric persons may try upon their bodies are practically unlimited, and if doctors were called upon to "watch" everybody who chose to subject himself to one of these in the interest of "science," they would really have no time to attend to their practice, their patients would leave them, and in the end they would lose more than science would gain by the operation. Again, such an experiment as that now being tried by Dr. Tanner is worthless unless it is guarded against every possibility of fraud from the outset, and this not only by "watchers," but by the character of the person operated upon. Without desiring to cast the slightest discredit upon Dr. Tanner, it is obvious that he is not absolutely above suspicion, for one of his watchers has already hinted at fraud. Again, it does not very clearly appear what "science" is to gain by knowing that Dr. Tanner can by lying a great part of the time on his stomach and sitting a great part of the time "doubled up," and by taking a very little water from time to time and by rinsing his mouth out, go for a very great length of time without food. The Times has suggested that it may lead to the introduction of starving matches conducted on the "go-as-you-please" plan. But, unless made up between men of very eminent character and position, we fear that the interest in these would not be great. Starving is not nearly so exciting a process to look at as that of eating; and eating matches, though probably quite as likely to furnish interesting scientific results as starving matches, have never proved generally popular.

The value of the exports to foreign countries from New York during the month of June was $43,084,568, of which $41,325,315 represented domestic produce. Never before in the history of the port did the exports amount to so much in a single month. In June, 1879, the value of the exports was $28,828,608. The value of the imports last month was $40,512,404, against $23,471,878 in June, 1879. These figures give some idea of the expansion in the foreign trade, which has been not less extraordinary than that in the domestic trade, as reflected in the Clearing-House exchanges. The foreign trade of New York during the fiscal year ending with June shows total imports of $524,844,862 and total exports of $400,798,000, against total imports during the preceding year of $306,746,125 and exports of $351,319,610. A large part of the enormous exports during June was made up of breadstuffs, which were hurried forward by the speculators who "overstayed their market" before the new crop figures could be positively known. Railroad earnings for June were as remarkable as the trade figures. A list of thirty-four railroads publishing earnings shows an average increase of 33 per cent. over June, 1879—which is due not only to the increased tonnage, but to the higher rates maintained by "pooling" arrangements of the leading roads. The money market was very easy during the week, and the surplus reserve of the New York banks is nearly $18,000,000. In addition to the domestic influences working in favor of low rates was the decline in the rates for bills on London to within one-half of one per cent. of the point at which gold can be imported. At the Stock Exchange, speculation was governed by "crop despatches" from Chicago and Milwaukee about the spring wheat in the Northwestern States. The weather has been sufficiently unfavorable there to furnish the grain of truth needed for stories of great damage and "blighted crops." Wheat was "bulled" on these despatches, and the stocks of the railroads traversing the Northwestern States were "beared." The State of Minnesota produces more wheat than any other of the Northwestern States (as classified at the Stock Exchange), and its yield last year was less than seven per cent. of the total for the country. However important, therefore, these crop despatches may be to local interests, or for the purposes of speculation at Chicago and New York, it is evident that, so far as the interests of the country at large are concerned, they are of minor significance. Silver bullion in London declined to 52½*d.* per oz., and here the bullion value of the "buzzard dollar" fell to $0.8836.

The despatches concerning the precise terms of the Amnesty Bill, as voted by the French Senate and concurred in by the Chamber, are meagre, but seem to point to a substantial concession on the part of the Upper House. A few Communists, like Blanqui, Pyat, and Rochefort, receive pardon without the restoration of civil rights; but such of them as are smart writers will probably not regret their inability to be heard from the tribune. They have all come flocking back from abroad, to be present at the celebration of the new national holiday, the 14th of July, and Rochefort, who was met at the depot and escorted in great state by a mob in which the municipal council was conspicuous, announces his intention to start a new paper immediately, to be called L'Intransigeant, or the Intractable. As we go to press, the festival, for which extraordinary preparations have been made, is in full progress, and Frenchmen who find it of ill-omen as commemorating the violent fall of the Bastille, can carry their thoughts forward to the "Fête de la Fédération" which occurred on the same day of the following year, as M. Henri Martin suggested to his hesitating fellow-senators. That the amnestied and pardoned Communists, as well as, at the other pole, the anti-Republicans, should see any but the bloody side of it, was not to be expected. The Republicans regard it as the seal of the new form of government, and, now that the last excuse for popular agitation has been removed by condoning the political offences of 1871, are ready to face without misgivings the general elections of 1881.

The Porte has not absolutely committed itself to a policy of resistance to what may be called the decree of the Berlin Conference. Nor has it given any other than the usual delusive signs of a yielding temper. The dismissal of Osman Pasha from the Ministry of War is interpreted favorably, but all such changes in the administration leave untouched the Turkish character, which has been the real difficulty in the way of carrying out the Berlin Treaty. None of the Powers feel any faith in its most solemn pledges, and the ability of the Porte is as doubtful as its good-will. It is difficult to see how anything but the fixing of a day for the execution of its promises, and a readiness to support the Montenegrins on the one hand and the Greeks on the other with land and naval forces for as long a time as may be necessary, will succeed with Turkey. Greece, in compliance with a request from France and England, refrains from calling out her reserves until an answer has been received to the collective note, but her preparations for mobilizing the troops are uninterrupted.

After nearly ten months of inactivity the Russians in southern Turkestan have, under General Skobeleff, resumed hostilities against the Tekke Turkomans, and, as their reports have it, with some success at the outset. Whether the forces collected so late for the purpose are sufficient to break the resistance of the fierce robber tribes intervening between the Russian possessions on the eastern shores of the Caspian Sea and the much-coveted city of Merv—coveted as the key to Herat, the northwestern gate of Afghanistan—may be doubted, as the commanders in Russian Turkestan are now forced, in view of the threatened advance of the Chinese and possible risings, to use most of their troops for defensive purposes. That the Russians, after the severe repulse by the Tekkes at Gök Tepe, early in September, 1879, allowed many months to elapse before making a strong effort to revenge it, was obviously owing to the paralyzing effect of the murderous attempts of the Nihilists and to England's attitude in Central Asian affairs, an attitude made menacing by the successes of the British army at Kabul and Kandahar. These latter considerations ceased with the fall of the Beaconsfield Cabinet, but the Government at St. Petersburg was bound to avoid an unbecoming haste in profiting by the change, and to abstain for a time from embarrassing, and still more from provoking, the new British Ministry, whose action in Indo-Afghan affairs was still to be shaped, and to be shaped mainly by British interests and susceptibilities—all Mr. Gladstone's previous condemnations of the Asian policy of his predecessor notwithstanding. The preparations for the new advance under Skobeleff have been made slowly and quietly, but it remains to be seen whether with more circumspection than marked the campaign in which Lazareff met his death and Tergukassoff signally failed.

Concerning the probabilities of a definitive warlike rupture between Russia and China the reports continue conflicting and uniformly uncertain. According to news repeatedly brought to Afghanistan and India by Khokandis and others, and thence telegraphed to England with an evident bias in favor of the newsmongers' veracity, the war has already begun, and in a way alarming to the Russian military authorities, not only in Kulja but in Ferghana and in the east of Russian Turkestan generally. This is, however, stoutly denied by the semi-official organs at St. Petersburg, though it is admitted that the Chinese in Kashgaria are making vigorous efforts to complete their armaments for an invasion. Russia, on her part, is evidently preparing with great earnestness for a serious conflict, in which she probably intends to act an aggressive part in the East, where her naval forces are being rapidly increased by numerous war-vessels sent from the Baltic Sea and other stations to Vladivostok, the southern port of the Littoral Province, on the Sea of Japan. From this point a menacing expedition to the China Sea and against Pekin itself might be undertaken; and, if land forces in sufficient numbers could be brought to those remote regions through Eastern Siberia or by sea, the annexation of the Mantchurian districts south of the Amoor might possibly be one of the permanent fruits of the war. On the western theatre of it, however, Russia's attitude must necessarily remain a strictly defensive one. Even if her conquests north of the Thian-Shan range were of old date and perfectly secured, an advance beyond that tremendous mountain barrier would be a most hazardous enterprise; with millions of lately subdued fanatical Uzbecks, Sarts, and Tajiks left in the rear, it would be an act of madness such as even the ambition or greed of the most reckless military heads at Tashkend would shrink from advising.

CAMPAIGN ISSUES.

AS the campaign is in a backward and halting state by reason of the warm weather and the shattered nerves of leading politicians, the newspapers have been sorely tried to procure fuel for firing the mass of voters. It is true that effective campaign work seldom begins before the middle of August, but it is the part of a good "organ" to get the public mind into a suitable state of irritation before the "workers" commence operations. We have accordingly been asked to believe without a scrap of evidence, first, that General Hancock in a letter to some brother officer (Sheridan or Sherman) nearly four years ago declared that he (Hancock) thought that Tilden was elected President, and that if he (Tilden) should take an oath before some justice of the peace that he would support the Constitution of the United States, he (Hancock) would feel bound as an officer of the Army to obey his (Tilden's) orders; second, that at an early stage of the war, while our army was on the defensive in front of Washington City, General Hancock entered into a conspiracy with other officers under General McClellan to march upon Washington, depose President Lincoln and his Cabinet, and set up nobody knows whom in their places—of course Jeff. Davis would have been their eventual successor; third, that after the war was over, General Hancock became president of a swindling oil company known as the United Service Petroleum Company, whereby many thousands of dollars were lost by meritorious soldiers and sailors who invested their money in its shares. It is grudgingly conceded that General Hancock lost money of his own in the oil company, but it is contended that a man of ordinary prudence would have kept out of such speculations, and especially would have refused to allow his name to be used as president—instances being extremely rare where men of ordinary prudence have gone into bad speculations and become presidents of losing oil companies, silver-mining companies, and railroad companies. If we mistake not, General Garfield was the promoter of an oil company at the same time that General Hancock was committing this offence against business principles and the laws of prudence, and his adventure turned out no better in the matter of dividends than the United Service concern.

As to each of these accusations it may be safely predicted that General Hancock will get more votes than if they had been left unsaid. Any shrewd friend can do him no better service than to furnish a charge of the same sort each day to the Republican press, or that portion of it short-sighted enough to print them. General Hancock has shown tact and sagacity in not availing himself of the opportunity generously offered by his accusers to contradict these stories. A campaign based upon Tilden conspiracies, McClellan conspiracies, Mrs. Surratt's execution, and speculations in oil-lands would go far to neutralize the prime advantage which General Garfield possesses over his opponent, viz., long experience and creditable service in the higher walks of civil life. If it can be sufficiently dinned into the public ear that the main question is not which candidate gives the better promise of intelligent discharge of the duties of the Presidential office, but which of them lost the most of his own and of other people's money in the great oil-bubble of 1865, General Hancock's chances will prove to be much better than they now seem.

It is admitted on all hands that General Hancock owes his nomination to the fact that he is a soldier. Any discoveries or pretended discoveries of statesmanship in his career, his writings, his conversation are afterthoughts, so far as the Cincinnati Convention is concerned. What the Democrats wanted and were determined to have was somebody who was free from the charge of complicity with the rebellion. Every other consideration was made subordinate to this. They have succeeded in their aim; but they have raised another issue which is likely to prove as troublesome as the one they sought to avoid. They have required every thoughtful voter to ask the question whether the profession of arms is a good school of statesmanship—whether the training of the camp and the education involved in "general orders" are desirable or even tolerable qualifications for the tasks of civil government. Representing a party whose chief, if not its sole, tenet is subordination of the military to the civil power, General Hancock's abstention from any use of the troops not legally provided for is pretty certain; but except in this particular, if any leading Democrat were asked to state what would be the probable characteristics of General Hancock's administration he could offer nothing but conjecture. Patriotism we could undoubtedly count upon, but patriotism is a sentiment which covers the acts of a Tyler, a Buchanan, and a Johnson equally with those of a Washington and a Lincoln. The time when the fact of birth on American soil was deemed a sufficient qualification for the Presidency, and à fortiori for any lesser office, has gone by. Civil-service reform, which demands proof of fitness for an inspectorship of customs, will not be content to put the Presidency itself up at a raffle. The currency question is as important as ever, yet General Hancock's opinions concerning it are unknown. Nobody will venture to say that he is any safer in this particular than the Democratic party, although this was said of Seymour in 1868 and of Tilden in 1876, and might have been said of Bayard if he had been nominated at Cincinnati. The Silver Bill will come up for action of some sort within twelve months. If General Hancock's views are merely the preponderating sentiment of the Democratic party they are not safe, and are not such as the State of New York, for one, ought to promote and sanction by her electoral vote. We may add that any authoritative statement of them will not have the same value, as an evidence of his probable action, that a similar statement would have from a candidate who had been long in civil life, and whose votes on various public questions were notorious and a matter of record. Even General Grant had his views on finance, but his veto of the Inflation Bill was an afterthought to his resolution to sign it.

The obscurity of General Hancock's title to civic honors and responsibilities will cause the fitness of the Democratic party to be entrusted with power to become a much more prominent topic than it would have been if Tilden, Bayard, Thurman, Hendricks, or anybody versed in government affairs had been nominated. If the Democrats wished to attract criticism to themselves as a party, they have done well to nominate a candidate who has no civil record of his own. If they desired to withdraw attention from themselves and fix it on the guns that held the cemetery at Gettysburg, they will not succeed in their endeavor. The public are inclined to look at the acts of the candidate rather than of the party if there are any acts to examine. In the case of General Hancock there are none which can be called pertinent to the issue. Therefore the acts of the party, its composition, its general drift and tendency must be considered perforce. Here the Republicans ought to be conscious of their advantage, and to challenge comparison and debate. If they are wise they will not run the risk of outraging the public sense of fair play by trivialities like General Hancock's speculations in oil, and calumnies like his alleged conspiracy against Lincoln, and stupidities relating to the hanging of Mrs. Surratt, but will quickly substitute sober political argument in their stead.

WHY INDEPENDENTS SIDE WITH THE REPUBLICANS.

WE have never disguised, in any broad comparison between the Republican and Democratic parties, our preference for, and to that extent our sympathy with, the former. We have, looking solely to its composition, and again to the rank and file only of the Northern wing, seen in it the best hopes for the political development of the country in accordance with those ideals which we have most at heart. Of the two we have regarded it as at least as patriotic as its rival, and more intelligent, reflective, independent, and amenable to discussion. For this reason (as well as because it was in power) we have during fifteen years devoted ourselves to criticism of its methods and leaders so persistently and exclusively as to have won the hearty abuse of the party organs, and the stigma (in their eyes) of being, under an affectation of independence, a Democratic "sheet." Yet we can truthfully and modestly say to such of them as are now engaged in the more or less perfunctory laudation of the choice of the Chicago Convention, that the Nation has a share in the credit of it, not because of any words spoken during the past six months, but in virtue of its consistent endeavor to purify the Republican party for half a generation.

We have, therefore, no excuses to make for being gratified at the check given last month to the downward tendency of that party. There have been times when it has seemed to us very doubtful whether the power of recovery had not been lost, and whether those who directed the party for selfish ends could ever be shaken off except in the reaction caused by signal defeat at a national election. We do not feel at all sure that the internal revolution, now that it has come, is not too late; nor do we, on the other hand, exaggerate the extent of it. The hopes of the Bosses for 1884, as exposed on another page by a correspondent, are grounded in their sense of the incompleteness of their overthrow at Chicago and in their knowledge of human nature. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the culmination of those tendencies which we have combated was successfully resisted by a clear majority of the Republican delegates—by an immense majority, if we subtract from the 306 Grantites the Southern phalanx, or consider how few Northern States by hook or by crook were committed to the third term, how few respectable journals advocated it; and here, we hold, is warrant enough for believing that "reform within the party" has begun, and for rejoicing in it as we do. The mixed motives which accompany all reform are no bar to this rejoicing, however they may enforce the need of continued exertion. It might be asked what the mixed motives which the Democratic Opposition have had for regaining the confidence of the country have done for them that can be compared with the achievement at Chicago. A simple test will suffice: every one admits the moral significance of Grant's rejection, but can any moral be drawn from the nomination of Hancock as to the better or worse condition of the Democratic party? We do not, of course, offer this as an argument for voting for General Garfield, but merely to show that the Republicans may rightfully ascribe to something more than accident and something higher than expediency the result of the late desperate struggle between the hostile elements of the party.

But now we are taken to task for being satisfied with the measure of reform already obtained. In one sense, of course, we are by no means satisfied. A party which had to employ all its energies in simply keeping down its Bosses, would soon exhaust the public's interest in its perpetuity. We do not, however, believe that this portion of the work will have to be done over again in 1884 or at any other time; and for the rest, we have never looked for instantaneous and thorough reform in the Republican party or in any party, because we are not in the habit of expecting miracles. The all-important thing was the turning of the scales. It was virtually accomplished by the final condemnation of the unit rule, yet this alone would not have been satisfactory. It was powerfully reinforced by the resistance to a third term for General Grant, but even thus it would not have been satisfactory. That reformers were contented, for the present, was due to the nomination of a man whom the bulk of them in common with the bulk of the party believed to be uncorrupt and incorruptible, as they did not believe Mr. Blaine; and scrupulous in the pursuit of his political ambition, as they did not believe Mr. Sherman; and sincerely desirous of establishing civil-service reform, as they did not believe either Blaine or Sherman to be; finally, sounder than either in regard to the currency and the reform of the tariff. They would have been gladdened by a genuine platform of principles, and not simply one ungraciously patched in deference to themselves. But was there any cause for discouragement in what they did get? And if reform within the party was not begun by the several victories we have just described, must we believe that the nomination of Hancock was all that was needed to turn out a brand-new, immaculate Democratic party? This would indeed be reform made easy.

Apparently, however, the Republican platform ought to have contained a disavowal of all the party's errors during reconstruction. This, at least, is what Mr. Bayard's reproach of General Garfield amounts to. No candidate inside their own ranks whom the Republicans could fitly have chosen would have been exempt from the general criticism of the party for the measures, more or less well meant and more or less well-advised, by which the transition was accomplished from civil war to the actual equality of all the States under the Constitution. Every Republican statesman of prominence has been implicated in them, and posterity will judge him according to his superiority to the heat and unwisdom of the times in which they were enacted. We do not fear the result of this judgment when applied to Mr. Garfield, as compared with any of his prominent rivals. But just now neither he nor his party is much interested in such a vindication, because the period in question is closed. This is what the respectable class of Southern men whom Mr. Bayard represents do not see or do not acknowledge. For the sake of restoring the Democrats to power they desire to prolong the reconstruction grievance, just as it was to the interest of the carpet-baggers and their allies, the Northern Machinists, to pretend that the war was not over long after the excuse for military government had been taken away. In fact, the war and reconstruction ended simultaneously when President Grant resolved to let his successor have the honor of withdrawing the troops from South Carolina and Louisiana. There has never been one moment since then when arbitrary power could attack any Southern State except at the same peril with which a Northern State could be outraged.

When we spoke lately of "a final discarding of military ideas and military methods" at Chicago, we did not mean to imply that Grant's renomination and election would have given him one atom of authority over the South not already possessed by Mr. Hayes, or have led to any attempt to oppress the South on his part. They would have given him the party's condonation for the abuses of his civil administration due to his "military ideas and methods"; but, then, these were as clearly manifested in the San Domingo intrigue and the whiskey trials as in Southern affairs. We might, therefore, have anticipated a repetition of the disgraces of 1868–1876 over the field of the whole Union impartially. Now, we must say once more, with every concession in favor of General Hancock's character, that his Order No. 40 and letter to Governor Pease, sane and salutary as they were when issued, and historically precious to him and his posterity, are no guarantee against his resorting to military ideas and methods in an untried sphere. But, as this does not concern the South specially, we can also add that his professional training lays him bare to the assaults of the politicians and office-seekers just as Grant was exposed, but under a still greater disadvantage. General Grant had the prestige necessary for rallying to the support of unpartisan government the best section of his party, the best men of all parties. General Hancock has none of this: his services in the war were great but inferior, and they are too remote, and the spirit of the people is no longer exalted by the inspiration of the triumph of the Union. In the next place, General Grant received the Government officered throughout by his own partisans, with a few Johnsonian exceptions. The first question which President Hancock will have to face will be the retention of his opponents in place, and whether he will firmly take his stand on business principles of administration without regard to party, or will surrender at discretion to the horde of applicants for the spoils of victory. It is needless to say that the pressure thus brought to bear on him will be out of all proportion to that under which Grant miserably succumbed.

THE BRADLAUGH INCIDENT.

LONDON, Saturday, June 16, 1880.

THE Bradlaugh incident must be considered as one of the misfortunes of Mr. Gladstone's Government. His treatment of it has not been perfect; but the situation was one in which it was next to impossible to avoid mistakes. Probably Mr. Bradlaugh is among certain classes the man of all others most detested in England. He is supposed to be an atheist, disloyal, and unclean. All these things are enough to prejudice any cause with which he is associated, though it be accidentally. Atheism is not a new thing in the House of Commons or in society; but it must be decently veiled and rather insinuated than expressed. There is nothing in Mr. Bradlaugh's writings which has not been said, and said without rebuke, by men of the highest position in literature and in society. But what they have hinted at he has shouted in stentor tones; what they have said as esoterical doctrines for the wise only he has proclaimed to the multitude, to men, women, and children without distinction. There are precedents for his most detested social doctrines in the writings of political economists, philanthropists, and physiologists. His political heresies have been shared by men of the highest position. His "Impeachment of the House of Brunswick" is far less damaging to monarchy in England than Thackeray's lectures on the Four Georges, or than the disclosures contained in the published diaries of Mr. Henry Greville. His atheism, it is notorious, is shared by half the scientific men and speculative philosophers of our time. Yet these things do not affect favorably the estimation in which Mr. Bradlaugh is held. The doctrines which form the whole of his mind and exclusively occupy his writings are merely incidental in the works of more liberally cultivated men. A page or two might be picked out from the voluminous writings of the late Mr. Mill which beneath their reserve of form yet cover almost the whole doctrinal ground of Mr. Bradlaugh's Malthusianism. The agnosticism of some of the most eminent men of letters of our time, the positivism and materialism professed in the chairs of distinguished university teachers and advocated in our scientific schools, are as distinct a negation of the fundamental doctrine of theology as anything which Mr. Bradlaugh has put forward. But in the case of the distinguished men whose names will occur to every one these heresies are covered with the graces of style, and are overshadowed by ideas and reflections which bring them into relation with general sentiment. Mr. Bradlaugh is, in the eyes of a large number of people, and especially of that class of people who make current opinion, simply the condensed essence of all that is objectionable in the writings and thoughts of men in whom there is very much that is not objectionable. His opinions and conduct seem to be made up of the worst parts of the opinions and conduct of everybody else. I am giving this as a true description of Mr. Bradlaugh, not as he is in himself, but only of him as he is seen in the perception of the upper and middle classes. To them he is a sort of monster. Given this estimate of him, it is easy to understand the storm of passion and frenzy of alarm which his appearance in the House of Commons has excited.

Mr. Bradlaugh has been described by a very accomplished judge of men and things as an inverted puritan, or, as we may say, a stern impuritan. He has all the fanaticism and all the coarse disregard of other people's feelings often found in the reformer and nearly always in the iconoclast. There is no reason to believe that he is not entirely honest in the opinions which he professes. Probably he loves notoriety. Certainly he has a taste for, and the capacity to distinguish himself in, conflict. His own feelings do not appear to be very sensitive, and he has very little regard for the feelings of others. These are reasons, perhaps, for not liking the man, but they are not reasons for denying him justice; the action of the House of Commons in regard to him has certainly neither been just nor considerate nor manly. It cannot be denied that Mr. Bradlaugh has made serious mistakes. When he presented himself first in Parliament as the duly elected member for Northampton, he made the request to be allowed to affirm instead of taking the usual oath. He was understood to do so not only on the technical ground that this privilege had been conceded to him in courts of law, but on the moral ground that to take an oath was against his conscience. In the subsequent stages of the controversy, however, Mr. Bradlaugh declared that though he would rather affirm, yet he was willing to take the oath. That being so, it seems as if Mr. Bradlaugh had no right to claim liberty of departure from the usual course merely because he faintly preferred, or even very positively preferred, the form of affirmation to that of swearing. If he did not labor under disability of conscience there was no disability from which he could reasonably ask the House of Commons to relieve him. Many members, Jews, Christians, and theists would on the whole prefer to affirm rather than invoke superfluously the Divine name. But this preference is no ground for exemption. If Mr. Bradlaugh can take the oath now, as he avers that he can, in good faith and with full acknowledgment of its binding power, he ought to have taken it at first without making any fuss about it, and without raising the embarrassing personal question which has distracted the House of Commons, divided the Liberal party against itself, and placed Mr. Gladstone temporarily in a minority.

It is at least open to doubt whether legally Mr. Bradlaugh can affirm. It is also open to doubt whether a man who has declared that the words, "So help me God," are to his mind an unmeaning formality, and that the New Testament is to him a book like any other, is really taking the oath when he repeats those unmeaning words and goes through the empty gesture of reverence. The oath is a mental affirmation; it does not consist merely in the physical production of certain sounds or in the use of a certain gesture. The two committees, therefore, to which Mr. Bradlaugh's case was referred had a certain justification when they decided, the one that the law did not allow him to affirm, the other that his mental state made it impossible for him to take an oath. The vote of the House of Commons which asserted these two propositions was not indeed dictated by any regard to them. It was the vote, with few exceptions, of personal vindictiveness and theological passion. It was also inspired by a desire to injure Mr. Gladstone personally and to damage his Government, by forcing him and it into the supposed championship of Mr. Bradlaugh. All these consequences would have been avoided if Mr. Bradlaugh had consented in the first instance to do what he wishes to do now, and had taken the oath without giving the explanation which makes it no oath; or if the Government, instead of referring the matter to a select committee, had proposed a resolution in the whole House authorizing him to affirm; or, still better, had introduced and pushed rapidly through the House of Commons a bill abolishing the oath altogether, and substituting for it an affirmation binding upon all members. It is said that the House of Lords would never have passed such a measure. They probably would not have done so if it had affected to abolish the oath in their chamber as well as in the House of Commons. But a bill confined solely to regulating the procedure of the House of Commons would scarcely have been rejected by the House of Lords.

As it is, both parties in the state are in an embarrassing position. The person who comes best out of the matter is Mr. Bradlaugh himself. The Tories have made the fatal mistake of converting him into a martyr and the representative of a principle which must triumph. They imprisoned him for some four-and-twenty hours, and then grew so afraid of what they had done that they were in a hurry to release him without his making that submission which is usually required from persons who have offended the authority of Parliament, before their offence is purged. Mr. Bradlaugh no doubt committed a breach of order in refusing to withdraw when he was commanded by the Speaker, acting under the authority of the vote of the House to do so. But as a matter of tactics, Mr. Bradlaugh acted with sagacity. He was standing on the defensive, and vindicating not only his position as a duly elected member of Parliament, but the right of the constituency which had chosen him. No one could blame him for forcing his adversaries to the extremest exercise of their power against him. If he put himself a little wrong, he put them greatly wrong, and forced them into an attitude which they dared not maintain. With the exception of the incidents attending his final removal from the House nothing could have been better than Mr. Bradlaugh's manner and deportment. His speech at the bar in vindication of his right to take his seat showed that he possessed consummate oratorical power. It was respectful to the House in form, but conveyed beneath its carefully-chosen words, and indicated in its modulated tones and restrained gestures, the substance of a defiance amounting almost to a threat. Yet the menace was one to which no exception could be taken, for it was given in the name not of himself or of any crowd outside, but in that of law which he conceived to have been set at naught, and of public opinion which had been disregarded. The challenge which the House threw down he took up and flung back. Yet in all this a subtle perception was manifest of the sensibilities of Parliament, which he very delicately managed. There is nothing which the House of Commons dislikes so much to hear of as the People, in an abstract sense, as a power superior to themselves, and ultimately controlling them. There is no term in the rhetoric of demagogues which is more copiously used, none which occurs so readily to the tongue of the half-educated mob-orator. Mr. Bradlaugh's sense of the peculiar susceptibility of his audience was shown by his carefully avoiding this rhetorical abstraction. There can be little doubt if he succeeds in taking his seat that he will gain and keep the ear of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh is not only an orator by nature and by assiduous cultivation, but he has also the instinct of the debater. Nobody will be more observant than he of the rules of the House or more deferential to the suggestions of the Speaker.

But whether he wins a triumph for himself or not, whether he succeeds in keeping his own seat or in winning it again if he is deprived of it, it is certain that the principle for which he has contended will obtain a speedy victory. The last remaining theological test must go the way of all others. It is no longer necessary to be a member of the Church of England, a Protestant, or a Christian to have a seat in the House of Commons. Jews and Roman Catholics, Mahommedans and Parsees, worshippers of Mumbo-Jumbo, believers in the vilest superstition and heathenism, are now eligible. The present Parliament will not have expired without doing away with the theistic test. No one denies that a man has a right to be an atheist, or rather that he must be an atheist if he cannot convince himself of the truth of revealed or of natural religion. No reasonable person denies that a man who is an atheist has a right to say that he is one, and that he ought not to be hindered from proclaiming his opinions—that is, that he ought not to be forced into hypocrisy, either of silence or of false profession, by placing him under social and political proscription. In what form or at what time the final severance of the exercise of political and civil rights from theological conditions will come it would be hazardous and useless to predict, but it will come soon, and it will be complete when it does come. † † †

THE NEW EASTERN QUESTION.

PARIS, June 25, 1880.

OF the various nationalities which are to be found in the East there is none deserving of so much sympathy as the Greek. The little kingdom created in the first part of this century was unfortunately deprived of the provinces which were necessary to it. The progress of Greece has nevertheless been great; the trade of the Greeks in the East has increased marvellously. During the last war, when it seemed that the Ottoman Empire was on the eve of being destroyed, the Cabinet of Athens preserved a remarkable discretion. It was urged to remain quiet by all the great Powers of Europe; it knew that Russia, who was at war with Turkey, had never felt much affection or interest for the Greek nation. During the debates of the Congress of Berlin the claims of Greece were, however, discussed, and everybody felt that something was due to the wisdom of the young King, who had not introduced new elements of discord in the East, and to the patience of his people. France, always renowned for her Philhellenism, was allowed to become the mouthpiece of Greece in the Congress, and it was unanimously decided that a new frontier must be sought for the little kingdom. This frontier was not definitively fixed, and the King found it necessary to make a journey to the West in order to prepare the work of the Conference which is now being held in Berlin. The change of government in England rendered his task more easy; he would only have found a minimum of support with the Cabinet of Lord Beaconsfield; he found suddenly a maximum of support, which he could hardly have anticipated. Who could feel more sympathy for his claims than Mr. Gladstone, who has such an ardent love of Hellenism and such an unmitigated contempt for the barbarous and destructive rule of the Osmanlis? Mr. Goschen's mission marked, in the strongest possible way, England's change of attitude towards the Porte. At Vienna, on his way to Constantinople, Mr. Goschen had an interview with Baron Haymerle, and he is said to have astonished the Austrian diplomat by the vivacity of his anti-Turkish sentiments. At Constantinople Mr. Goschen was only prevented by an invariable diplomatic tradition from expressing his sympathies and his political feelings in the compliments which he had to address to the Sultan when he presented his credentials.

It is difficult even now for the Turks to understand the change which has taken place. They find that the strict execution of all the clauses of the Treaty of Berlin is now demanded by everybody, but the severest demands are not those of the Power which conducted its armies to the very gates of Constantinople, but of the Power which has so long held the integrity of the Turkish Empire for a dogma. Russia went home almost empty-handed; she took but a few Asiatic districts from the domain of the Sultan. England is in possession of Cyprus, a large island placed between Constantinople and the Isthmus of Suez, and commanding the naval road to Syria. It is not to be wondered at if the Turks turn to England and say: "Give us back Cyprus or be more kind to our faults." Cyprus may perhaps be given back, as the Ionian Islands were once, but if it is, it is not probable that it will fall again under the Ottoman Empire. This is the secret of the future; meanwhile, the Powers are engaged on the boundary of the Greek kingdom. The King had two objects in his visit: he had first to insist on certain limits, naturally the most favorable to his people; he claimed not only Janina but Metsovo, which is even more important for the Greeks, as it is the key of two great valleys which form two large basins, one opening on the Adriatic, the other on the Gulf of Salonica. Greece, if it is to become a strong kingdom, could, in my opinion, even better dispense with Janina than with Metsovo, as railways, which always follow the great geographical basins, will undoubtedly be built some day from Metsovo to the two seas. The line which is claimed by the Greeks would add to the kingdom the whole of Thessaly even to the north of Mount Olympus and almost the whole of ancient Epirus. The Conference is just now engaged in studying the various lines proposed for the future boundary, and it is assisted in this work by a technical commission of geographers. The Greek and Turkish envoys are not admitted to this Conference, and they can only see the ambassadors between the sittings where their fate is decided.

I have said above that the King of Greece had a twofold object: he not only recommended a certain line of frontier, he had to feel the pulse of the great Powers on another question—the question of executing the resolutions of the Conference. This is a most difficult question, and for many reasons. According to a former agreement, the resolutions of the Conference are adopted by a simple majority of votes; they do not, therefore, represent necessarily a unanimous desire, even if all the Powers accept them in form. On the other hand, the Conference is not engaged in an arbitration, the results of which would be binding on the two Powers which have accepted or asked for it. What is taking place is a mere mediation; the mediators have only to recommend a certain solution to the two parties, they have not bound themselves to enforce their decision. It is consequently permitted to ask, and the King of Greece did not fail to do so, how the resolutions of the Conference will be executed. It is not certain, though it may be hoped, that Turkey will accept the decisions of the Western Powers; still, if these decisions do not represent a unanimous wish, the Porte will naturally be tempted to refuse to give way before Greece. There are very few examples of a Power abandoning a province without a struggle, unless under very strong pressure at least; and the fatalistic theories of the Turks incline them to submit always to force rather than to persuasion. The statesman with whom the King of Greece conversed in France on this difficult question of the occupation of Thessaly and Epirus, asked him how many troops he could lead into these provinces; he answered candidly that the Greek army at the present moment hardly numbered three thousand men, most of whom were volunteers. Some astonishment was expressed at the smallness of this number, as the Turks have even now about eight thousand men in these provinces. The small districts of Albania which were awarded to Montenegro by the Treaty of Berlin are still in the hands of the Albanians, who have formed a league and are not willing to have their territory dismembered. The Turkish troops which have been sent against the Albanians have practically become the allies of the insurgents, and the case of Montenegro shows what difficulties may be encountered if large provinces like Thessaly are to be annexed to Greece; the King did not conceal his opinion that it would be necessary to occupy these provinces with a great military force, as Austria has occupied Bosnia and Herzegovina.

But who would furnish that force? Austria had her own army all ready, and her expedition had all the character of a war; if she did not meet with any great opposition it was precisely because her forces were overwhelming. The King of Greece soon convinced himself that in the actual temper of the French and of the English Parliaments it would be very difficult for him to obtain a military force composed of French or of English troops. The very notion of a new joint expedition like the Crimean would excite the greatest alarm in the city of London and in France. The Liberal Cabinet could not speak of a foreign expedition, with all its risks, and, though Gambetta may have warlike ideas, he is obliged to conceal them very carefully. The optimism of the present day would soon be followed by the greatest apprehensions if France and England should embark together in an adventure of such import as the occupation of distant provinces in the East. People would fear the resistance of the Porte, the darkest designs on the part of Powers which might secretly favor this resistance, the possibility of a general war. It was, therefore, resolved that other means must be tried; the King of Greece was invited to increase his army, and the Greek Parliament is now taking the first measures to this end. There was some mention made of an occupation by mixed forces belonging to other countries; but the neutral countries of Europe, such as Belgium and Switzerland, have always shown a decided repugnance to lending their troops to Europe. King Leopold is not likely to do now what his father refused to do. The Greeks are looking for help in other directions; they would willingly say, as Charles Albert once said, "L'Italia farà da se," but they remember that this proud saying was followed by the disaster of Novara.

The King of Greece seems, at any rate, to have obtained one serious guarantee: it is understood, if I am well informed, that the naval forces of France and England will protect Athens and the Piræus against a possible attack by the Turkish fleet in case war breaks out in Thessaly. Great efforts are also making in Berlin to impose such conditions on Turkey and on Greece that all the Powers can agree to them. It is thought that this unanimity will have a great effect at Constantinople, and will prevent the Turks from resisting the resolutions of the Conference. The secrecy which surrounds its deliberations has been thus far well preserved; still, it can be guessed that its work is not an easy one. It is, to a great extent, influenced by external considerations, which have nothing in common with the welfare of Greece. The Greek question has become the nucleus of all the forces which are at work in the various countries. Russia "ne boude pas, elle se recueille"; she has become very timid, she is afraid of Germany, and she is watching her opportunity. The German Chancellor is in a good-humored frame of mind towards everybody, yet he cannot but feel that his plans have been very much disturbed by the change of government in England; he is trying to win favor again with Russia. Austria follows her old and traditional policy. France has become less passive, and Gambetta said a few days ago, in the heart of Belleville, that she was now ready to resume her rôle in Europe, and to play again her part in the history of the world. The most acute observer would have some difficulty in divining how the elements which are now at work will crystallize, how the nations of Europe will group themselves, in what manner the interests of Austria, Italy, Russia will be satisfied. The desire for peace is universal. We are in an era of "good feeling"; but a keen observer must see that this state of things might very easily be altered. No country has any very definite programme; the old Conservative policy in the East has been abandoned, and, it must be confessed, for very good reasons. The rule of the Turks is definitively condemned; but when it comes to the organization of the numerous provinces of the Turkish Empire one difficulty rises behind another. Rumania wishes to become a kingdom; Bulgaria, Rumelia, Servia, Albania, Montenegro, and now Greece are so many centres of agitation. Let us hope that so many causes of disturbance will produce no real disturbance, and that the wisdom of the European statesmen will succeed in solving so many problems without the dreadful ultima ratio of nations and of kings.

THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S DICTIONARY.

LONDON, June 26, 1880.

WHATEVER interest Mill Hill, Middlesex, N. W., may possess as the home of some of Charles the Second's favorites, as a haunt of Franklin when he was working for the cause of the Colonies, as the site of a famous Nonconformist Academy, and the place at which the Redemptorists have built a stately college, none of these things would have moved me to visit it. To be sure I took these things by the way, and I enjoyed the rural peace so strangely near the heart of the great city; but I was not thinking of Nell Gwynn, nor of Franklin, nor of the varying fortunes of the academy which had died and risen again to a new form, nor of the Redemptorists as I stood at the close of a long summer day before the gate of a quiet cottage which bore the not uncommon name Sunnyside. I had almost forgotten my errand, and was thinking mainly how hard a place Mill Hill had been to get at. To judge by my experience, if you study your time-tables with especial care, and in addition to that ask and take the advice of a resident, you will lose much time and all your patience in reaching by rail a place which is ridiculously near London. Be not deceived. It is not only the unwary foreigner that is so entrapped by local trains: the Londoners are as often perplexed as any innocent stranger, and I am doing a service to mankind when I warn all persons to eschew Bradshaw, A. B. C., Metropolitan Railways, and other devices of the devil, and resort in all such cases to the friendly offices of the hansom.

But my troubles were ended, and the reward of my pilgrimage began when I was ushered upon the scene where the preliminary work of the Philological Society's Dictionary is going on, and was cordially welcomed by the editor, who has buckled down to a task which demands by its very conditions a long stretch of years. For the greater security of the precious materials a detached room of galvanized iron has been built in Dr. Murray's yard, spacious, bright, cheery, but a very workshop in its simplicity. The walls are lined with tiers of pigeon-holes, 1,129 in number, as I was told in case I should happen to be of a statistical turn of mind, and these pigeon-holes are filled with slips of a uniform size, especially prepared for the purpose, made up into bundles in varying degrees of forwardness. A third of A is fairly ready for printing, but printing is not thought of before 1882. The process of sorting the slips passes through several stages, from mere mechanical alphabetizing on until it reaches the assistant, Mr. Herrtage, who makes a preliminary draught of the article, which then goes to the editor for final revision, or rather for a provisional preparation for its proper pigeon-hole, as every bundle may be brought out from its rest for additions and corrections. Of course, with the army of readers already enlisted the material is growing so fast that it cannot all be published within the compass prescribed by the Clarendon Press, but the treasures of the scriptorium, as Dr. Murray calls his house, will be available for future research.

It may, indeed, weary the eye of faith somewhat to strain its vision into 1895 for the complete fulfilment of the promise. Still, if we can round the century with an English dictionary really worthy of the name, it will be something to be heartily thankful for. At present there are comparatively few points of the history or usage of words that are definitively settled, and the contrast to Grimm, Sanders, Littré is at once mortifying and irritating. American literary men are great consulters of dictionaries—none more so, except perhaps the Scotch, who know that they cannot trust their usage, while we only feel at times uncertain of ours. Indeed, we are far more nervous than we are willing to admit even to ourselves. Despite our attempted independence, the charge of Americanism is very galling to our men of letters, and, as our grammar is more regular than that of our English cousins, so we are prone to pick our words and phrases, and by over-daintiness to rob our style of native freshness and ease. The better American writer, when he does not mimic, is likely to be a trifle old-fashioned, and you can frighten even the average American littérateur out of any phrase by telling him with due emphasis that it is bad English; for, apart from certain popular writers who deal professedly in exaggeration of our provincial peculiarities, our authors are not satisfied with good American. Now, if we must run to the dictionary in every time of trouble, let us have one which it will be worth while to consult. For my own part, I should theoretically prefer the courage which would enable us to be ourselves; but as a dictionary is a covert from the tempest, I wish to see the timid adequately protected, and the hesitating led by a faithful ductor dubitantium. I can remember having been induced to give up several expressions, which I afterwards found to be excellent English, because some one raised objection. It seemed safer, at all events, to employ other terms. So once in translating Catullus's "ait fuisse navium celerrimus" I wrote, by way of mimicking the syntactical peculiarity of the line, "claims to have been." This rendering I abandoned at the suggestion of a fastidious friend, to find some years after that the distinguished Latinist Munro, at one of the great centres of English scholarship, translated the two words in exactly the same way—bad English or not. With this incident freshly brought to my mind by the discussion in the Nation I asked Dr. Murray to produce "claim, v. intr.,' and we found that the lawgivers of English from Jewell down furnish ample warrant for the use.

I need not go into the mechanical details of the work. Every scholar of this generation knows the use of slips and pins and elastic bands, and how much time such simple devices as movable bookracks have saved the world; but it was for all that very interesting to see the machinery in operation, and a high pleasure to talk with the director of the whole undertaking, sunshiny and confident and energetic, with all the keenness and the perseverance of his race. You do not pray that he may complete his work; you count on his doing it, and you feel the strong desire to help which is always inspired by the sight of successful activity. The cordial invitation to Mill Hill which Dr. Murray gave publicly in his address as President of the Philological Society, was wisely given. Every one who comes within the scriptorium feels the spirit resting on him; and under this fresh impulse I desire to call the attention of American readers once more to this undertaking, for which many eyes and many hands are yet needed. I have before me a list of some six hundred words from Ab to Ad for which illustrative quotations on earlier or later instances are wanted, and such lists will be issued from time to time, and be distributed among the regular readers and the friends of the dictionary. Surely in this way every American scholar might be able to help, especially as it is not necessary to write to Mill Hill, for Professor March, of Lafayette College, is the marshal of the American forces, who are doing good work, as I was most happy to learn. But the mention of Professor March's name reminds me that he has worked so faithfully and so effectively that it is very unlikely that anything can be done by a new appeal; and yet as I was, if I mistake not, the first American to visit the scriptorium, I cannot leave my impression unrecorded, or forbear to say a word which by chance may further the good cause.

THE NATION, GENERAL GARFIELD, AND GENERAL HANCOCK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is one thing which I am more concerned about than even the election of General Hancock to the Presidency—that is, my esteem for the opinions of the Nation; for I think it much more important for the country to have such a judicial and impartial censor as this journal has been than to have either of the parties in possession of the Administration. But the labored vindication of General Garfield's Crédit Mobilier and De Golyer Contract transactions on the part of the Nation makes the unhappy impression upon the unbiassed mind that the independent Republicans are sugar-coating an unpleasant pill to swallow it more gracefully. Every one expected that they would take the Republican candidate, be he who he may, for the phantom of the South back of the Democratic party is at any time enough to drive them all into the fold. But let me ask the Nation if its vindication of General Garfield has done more than represent him as a man who is always "on the make," ready at any time to do anything that will pay? And is that "indiscretion" upon which the Nation lays all the blame of his questionable transactions anything more than the spontaneous impulse of his natural character determining his conduct?

Several questions the Nation does not bring up occur in reading its vindication of him. One is, Why did not General Garfield confront Ames before the committee and cross-question him, instead of writing an ex-parte defence for circulation among his friends? Why was he subsequently denounced by many respectable Republicans of his own district for his complicity in this Crédit-Mobilier business if "his conduct in 1871 is not to be judged in the light of 1880"? (Nation, 783, p. 6). Does not his connection with the De Golyer contract show that he is willing "for a consideration" to use his influence as a member of Congress and chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to secure a contract for the benefit of lobbyists? and does it alter the character of his services to maintain that the said contract was no worse than contracts with the Government usually are? So that I am constrained to feel, much against my wishes, even with no other information than the Nation itself furnishes, that its vindication of General Garfield is unsatisfactory, while as a reply to the charges as they appear in the Sun and Herald it does not seem to meet them at all.

But what as to General Garfield's record in politics? With the single exception of his creditable stand against inflation by paper and by silver money he has been found on both sides of the same question, according as one or the other was most acceptable to his party. He resisted every attempt the Democrats made to carry out his own previously-expressed views on the use of the army at elections, and the employment of deputy-marshals. He has been both a protectionist and a free-trader. And lastly no one has degraded himself more to "wave the bloody shirt" and point to the unclosed "chasm" between North and South than he has, although it made his record an inconsistent one when he saw that further political honors depended upon this sacrifice of truth and consistency. And just as he was rewarded for his De Golyer Contract services, so was he rewarded with a seat in the Senate by a party which delights to honor its candidates for office in proportion to their moral turpitude.

May I furthermore ask the Nation if it means to imply (in No. 783) that by the nomination of General Hancock the Democrats embody the idea of "military interference with civil jurisprudence at the very time the Republicans have abandoned it"? Will the Nation, whose instruction I value more than that of any or all other journals put together in the Union, show me why a general of the army would misuse it to oppress one part of the country for the benefit of the other any sooner than a depraved politician like Mr. Blaine, who would stop at nothing to reduce the South again to a condition of vassalage to the Republican party, and to carry out his implied threats in the Senate about the South not being truly represented in Congress because the color of his party is not sent there? Did not the choice of the Republican party lie between General Grant and Mr. Blaine, and can so astute a journal as the Nation maintain the position that the nomination of General Garfield by the merest accident is "a final discarding of military ideas and military methods"? The Nation and the "rest of mankind" know that there never was a more unpremeditated act of a political party than the Chicago nomination, which represents nothing but the anxiety of a political party to retain its spoils at any cost, and hatred and suspicion of the South.

General Hancock never could have been nominated without the votes of the Southern delegates, who were not in a single case "machine men," but representatives of the people. Bayard was the almost unanimous choice of the South, as the first ballot showed, and would have been entirely so but for their knowledge that no Southern man could secure Northern votes; and General Hancock never could have secured our votes if he had not proved that his opinions as to the "supremacy of the Constitution and of civil jurisprudence" were the same as Washington's at a time when not only the military satraps but the political statesmen of the Republican party sneered at the Constitution and set at naught all the civil jurisprudence of the South. General Hancock is to the South the very embodiment of the idea that military methods will now for ever cease, and that the Government as conducted by Washington, Jefferson, and Madison will be resumed for the first time since the war, because his letter of March 9, 1868, to the "military" Governor Pease of Texas was the only deliverance made by a person in power from 1865 to 1874 which maintained the supremacy of the Constitution. Not even your "ideal" Republican, Senator Edmunds, has ever given the least indication of any respect for the Constitution or "civil jurisprudence" when the interests of his party could be maintained at their expense.

The issue, as we of the South see it, is whether our irresistible gravitation toward a centralized government shall go on, and the said centralization crystallize under the auspices of a party whose whole history and every act of legislation have embodied the idea of hatred to the South and her oppression, and, if need be, suppression, for its own supremacy, under a candidate whose record furnishes not one act to show that he is above his party; or under the auspices of a party whose platform is the supremacy of the Constitution, and a united people no longer estranged by an inevitable war inherited from former generations in the diverse constitutions of the several States which created the Union, under a candidate who, as a major-general, by his devotion to the Constitution, law, order, put to shame all the political statesmen of the Republican party, and "whose opinions on civil affairs are" not "unknown," as the Nation says, but whose letter, referred to above, is a better state paper than any Republican President ever wrote. The Nation refers to "General Hancock's utterances in Louisiana in 1867" in such a way as to lead me to suppose it has not recently read his letter of March 9, 1868, to Governor Pease, of Texas. Will the Nation read it and tell its subscribers what better platform the Democratic party could have than that letter with which to meet a party that still tenaciously holds on to the power to use troops at the polls, which it usurped in defiance of the Constitution to maintain its supremacy, and which unmistakably evinces a determination thereby to use that power again if it can?—Respectfully, WM. R. ATKINSON.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 5, 1880.

THE INDEPENDENTS AND THE CANVASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The correct position of the Independent Republicans towards the Presidential campaign is very well stated in your issue of July 1, and also in the circulars of the Philadelphia Reform League, but there is one aspect of the case which, in my opinion, ought to be emphasized even at this early day. I refer to the more than probable determination of the "Bosses" to bring forward General Grant as a candidate in 1884, and the influence which this intention must have on this year's election.

Already it is openly proclaimed by the Grant men that they are certain of the nomination of their man four years hence, that Garfield cannot be elected, and that in 1884 the country will more than ever need a "strong man" to wrest it from the (then existing) Democratic misrule under Hancock. The "third-term" cry will have lost all of its force when two terms have intervened since General Grant's last possession of power, and "306" clubs—referring to the number of Grant's supporters at Chicago—are to be formed within the next three months in every Northern county. Talk like this may be heard daily by any one who, like the writer, possesses the good or ill fortune to know enthusiastic Conkling men intimately. Much of it may be mere swaggering, but it would be folly to disregard the sentiments it discloses. These entail, in my opinion, a great responsibility on the Independents.

If Garfield is defeated this year, there can be no doubt that Boss Government will, in the Republican party at least, obtain a new lease of power. The principles of the Independents were triumphant at Chicago, and were again vindicated by the election of Governor Jewell to the chairmanship of the National Committee. If after all this the party is defeated, the Bosses and their henchmen will all unite in one great chorus, "We told you so." The cause of civil-service reform will be momentarily crushed, not only by the victory of the hungry Democrats, but especially by the defeat of its chosen champion.

It argues great political simplicity to believe that the Conklings, Logans, and Camerons would very greatly deplore such an issue. Arthur could be provided for by the United States Senatorship from this State—a place which but for his Vice-Presidential nomination he would have tried to obtain, and which now is coveted, with the Boss's approval, by the notorious Thomas C. Platt; and whatever temporary inconvenience might result in the loss of patronage by reason of Hancock's election, would be amply compensated four years later by the return of the "old man" and the "old set."

Under these circumstances Independent Republicans should see that this year presents to them their one great opportunity. They, more than any other section of the party, should work for Garfield's election. Having for once a candidate after their own heart—handicapped as he is by the Arthur blunder—it behoves them, even more than last year, to show their fighting mettle. In New York State their position is most commanding. Here, it seems to me, they should organize by counties and let the State Committee, elected at Albany, at once begin a thorough canvass to bring out the "conscience vote." The advisability of a State Convention has been much discussed, and possibly it might be well to issue a call for one. But at all events it is only by thorough organization and hard work, as well as by keeping in view the effect which the result of this canvass must have on the Machine, that the Republican ticket, and with it the Independent principles, can achieve success. Truly yours, F. W. H.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y., July 3, 1880.

THE FUTURE OF THE INDEPENDENT REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The query is made, why, if the so-called Independent Republicans are satisfied, or reasonably satisfied, with the Presidential ticket and the results at Chicago, there remains any necessity for the continuance of their separate organizations? It may be answered that now, and for two or three years hence, is the time when this element may be most useful to the country and to the party. "Reform within the party" being at last possible, it is for the men who have made it possible to continue together as a progressive and aggressive element inside the party. This view, I may say, is held by the Young Republicans of Massachusetts and of Rhode Island, the National Republican League of Pennsylvania, the Independent Republican organization of New York, and by progressive Republicans in many other States, particularly Illinois and Missouri, who acted in co-operation with representatives of those organizations at Chicago. For this reason they have recommended the continuance of Independent Republican organizations, and the following suggestions for their immediate work have already received the approval o many of the most active men among them:

1. The best service that can be done for the Republican cause in the coming campaign is to obtain the most direct comparisons of the principles which the respective parties support or have supported. It has long been a difficulty in the way of our political education that the old-fashioned political debate, which was so remarkable a feature of the memorable Lincoln and Douglas campaign, has been given up, and most men nowadays see only their own side of the question, and read only the newspapers of their own party. If the Independent Republicans, by challenging debate from the Democratic side, and by promoting such debate as a general plan of the campaign, can bring back the old methods, and especially if they can by means of a free platform and other invitations to the private citizen, interest in practical work those who are now apathetic (particularly the younger men), they will do the best thing that can be done not only to elect a Republican President, but to back up that President by intelligent support from within his own party.

2. In the present feeling of too many party managers as to civil-service reform and honest money it remains for the Independents to emphasize these principles in the canvass, and to insist that they shall be made prominent in it. It is to be hoped that Gen. Garfield's letter of acceptance will speak clearly and ringingly on both points. If not, the Independents may fairly ask for his full views on these specific questions. The battle for sound money is in one sense won; in another it yet remains to reap the fruits of the victory by insisting that no dollar is a dollar unless it is or can be at any time exchanged for so many grains of gold. The issue of civil-service reform is still more distinctively in the hands of those known as Independent Republicans. The first work is the education of the party and the public to what civil-service reform does and does not mean, for there is no question on which there is so much misapprehension in the minds of business men. I am glad to be able to say that Mr. George William Curtis has promised to write a brief practical tract on this subject, which will be published by a non-partisan organization for political education now in process of formation, for use not only by Republicans but by Democrats who desire to see this question properly brought before the people.

It was proposed last year to introduce into the House a simple Civil-Service Bill, so simple that "this particular measure" could not be objected to, which should have the specific result of keeping out from the public service the illiterate and unqualified dummies of party Bosses. It is to be remembered that it is for this negative purpose that competitive examinations are useful, and that the positive test comes in the period of probation which follows. But the ill success of Senator Bayard's attempt to compel a record on the sister question of a sound finance made this unadvisable. It is to be hoped, however, that a similar measure may be introduced at the coming session, and representatives, especially Republican representatives, be held strictly to a record on that subject. A member of the New York Association has already in hand the still more important work of preparing a more comprehensive and effective bill in consultation, after the German fashion, with those experts throughout the country who know most about the subject; and on this or its equivalent the final battle must be fought, as the forces become recruited for the work.

3. The party can only be kept what it should be by the maintenance of absolute independence inside the party by this element. Party relations will never be what they should be in this country until the party is compelled to tell the citizen why he should vote with his party, instead of asking him why he should not vote with it. The designs of the "managers," who are still intent on keeping hold of the machinery of the party, can only be balked by defeating their candidates when these are unfit. And now that "scratching" has come into fashion, let it never go out. Coupled with this is the necessity for training the public to entire independence of party names and party issues in municipal government. It is, indeed, here that the education can be most easily begun which shall keep national parties to their work of presenting the issues of principles on which the whole people desire to express their opinions.

The danger, of course, before such a movement is that it may itself become selfish and over-conservative and fall into the old ruts. The first safeguard against this is the essentially negative character of the movement as regards men. So long as it is fighting for principles and has no candidates of its own, it is less likely to be captured by designing politicians. The movement has hitherto not been spared the criticism of the press, and with an enlargement of its membership and an active co-operation in its work on the part of those enrolled under its name, the dangers which have wrecked similar organizations before ought to be avoided. It is to be hoped that the influence of the movement, so far chiefly a negative work of purification, may now be as manifest in a positive direction. It is to my own regret that, having had to do with the starting of the movement in this State, I for one am prevented by business absence abroad from taking that positive part which should necessarily supplement the negative. But those whose good fortune it is to share in reaping the fruits of their victory are, I think, determined that now that the party has profited by their criticism, it shall also profit by their co-operation. The campaign of 1880 is likely to be one of the closest in our history, not in Oregon or Florida or Louisiana, but at our own doors, and it is of the utmost importance that no vote which the results at Chicago have fairly won for the Republican party shall be lost to it.

R. R. BOWKER.

NEW YORK, July 5, 1880.

Notes.

WE learn from the N. E. Genealogical Register that Mr. Charles W. Tuttle has in preparation lives of Sir Humphrey Gilbert; of Capt. John Mason, the founder of New Hamphire; of Capt. Francis Champernowne; memoirs of Edward Randolph, William Blaxton (Blackstone), the first settler on the site of Boston, of Hugh Percy, Duke of Northumberland; and an historical account of the conquest of Acadia by the Dutch in 1674.——A campaign life of General Hancock by Col. J. W. Forney will be one of the literary curiosities of the season.——D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, will shortly bring out an American edition of 'The Englishman and the Scandinavian; or, A Comparison of Anglo-Saxon and Old-Norse Literature.'——A. Williams & Co., Boston, have in press a second edition of Rear-Admiral Preble's 'History of the Flag of the United States of America.'——'Passages from the Prose Writings of Matthew Arnold' is announced by Macmillan & Co.——James R. Osgood & Co. have in preparation a Congressional district vote-map of the United States; and the following works: 'Dramatic Biographies,' edited by Laurence Hutton; 'Self-Culture,' by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke; 'Records and Reminiscences of the Radical Chestnut Street Club,' edited by Mrs. John T. Sargent; 'Poems,' by William Winter; 'Illustrations of the Earth's Structure,' by Professor N. S. Shaler and W. Morris Davis; 'Wm. M. Hunt,' by Dr. Angell; and 'Modern Perspective,' by Professor Wm. R. Ware.——The suspension of the Literary Journal for want of support leaves a distinct void in our periodical literature. It was original in plan, interesting in its contents, and a pleasure to the eye. Some of its features will be transferred to the Publishers' Weekly, under Mr. Leypoldt's direction.——We regret to record the death of the Rev. Barnas Sears, formerly President of Brown University, and latterly the devoted agent of the Peabody Fund for promoting education at the South. The selection of the Trustees could not have fallen upon one better qualified to discharge the delicate and important task committed to him. He was in the seventy-seventh year of his age.——F. A. Brockhaus, in Leipzig, has begun the publication of a popular scientific work, entitled 'An Illustrated Natural History of Animals' ('Illustrirte Naturgeschichte der Thiere'), edited by Ph. L. Martin, of Stuttgart. The work, when complete, will comprise two volumes, and will be issued in fifty numbers, of about fifty pages each, at a cost of eighteen kreutzers per number. The first volume will treat of mammals and birds, the second of reptiles, fishes, insects, crustacea, and the lower animals, both verbally and pictorially. The sub-editors are Professor Knauer, of Vienna; Dr. Heineke, of Oldenburg; and Dr. Rey, of Leipzig. The illustrations will be furnished by F. Specht, R. Friese, R. Kretzschmer, and artists of equal reputation.——A 'Numismatic Dictionary' now publishing in French at Leipzig by Weigel deserves the attention of all those who have a passion for the subject. The author is Alexandre Boutowski, who has bestowed fourteen years upon it, to his great personal disadvantage. Polybiblion bestows the highest praise on the sixteen livraisons (pp. 1,056, 8vo) which have already appeared.——Hachette announces the third edition since 1842 of Charton's 'Dictionnaire des Professions,' or Business Guide as it might be called in the sense in which the phrenologists used to offer their services in determining one's proper vocation. In a country of government endowments and examinations and "careers" like France such a work has a special value; but it ought to be of use elsewhere.——The fourth and fifth fascicules of the new Vapereau (F. W. Christern) carry us to Victor Hugo. Gambetta's name leads all the rest in the degree of attention his career receives (5 pp.); Guizot has 4 pages allotted to him, Beaconsfield nearly as many, the account stopping short of his late defeat, and so losing the moral; Gladstone, Garibaldi, Jules Favre (whose death is unrecorded), and the Emperor William fill 3 pages each; Dufaure, Dupanloup, Francis Joseph, Émile de Girardin, Grévy, and Paul Granier de Cassagnac fill 2 pages and upwards. The American portion we still find inadequate and somewhat antiquated, except in the case of General Grant, whose biography occupies 3 pages, and chronicles an event not yet come to pass—a "réception pompeuse" in New York in December, 1879. Mr.

Evarts's present secretaryship is unnoticed, and so is Mr. Frederick Douglass's marshalship. The latter, we read, is a "nègre publiciste," which seems an odd designation. His journal, the North Star, becomes "L'Abeile du Nord." Mr. Hayes gets half a page of mention, but, such are the uncertainty and unreasonableness of our politics, neither of the actual candidates for the Presidency is alluded to.——Part 10 of Koolman's 'Dictionary of the East-Frisian Language' (Norden: Herm. Braams) finishes the letter J and well-nigh K also. Interesting nautical terms are kabüse (caboose), kat-anker, kîl-halen (keel-haul), etc. For their etymologies the articles kalf, kellen (kill, quell, quail), klamp, klap (clap, as of thunder), klappen (as to clap on the back), etc., are noticeable. Junge and kat are particularly rich in proverbs.

—An authoritative word on a subject not often discussed intelligently appeared in a recent number of the Salem Gazette, from the pen of Mr. Henry F. Waters. Mr. Waters contests with Mr. Ben Perley Poore the honor of having the best collection of Colonial furniture in the country, or he may be facile princeps. He is also a diligent searcher among the ancient records, and one of his arguments is based on the particularity of the inventories contained in the probate registry down to 1694. Thus, "so careful were our ancestors to enumerate even such trifles as 'three old rusty currycombs,' a 'rusty gun-barrel and a skillet with a broken leg,' 'a broken frosnet and a cod-line,' 'three stools and half a box,' etc., etc.," that a desk or a bookcase would certainly appear in such lists if it existed. But these articles are not named; consequently the newspaper item which furnishes Mr. Waters his text, and which states that "a solid mahogany secretary brought from England to Salem before 1692 is in the possession of a Hartford citizen," is in error. And doubly so, for the claim of so great antiquity is again upset by mention of the "solid mahogany." Here, for the benefit of our readers, we may quote Mr. Waters's own words:

"The larger furniture of the Colonial period (meaning by that the period down to the creation of a Provincial form of government in 1692) seems to have been made of oak chiefly, or combined occasionally with pine, chestnut, cedar, and walnut. After the change in the form of government, when the fashions also seem to have been changing, walnut seems to have become the most fashionable wood in use, while the shapes and the style of decoration had also become more or less changed. The chest, especially, which had been gradually encroached upon by the addition of drawers beneath the box, now merged into the more useful form of a chest of drawers—all drawers and no box—which was no chest at all. Birch and maple were also used, evidently for cheapness. Mahogany succeeded as the favorite wood for cabinet-work, and the first furniture made out of it is said to have been made by Wollaston, in London, out of a few planks given to Dr. Gibbons in 1720. Of course its introduction into the Colonies would be much later."

Mr. Waters has also something amusing to say about Mayflower and other old china, which would be worth repeating if we had space.

—A study of "Frontier Folk," by Mr. George Booth, is perhaps the most readable paper in the International Review for July; his subject has been much written about, but generally in a desultory way, so that a great deal of what he has to say has the effect at least of freshness. Frontier folk are, he points out, mainly nomadic; every one is either "an elegant gentleman" or a liar and horse-thief; homicide is venal compared with theft, though killing a man at sight is much rarer than in the Southwest; self-conceit is a universal characteristic, and the visitor is invariably required to "allow" he has never seen a finer "claim" or tasted better food; their cooking, however, is abominable and their manners as bad; every stranger who doesn't eat with his knife is cordially despised as a "tender-foot," whereas a mean revenge is taken in permitting only the term "Missourian" to affect their own sensibility; some of them, having lost the run of events, still speak of "abolitionists" and "Lincoln's hirelings." The miners and prospectors are much more agreeable—hardy, fearless, and sociable. The army has a hard time, according to Mr. Booth, who draws anything but an attractive picture of military life on the plains; officers and men are pestered and preyed upon by frontier lawyers, and the supremacy of the civil authority works them many discomforts; they are always busy, and it is not unusual for cavalry to pass six or eight months without seeing a permanent camp; many of the men are continually employed in manual labor, and sometimes go into action with no previous drill. Scouts, half-breeds, "squaw-men" or renegades, and cattle-raisers—many of the last being "young men of excellent education and social position"—go to make up the remainder of the frontier folk. There is a review of Brande's 'Beaconsfield,' noting a thoroughly un-Teutonic mass of historical blunders; the labor question is discussed by a "reformer" in a way which the editors rightly think "easily susceptible of refutation"; Mr. Hamerton completes his review of Mr. Poynter's 'Lectures on Art'; Julius Wilcox contributes a narrative-paper, in the nature of an "exposure," on "The Wrecking of Life Insurance Companies," the statements of which would be incredible if they were not notorious; and Dr. Holmes writes a long essay upon "Jonathan Edwards," for criticism in detail of which there is perhaps as little call as we conceive there is for the article itself.

—The English art journals have contained little of interest lately, but we may mention some of Mr. Hamerton's recent Portfolio paragraphs and several early sketches by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, which a loyal contributor furnishes to the June number of the Magazine of Art. "The Queen," it seems, "is not merely a dilettante admirer of painting, she is herself an artist," though apparently not a great one, to judge from the cuts of four etchings—two of little girls and two of dog's heads—signed "V. R., 1840." In the May Portfolio Mr. Hamerton has an answer to some crass articles of the Pall Mall Gazette that is worth reading for the neatness and good temper with which it snubs writers who, trusting to their "good, sound common sense," as it says, "sometimes deal with subjects for which they have neither been fitted by nature nor prepared by education"; apparently the Jingoism of the Pall Mall had spread to its art department. The June number reviews a volume of wood-cuts issued by the Messrs. Scribner in the main very favorably, remarking that "wood-engraving, imitating the qualities of many different kinds of art, has never been carried so far in Europe as it is now in America," and finding but one objection to them, namely, a painful sense of the toil involved. Painters, by the way, who concern themselves much about the paraphernalia and machinery of painting may be glad to learn that Mr. Hamerton has devised a means to avoid some of the toil and delay involved in sketching in oil from nature; it consists in spreading a sheet of "gossamer" manifold-paper over the canvas after it is covered with paint, so that the sketch is ready for a "fresh coat," as it were, without waiting for the "priming" to dry. Other painters will probably go on in the old way.

—The importance of rightly conceiving a writer of genius and, failing this, the inevitableness of missing what is really valuable in him, were never more conspicuously illustrated than in the instance of Mr. Ruskin. Many persons whom he delighted in their youth have long since ceased to read anything he writes, out of sheer inability to keep their tempers in the process. And indeed any one who seeks sound doctrine in not only such extravagances as the prospectus of the St. George's Society, but in Mr. Ruskin's closest reasoning upon his chosen theme of fine art, must appreciate the feeling of the exasperated German who termed him "a wild man." Unhappily, however, genius is a thing of subtle complexity, and his habit of saying "wild" things with arrogant gravity, intolerable as it is to the sincere and sober-minded, need prevent no one from sifting his utterances in the confidence that the result will almost always repay the trouble; and from trouble of this sort no one who reads literature seriously expects to be dispensed. For example, in his article on "Fiction—Fair and Foul," in the last Nineteenth Century, there are a number of just sentiments set forth for the most part with the familiar charm of Mr. Ruskin's vibrating diction. This has got a hearing for many paradoxes, but to object to it on this ground would be to make the same mistake that Mr. Ruskin himself, mutatis mutandis, would make; it is at once the distinction and the privilege of the critical spirit, for which he has no aptitude, to enjoy his musical and affecting eulogy upon a pastoral life, and to accept the amount of truth it contains, without being disturbed by the incompleteness of this or irritated by the counter philippic against the civilization of cities. This is the basis of his present argument, of which the burden is the connection between the inanity and misery of large cities and modern fiction—i.e., "foul" fiction—on the one hand, and between "natural conditions"—i.e., country life—and the novels of Scott on the other. How much grotesqueness and narrowness is exhibited in the exposition no reader of Ruskin, of course, needs to be told; one wishes it could be reviewed by Dr. Johnson—in which event honors would be easy, it may be imagined. Nevertheless, whoever will dismiss from his mind the popular notion that Mr. Ruskin is a "great critic," and Mr. Ruskin's own notion that he is a philosopher, economic and otherwise, and consider him simply as a rhapsodist with a mastery of English prose, will infallibly find that pleasure, of an order high enough to be in itself profit, is to be got from the whimsicalities which perhaps only the license of an "insular" imagination could exalt into profound truths. Even Dr. Johnson would delight in such a passage as this:

"The companionship of domestic, the care of serviceable animals, soften and enlarge his life with lowly charities, and discipline him in familiar wisdoms and unboastful fortitudes; while the divine laws of seed-time which cannot be recalled, harvest which cannot be hastened, and winter in which no man can work, compel the impatiences and covetings of his heart into labor too submissive to be anxious, and rest too sweet to be wanton."

One or more further papers are promised, and though they will probably consist of a "critical" examination of Scott as the chronicler of this kind of life, they will undoubtedly be seasoned, as this is, with something considerably more valuable.

—A paper on "Landscape Painting" in the same number reminds us, however, how seriously Mr. Ruskin has always been taken by a large portion of his fellow-countrymen, and with what results his vogue has been attended. Its author, Sir Robert Collier, is a new name to us, but his appearance in the Nineteenth Century gives him authority and makes it fair to take his paper as an example of much of the fine-art criticism in vogue in England. He is a disciple, albeit he protests discriminating, of "the eloquent writer who first claimed its place for landscape art," and what he has to say is really, so far as it goes, Ruskin minus eloquence after all. It is worth while to note what this residue is. Sir Robert Collier begins by remarking that landscape painting is wholly modern, and he brings a convincing mass of evidence in support of the fact; his argument that the peoples who filled the woods with dryads and fauns and the streams with nymphs had no "appreciation of the beauty of inanimate Nature," is possibly less convincing, but he is very confident that they did not care for "mountain scenery, which has most attractions of all for many people," himself among others very evidently. Landscape painting did not even appear with the Renaissance, and although there were some fine backgrounds to figures, and "Titian sometimes painted weeds finely," in general even Claude and the Poussins "thought that the effect of sunlight was to be rendered by dark, undefined shadows, instead of by gray shadows, sharp-edged, and were guilty of numerous other blunders and delinquencies." As late as Sir Joshua's time it was underestimated, but now opinion has changed, and "there can be no question that less intelligence and culture are required for some appreciation at least of historical and portrait painting than are required for the appreciation of landscape." Still, he has heard "educated men, even men pretending to knowledge of art, gravely maintain that there is nothing picturesque in the Alps!" One reason for the slow growth of the art he attributes to the advantage which the figure-painter has in being able to paint from the model indoors, whereas "the landscape-painter is dependent on the weather"; he justly says, "In the most settled weather what was in light in the morning is in shade in the afternoon," and then there are "the sun, the wind, the rain, and the gnats." Spite of all these disadvantages a great deal has been done, though we have yet to await "the Michael Angelo of landscape." There is Turner, "by general consent the greatest of landscape-painters"; and Constable, "excellent in his careful work, though often coarse and careless, and so mannered as to be easily imitable"; and Stanfield, "perhaps the greatest of marine painters"; and a Düsseldorf school which, however, "is somewhat open to the charge of aiming at tricky and theatrical effect." With the Fontainebleau men Sir Robert has little patience; he thinks they were a lazy lot, who ignored all the difficulties of perspective, drawing, space, distance, sunlight, and color. Corot he especially dislikes, and thinks "the introduction of poorly-drawn fauns, dryads, and other classical persons, ill-adapted to northern fogs," a mistake; his "oaks are as wavy and undecided as his aspens, and his rocks are as soft as sand-heaps." Daubigny "at one time towered above the school," but he soon became "careless, coarse, and blotty." However, even in France there is hope: "The French salon certainly now gives some evidence of a new departure, promising better results." "America, too, can boast her Church and her Bierstadt undaunted by the Rocky Mountains and Niagara." They are indeed.

—Westermann's Monthly for June brings an interesting article from the pen of Prof. Carl Vogt on the geographical distribution, past and present, of animal life, and the possible bearings of migration on such distribution. It attacks with rare vigor some of the hurriedly advanced and rapidly accepted doctrines of evolution. The author restricts his remarks to the later, or Tertiary, period of geological history, and deduces his conclusions from careful comparisons of its extinct mammalian fauna inter se and with the fauna of the present day. The view upheld by some of the leading expounders of evolution, that certain recently discovered animal remains can be considered not only as the ancestors of genera whose pedigrees have been abundantly marked out by a series of connecting links, but as the progenitors of entire families, and possibly even orders, and that, consequently, knowing these ancestral types, we can readily indicate the centres of dispersion whence all the closely allied forms have been spread broadcast over the earth's surface, is stoutly contested by the German savant, who, while admitting that migration may considerably shape geographical distribution, rejects it as an explanation of the broader phenomena as they present themselves. Prof. Vogt insists on the palæontological evidence as to the separation as early as Eocene times—if not previously in the Cretaceous epoch—of the Transatlantic continents; and concludes that, this fact being granted, the forms differentiated in that and the subsequent periods, and which to a great extent run parallel in Europe and America, cannot be considered as derivatives from a common stock whose original abode was in this or that country, while its progeny wandered forth and finally spread itself over the greater portion of the habitable crust. The assumption of separation is based on the fact that of about 140 Eocene genera nearly an equal number, 67, are peculiar to Europe and to America, and only 3—Coryphodon, Lophotherium, and Chalicotherium—common to both countries. This being so, the author ridicules the idea of a possible interchange of forms due to migration, and sets forth an ingenious theory, which may be termed that of "parallel development," to account for the forms which are found closely allied on both sides of the Atlantic. This theory maintains that distribution over distant areas of closely-related families of mammalia is no proof of "radiating" migrations from a central point of dispersion; that, on the contrary, it is more probably the result of local developments, which spread from several distinct roots, and the "branches of whose family-trees gradually approach, and more and more nearly resemble each other, instead of becoming more and more dissimilar, as required by the generally accepted theory." The three perissodactyl forms above enumerated as common to the Transatlantic continents—Coryphodon, Lophotherium, and Chalicotherium—are accordingly considered by Professor Vogt as independent and coincident evolutions both in Europe and America from probably widely diverging ancestral types, just as the European horse traces its descent to Hipparion and Anchitherium, and the American to the forms commencing with Eohippus. In like manner the tapirs are considered to have been developed from two distinct stocks, the American lineage dating to Helaletes and Hyrachyus, and the European to the Lophiodonts. The author, it will thus be seen, rejects the assumption of a Hæckelian Promammal, and arrives at the general conclusion that the existing fauna originated in four distinct regions—the Australian, Madagascar, Old and New World regions—which were already isolated at least as early as the Eocene period, and of which the Australian is the oldest.

WALPOLE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.—THE CONSERVATIVE OPPOSITION.*

IN 1832 the Tories were defeated all along the line, and the Toryism of George the Third and Lord Eldon was destroyed past hopes of revival. Sir Robert Peel, at the very moment of defeat, created the Conservative party, evoked the conservatism of the nation, checked what threatened to be a revolution, within three years broke the strength of the Whigs, and in less than ten returned to office at the head of the ablest and strongest body of Conservatives which has held power during the century. This astounding feat of parliamentary statesmanship is the true theme of Mr. Walpole's third volume. Nowhere can the principles which guided a Conservative opposition under the ablest of all modern Conservative statesmen be better studied than in Mr. Walpole's clear, calm, and impartial narrative; and there is no political topic which at the present moment is better worth study. For though Peel was emphatically a working statesman, who cared and perhaps knew little of the abstract principles of politics, he understood the art of politics better than any man who has lived during the century, and, whether consciously or not, conducted the Conservative opposition to victory through adherence to rules which it concerns every modern politician to understand. Students of parliamentary generalship find in the study of Peel's tactics the same sort of guidance which young officers find in the study of the campaigns of Wellington or of Napoleon. In neither case do students find a body of principles. In each case they have before them lines of practical conduct from which an intelligent critic can deduce the true principles which lead to success in parliamentary or in military contests.

The first principle of genuine conservatism is the acceptance of what are termed, in the slang of modern politics, "accomplished facts." Peel met the Parliament of 1833 with the following declaration:

"It had been said that he was opposed to all reform; the charge he directly denied. . . . He was for reforming every institution that really required reform; but he was for doing it gradually, dispassionately, and deliberately, in order that the reform might be lasting. . . . The King's Government had abstained from all unseemly triumph in the King's speech respecting the measure of reform. He would profit by their example, and would say nothing upon that head, but consider that question as finally and irrevocably disposed of. He was now determined to look forward to the future alone. . . . There were no means of governing this country but through the House of Commons; and, therefore, he was determined to take his stand in defence of law and order from motives as truly independent as those by which any member of the most liberal opinions, and representing the largest constituency in the kingdom, was actuated."

These words sound nowadays commonplace enough. When uttered they changed the course of English history. The resolution to consider parliamentary reform as "finally and irrevocably disposed of" barred Tories off from the two errors of defeated parties—abstention and reaction. They might well have followed the example of Wilson Croker and thrown up the game. This folly is the favorite resource of many Continental politicians. They might, again, have thrown themselves into schemes of reaction—there was much to tempt Tories towards this path. Ideas of revolution and counter-revolution were in the air. O'Connell had something which looked almost like a drilled force behind him. The Orange lodges were an army ready to overthrow the new constitution. No precedent yet bound English opinion to the acceptance of constitutional changes. It did not seem a vain hope that what one bill had created another bill might destroy. Party hatreds unknown to the present generation divided class from class. Panic fears such as still torment Continental statesmen harassed even the calmest minds in England. Lord Grey seemed to Tories to have entered on a path which led to a Reign of Terror; the Tory leaders seemed to the Whigs to be preparing for civil war. In Ireland there was social war already. In England the country districts were oppressed with poverty, the towns were the abode of Chartism. The characters of men had a revolutionary tinge. Brougham and Durham were just the kind of leaders who have again and again on the Continent heralded in a revolution. The Duke of Cumberland was just the man for a coup d'état. When for once he had the chance, he showed in Hanover of what stuff he was made. Yet no one can doubt that, from a conservative no less than from a national point of view, abstention or reaction would inevitably have led to a violent democratic triumph.

When Peel assured the country that he accepted the new constitution he saved his party from ruin; but he did much more than this: he rallied to them in a moment all the conservatism of their opponents. To do this may seem no great feat, but the achievement is one which not one French statesman has yet been able to accomplish. From the day when Marie Antoinette intrigued with the Left to thwart Lafayette, Continental Conservatives have all but invariably preferred the alliance with revolutionists to the candid admission that moderate Liberals had triumphed. If any French Conservative of Peel's ability could assure France that Conservatives frankly and honestly accepted the Republic, the long era of French revolution would be closed, and French Conservatism would become the ruling influence in the Republic. Thiers late in life learnt the elementary principle of sound Conservative policy, and in virtue of this fact died the leading statesman of France. If any proof of Peel's sagacity were needed it is afforded by the career of his bitterest assailant. When the corn-laws were abolished the Conservatives refused to follow the lead of Peel; they preferred the reckless and unprincipled guidance of Disraeli. He could not from his position accept free-trade as Peel had accepted reform. He induced his followers to adopt a sham policy of attempted reaction. From a party point of view the different effects of the different policies are noteworthy. Peel's acceptance of reform at once re-established Conservative influence, and within ten years made the Conservatives masters of the situation. Disraeli's refusal to recognize free-trade kept his party substantially out of power for thirty years. When at last they obtained a spell of office the end was gained by adopting in substance the policy of Peel, and accepting all the great measures carried by Mr. Gladstone before 1874.

The second principle of Conservative Opposition, as developed by Peel, is to show that the reform of every institution which really requires reform can be best carried out by Conservative statesmen. It other words, a leader of Peel's type should always offer the country good administration instead of organic change in the constitution, and should, if possible, show that he can achieve more as a reformer of practical abuses than can really be carried out by his opponents. Of the skill with which Peel developed this line of action it is hardly possible to speak too strongly. When the Whigs passed really great measures, such, for example, as the act for the amendment of the poor-law, the Conservative leader appeared as a patronizing ally. All the odium which every stringent measure excites fell on the Government, whilst the credit due to enlarged views was shared if not monopolized by the Opposition. The English Corporations Act was turned by the House of Lords into a "Conservative arrangement" which, as even old Eldon admitted, did "great credit" to Lyndhurst; but Peel perceived at once that Tory vehemence was spoiling the Conservative game. He nominally defended the action of the House of Lords, but he rejected all their amendments. He stepped in as the patriotic patron of the Government, snubbed the Tories who were trying to escape from his hands, and "persuaded the nation that a Conservative minister at the head of a Conservative party might become the instrument for accomplishing efficient reforms." At the same time, wherever the Whigs were not strong Peel so acted as to increase their weakness. The wrangles session after session over the tithes bill, and the futile attempts to reform the Irish corporations, were, if not caused, certainly stimulated by the parliamentary tactics of Peel. If party contests be regarded simply as a form of warfare, no strategy was ever more admirable. Each day weakened the Government, each day strengthened the Opposition. Nothing but the death of William the Fourth prevented the Whig Government from falling to pieces in 1837. When at last the Whig leaders kept office through the protection of a body of aristocratic waiting-maids the Conservative victory was complete. The only question was how long Peel would think fit to drag his opponents through the dirt, tied to his chariot wheels. The years 1839 to 1841 marked the lowest and most ignominious stage of the Whig collapse. When Peel returned to office he took the fruits of a victory which had been won long before he thought fit to insist on the possession of nominal no less than of actual power.

No one who enjoys skilful generalship can fail to admire Peel's parliamentary campaign. He had no doubt two great advantages. He was the most accomplished administrator of his age, whilst his opponents were mere children in the arts of practical government. The House of Lords, from its constitution, gives an advantage to a Conservative government which is often overlooked but can hardly be overrated: the strongest Liberal government is hampered by a kind of opposition which never thwarts the very weakest of Tory ministries. Still, if Peel had advantages he deserves the credit of having used them with greater effect than any other parliamentary leader who has left a name in English history; and if success as a party leader be the measure of greatness, Peel's campaign between 1832 and 1841 ought to ensure him a fame at least equal to that of Pitt. The rout of the Coalition was a more showy achievement, but a brilliant victory ought not to be deemed as great a triumph as a successful campaign. The question, however, which perpetually haunts the reader of Mr. Walpole's work is whether one can regard a parliamentary contest as a contest and nothing more. Looked at in any other point of view, Peel's leadership suggests several questions which are constantly lost sight of by writers on political history. Is it, in the first place, possible to combine real conservatism with thoroughly good administration? We doubt it. In a country, at any rate, like England half the difficulty of good administration is caused by the necessity for overriding special "interests"; but a government which really "harassed interests" would, whatever its name, not be in reality a conservative government—it would not long retain the support of conservatism. This was the weak point in Peel's policy. Long before he repealed the corn-laws he had ceased to please his supporters. The real or supposed profit of the "landed interest" had at last to be sacrificed to the welfare of the nation: Peel preferred the prosperity of England to the strength of his party. He earned, rightly or not, the fame of patriotism, but his followers, logically enough, deserted him. Reflection suggests that the policy by which he succeeded carried within it the causes of its own ruin. Is it, again, really desirable that reforms should be carried out by the men by whom they have been opposed? When Disraeli termed Peel's system "organized hypocrisy," he hit its weak point. The blow went home none the less because it came from the hands of an assailant prepared to carry the system a step further under the cynical plea of "educating his party."

Is it, in the last place, at all clear that Peel's talents and statesmanship did not in the long run cause at least as much injury as benefit to his country? His triumphant opposition meant, in effect, the weakening of Government at a time when the nation required that the Government should be strong. It meant, also, the deliberate maiming of reforms which, if not properly carried out, lost half their benefit. O'Connell, it is almost certain, might have been conciliated. It is more than probable that if, between 1829 and 1840, the spirit of Catholic emancipation had animated English administration in Ireland the cry for repeal would not have arisen, and a large body of Irish Catholics would have become thoroughly loyal to the constitution. If we ask why it was that English dealings with Ireland continued to be a "system of alternate kicks and kindness," the answer is to be found in the policy of the Opposition. In plain truth, Peel ought to have been the great Liberal statesman of the day. Fate made him a Conservative party leader. His doom was a sad one. He delayed through life the very measures which it is his glory to have passed, and gained his greatest parliamentary triumph at the cost of depriving the emancipation of the Catholics of half the benefits which ought to have resulted to the nation from the greatest modern act of religious toleration.

THE NOVELS OF MR. HOWELLS.*

IT is perhaps indicative of the radical defect in the romances of Mr. Howells that his latest book should have been so generally greeted as his most serious and "important." One cannot help feeling that if his literary purpose had had any marked ampleness hitherto, an examination of the doctrines of Spiritualism, as illustrated in the life and expounded by the lips of a sincere fanatic, would not have been taken as a token of his abandonment of trifles for the larger and more dignified realms of romance. This, at all events, has heretofore been true of his literary purpose; the charm of his novels exists independently of a certain slenderness which one perceives in the pith of them. We think of no works of the kind, the aroma of which is so abiding, whose substance perishes so quickly from the memory as 'Their Wedding Journey,' 'A Chance Acquaintance,' 'A Foregone Conclusion,' 'Private Theatricals,' and 'The Lady of the Aroostook.' They leave the impression of "studies," although in the ordinary sense they are not "studies" at all. There is nothing ragged and incomplete about their form, which indeed is something very near perfect in respect of construction; nothing merely suggestive or half thought-out in their ideas and characters, and no lack of events and decorously dramatic situations of sufficient vividness to ensure remembrance, so far as it depends upon their agency. But they have the effect of "studies" because of the way in which one character or a single phase of life is accentuated by the complete subordination in interest of its accessories, which are nevertheless as carefully finished as they could be if they contributed positively, instead of out of self-effacement, to the importance of the central figure or the main element. In 'A Chance Acquaintance' it is Mr. Arbuton; in 'A Foregone Conclusion,' the priest; in 'Private Theatricals,' Mrs. Farrell; in 'The Lady of the Aroostook,' the picture of the South Bradfield milieu—and very nearly only these—that the titles of the respective stories recall. These are, all of them, examples of admirable portraiture. Two of them, Don Ippolito and Mrs. Farrell, are fine—as good as anything of their kind in American, and indeed one might almost add contemporary, fiction. They belong to the order of literary creations justly to be called types—in itself a rare distinction—and though they may not be wholly novel they are thoroughly human and real. The fervor and the weakness, the nobility and cowardice, the breadth at once and the narrowness of the former are depicted with a delicacy incisive enough to be called power. In the spectacle of an Italian priest, pure but not ascetic, reverently sceptical, with a mind wholly whimsical and a soul of corresponding intensity, overwhelmed by an unpriestly but wholly natural love for an attractive young American girl, we have certainly great potentialities both of character and situation; and Mr. Howells makes a great deal of them. The conception of a woman who laments grievously her inability to lament her innate insincerity, always seems an inspiration, however old it may be, if it is well expressed; and Mrs. Farrell is, in this respect, almost well enough portrayed to rank with Beatrix Esmond.

* 'The Undiscovered Country. By W. D. Howells.' Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.

But even in these, and in spite of their monopoly of interest, one feels the absence of something—a lack of the quality which, ever since the modern depreciation of Scott set in, has been a good deal underestimated, but which is indispensable in the equipment of the novelist of the highest order—a lack of romantic imagination. Realism can never successfully substitute photographic detail for this short-cut to truth, and the greatest realists do not attempt it. Mr. Howells's realism is, however, a definitely held creed; and though it is very likely a delightful personal trait which leads a novelist modestly to distrust his imagination, to regard constantly the limit beyond which the romantic becomes melodrama, and to have a kind of nervous dread of exaggeration, nevertheless, if he is unable to avoid theatricality instinctively, nothing is clearer than that his conscious effort to avoid it fetters his natural force. What romantic force Mr. Howells may naturally possess is indeterminable, but it is at least certain that he has effectually curbed it, and that even his two most vivid characters are circumscribed by a treatment which seems to disclose an apologetic anxiety in their author lest they be taken for monstrosities. At the end of 'Private Theatricals,' for example, he finds himself encumbered with Mrs. Farrell. What he should have done with her we don't pretend to say; but it is plain that he made an actress of her because he shrank from the tragic dénouement demanded by her character and career, and excused his expedient on the ground of her inbred "histrionism." Considering the title of the book, one is almost justified in calling this conceit whimsical, rather than fanciful; but what we wish to point out is that the intellectual fastidiousness which it illustrates is both too extreme in itself and connected with too unromantic a theory to deal adequately with the large and important elements of fiction. Mr. Howells's theory is apparently that this is an "every-day world," full of picturesque and, if you like, tragic material; but that, however grave the tragedy, it is after all and in the main an "every-day world." Indeed, after reading one of his stories in which a tragic episode of any sort occurs, one sometimes feels as if he had been tricked by the old device of representing everything marvellous as having taken place in a dream of the narrator; only, with Mr. Howells, it is the romantic instead of the marvellous that is thus treated, and we need not point out that it is the reality of its romance that is the life of the novel, and its service in illustrating the truth that reality is in one way or other romantic—or, in other words, that this is not really an "every-day world"—the most considerable that it performs.

The truth is, we suspect, that the conditions to which all contemporary men of letters in America subscribe have had their effect upon Mr. Howells. Superficially it is singular, but it is at least the fact, that young as our literature is, the best work that is now done in novel-writing is done by writers of a general literary culture rather than an exclusive devotion to, or perhaps even a special aptitude for, the writing of fiction. Whether the development of the critical faculty is necessarily hostile to the development of the imagination we need not enquire, in order to recognize the general rule that literary versatility rarely marks the highest excellence in any one department of literature. A writer who, like Mr. Howells, can produce good verses, good criticism, good descriptive and contemplative essays, good editing, good stories light and grave, is hardly likely, cæteris paribus, to beat the "born novelist" at his own business; and there is little doubt that the classification of literary labor in older countries has a good deal to do with the development in each department. Mr. Blackmore, for example, has nothing like the eminence in his country that Mr. Howells justly enjoys with us, but Mr. Howells has never written anything equal to 'Lorna Doone.' He avoids all the faults of 'Lorna Doone'; its melodrama would jar on his sensibilities rudely; before reading 'The Undiscovered Country' we should have said its loitering would tire his patience; but such a picture of life he does not give us. He makes "studies," as we say, and then dresses them up charmingly with an attentiveness to form that successfully suggests cunning machinery. But nearly everything beside the motif of the study is "machinery." The two men in 'Private Theatricals'; everybody in 'The Lady of the Aroostook,' except the "Lady"; the hero, Ferris, in 'A Foregone Conclusion," are all machinery. They are diligently observed, carefully portrayed, and eminently lifelike, but they are not very much alive; somehow they do not move us profoundly, and we have a suspicion that they have never deeply agitated the susceptibility of their author. If we add that we find the same defect in Mr. Howells's women we shall be guilty of a great temerity, but we confess that, taking them in the mass, they do not seem to us the important creations they are almost universally assumed to be. It is impossible to make any à priori objection to them; they are admirably characterized and allowed to discover themselves to the reader without any interpreter's work on the author's part; they are greatly superior, it seems to us, to the run of Mr. William Black's women, to whom they are often compared; and, in fine, they have a fresh and natural air and unconscious carriage about them that are very charming. But it is impossible to rid one's self of the notion that they are clinically studied, as it were. Their portrayal leaves the impression of a number of little essays, surprisingly "'cute," in which all their accidents which illustrate character are elaborated or hinted at with extraordinary tact, their foibles betrayed with a not uncharitable and most edifying malice, and their lovableness or sterling worth, or both, as the case may be, generously set forth. The character of Lydia Blood is an admirable essay on the Yankee "schoolmarm," the result clearly of close and candid observation; that of Florida Vervain is another on the sweet-tempered but peppery maiden who is weakest when seemingly most strong, and vice versa; that of Mrs. Vervain a fragment on the colorless, peevish woman; and so on. In each case, instead of making acquaintance with his women, one is admiringly occupied with Mr. Howells's acuteness in informing himself so completely about the different varieties of the sex; it is not unlike looking at a painting and, instead of contemplating it, wondering how the painter could have made it so like nature. The deduction is not that he has given us a quid pro quo for nature, but that he is a little—or a good deal—in advance of our own acquaintance with her. One cannot help feeling that Mr. Howells knows too much about women's peculiarities to create really satisfactory women.

It is well to be a little jealous of what is called "the sphere" of the novel, and to recognize the fact that there are novels and narratives just as distinctively as there are good and bad novels. Both from their lack of substance and their lack of romantic imaginativeness, Mr. Howells's books are almost of a hybrid character despite their sufficient form. But whatever they are it is more certain than anything else about them that they are delightful reading. The very qualities which injure them as novels are delightful. We have whole libraries of romance, but the peculiar charms of an unromantic bleakness, of a spiritual tenuity, of a thin gilding of the picturesqueness of commonplace, have hitherto gone uncelebrated. We know the sustenance of meat and the stimulant of wine in the provender of fiction, but the tea which Mr. Howells dispenses is of a delicious fragrance and refreshing to jaded palates. Why should there not be the romans, de société if they are executed with so much intellectual fastidiousness and so much refined humor and art? Such a remark as "You don't know how my heart leaps with delight every time that young woman don't play on the piano" (or words to that effect) would atone for a more flimsy comedy than 'A Counterfeit Presentment'; a sentence like "His face had that distinctly fresh-shaven effect which once a week is the advantage of shaving no oftener" will reconcile any reader to the dulness of 'The Lady of the Aroostook'; and if it contained more such characterizations as "She sat absently feeling on the porcelain-toned piano in the hotel parlor for the music of the past" we should have a correspondingly higher regard for 'The Undiscovered Country.' They are all death to romance, but they all and their like show how charmingly inadequate Eastern "culture" has proved itself to subdue the natural and unmistakably trans-Alleghanian humor of their author, however evident its effect in modifying its expression. We cannot better express what we mean than by saying that, everything considered, and slight as it is, 'A Parlor Car' seems to us Mr. Howells's best and most characteristic performance.

So far as his latest book is a departure, therefore, we regret it, and trust that Mr. Howells will ascribe the indiscriminate applause it has evoked to what we believe to be its real origin—the failure of his admirers to appreciate his subtler merits, and a readiness, arising out of a consciousness that he is admirable, to accept with heartiness anything of palpable qualities. He has always had too few admirers, and on just grounds he can never have too many. But those who read him with the sincerest pleasure will, we are convinced, lament the misconception of his real strength implied in the abandonment of a field in which he has been so successful for more serious and "important" works. In 'The Undiscovered Country' the love-story is of the slightest possible texture, and no character is firmly accented except a Spiritualist and some Shakers. Both these have possibilities, and Mr. Howells has taken too much pains to fail to illustrate them; and both have the local color of America. Their possibilities are not great, however, and their local color is of itself, of course, nothing in their favor. The last chapters only rise into anything like a quick interest: one episode—the interview between Ford and Elihu—is remarkably well done, but how far it shines by the light of contrast it would be difficult to tell. The tramp incident is wholly possible, one reflects, but in reading it it seems wholly artificial. The literary execution is, it need not be said, excellent in the main, but even the grace of Mr. Howells's diction is unequal to its task, which is, in brief, to endue with human and contemporary interest the abstract doctrines of Spiritualism and their effect upon a strong and sincere but visionary devotee. This we take to be hopeless, and its inevitable failure here obscures the one masterly feature of the book—the character of Dr. Boynton, which, if it were acted upon by forces capable of exciting even an intellectual sympathy, might have ranked among Mr. Howells's few typical creations. As it is, the merits of the book remind us of Johnson's remark about women's preaching: "It is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not well done, but you are surprised to find it done at all."

The London Graphic says, in its issue of April 10, 1880: "We know of no English magazine which can in any way compete with Scribner's Monthly in the matter of illustrations."

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 22, 1880.

The Week.

THE Indiana campaign has been opened by Mr. Albert G. Porter, lately First Comptroller of the Treasury, and now the Republican candidate for Governor. Mr. Porter's speech at Indianapolis was carefully prepared, and he probably means to make it last through the canvass. It is divisible into three portions: the glorious record of the Republican party and the shameful record of their opponents; the plans of the Solid South on coming into power; the humble origin of General Garfield and the aristocratic career of General Hancock, who "was, perhaps, following the mazes of the dance" while "that widow's son was industriously at work in the carpenter's shop, on the tow-path, and at the farm" to earn a living for himself and his mother. In praising the party for having brought greenbacks to a par with gold, the ex-Treasury official made no mention whatever of the silver dollar as forming any part of the currency or giving any cause for anxiety; concerning revenue reform and civil-service reform he was equally silent. Some of his statements showed that he is in possession of quite special information. Speaking of his own canvass he said: "This is not a race of candidates: it is a race of the people for the people's best interests"; and further on: "I ask of the people—the Republican party—that they will give me such help in this canvass as they can so effectively render." He explained the long delay at Chicago by the difficulty of choosing between such excellent candidates as Grant, Sherman, and Blaine, whose qualities are happily all combined in General Garfield; and the quick work at Cincinnati by the Democratic poverty of choice. Finally, he exposed in a masterly manner the grand Southern conspiracy to increase the Supreme Court to twenty-one judges, to declare the Constitutional amendments void, to pension the Confederate soldiers, to compensate the slaveholders, and to gain twelve new Senators by dividing Texas into five States and admitting Utah and the Indian Territory.

Those of Mr. Porter's hearers who also listened to Mr. Schurz in the same city on Tuesday evening have received a valuable lesson in political oratory. The talk of a self-styled "man of the people," who simply means by this boast that he is a member of the Republican party, was naturally received with boisterous cheers. It was unnecessary for Mr. Schurz to deprecate such demonstrations on the part of his audience, not only because silence was the highest compliment they could pay to the method of his appeal, but because his rhetoric was not even remotely addressed to their passions or their feelings. The question of the coming election he stated in this way: Have we had reasonably good government during the present administration of the Republican party? If so, can we expect a change for the better if the Democrats get back into power? With his usual moderation he argued that the answer to the first question must be in the affirmative; and he derived a negative answer for the second from a soldier's incapacity for civil affairs, from the heterogeneous composition of the Democratic party, the peculiar temper of its Southern portion, its universal greed for office, the ascendency in it of dangerous and dishonorable financial doctrines, and its utter indifference to civil-service reform—its necessary indifference, for, said Mr. Schurz, if General Hancock should announce his intention to abandon the spoils doctrine and could be believed, "it is not unlikely that the [Democratic] hosts would disband at once." He then showed what Mr. Hayes's administration has done towards improving the civil service by making fit appointments and few removals except for just cause, ensuring promotions, and weeding out the knavish and incompetent. Against the remarkable fidelity and freedom from loss with which the public business is now conducted, he held up the result of a general change among the Federal employees even before corruption should set in, and drew for tax-payers a powerful picture of the costliness of the experiment. He traced the growth of sounder principles of finance and civil-service reform among the Republicans, and concluded that their success was demanded by the best interests of the Republic, whereas to vote the Democratic ticket would be "to take a gambling chance." He adroitly praised Mr. Garfield not according to his "last utterance" but his past record, to which, Mr. Schurz said, "he need only be true in order to become a wise, safe, and successful President."

The dissenting opinions of the Indiana judges in the Constitutional Amendments Case make the reasoning of the majority seem rather weak. Judges Niblack and Scott take the ground that, as a general rule, when a question is left to the determination of an indefinite body of voters, it is immaterial how many votes are cast, and that the court had no right to go beyond the actual returns of the election to ascertain whether the amendments received the votes of a majority of all the qualified electors. Judge Niblack admits that if the amendments had been submitted at a general election, and if the returns of the general election had shown affirmatively that a majority of those voting had not voted for ratification, there would then be good authority for holding that the amendments could not have been adopted. But in this case the amendment in question was submitted "at what was to it a special election." "True, it was submitted on the first Monday in April, the day of our township elections, and the machinery, so to speak, of those elections was used in obtaining a vote upon it. But a separate ballot was required and used in voting both for and against it, and separate and distinct returns were required and made as to the vote upon it to the Secretary of State." This is the point where the difference arises between the majority and minority. The majority think that, inasmuch as the township elections showed a vote so large that the number of votes cast in favor of the amendments was not a majority of it, the court was bound to take judicial notice of the fact, and to decide that there was nothing to show an adoption by the people. The minority, on the other hand, think that the court has no business to go outside of the vote on the amendments itself for information as to what the full number of qualified voters is, and that they should confine themselves to the consideration of the votes cast for and against the amendments. This is, of course, in accordance with the general current of authority on the subject, which, however, the majority thought was controlled by the language of the Indiana constitution and statutes. We may add that the opinions are rather technical, and the rapidity and unanimity with which several of our contemporaries reached the conclusion that the majority opinion was part of a Democratic scheme to "fix Indiana," deserves special commendation as an exhibition of professional enterprise, particularly as they had not at the time had the advantage of reading the minority opinions.

The party press has been creditably free in its strictures on Mr. Garfield's letter of acceptance, and it is easy to discern in the praises of the more obsequious journals a constraint which betrays the general disappointment. The letter has, in fact, met with a very flat reception. Nobody felt any pride in the Chicago platform, or supposed that it would hamper the candidate if he was disposed to improve on it. Even to discuss its shortcomings would have been to lend it too great significance. Mr. Garfield's letter is an amplification of the platform without improvement, but unfortunately it cannot be explained away in the same manner. In this dilemma it looks as if the party would have to "take to the woods." The Independents are asking themselves the question whether, if General Garfield had been, like Sherman and Blaine, an avowed competitor for the nomination and had published his letter as a bid, they would not have excluded him also from the list of tolerable candidates.

One circumstance which ought to have affected his letter was wholly lost on Mr. Garfield. With his mind intent altogether on healing the breaches in his own party, he overlooked the fact that, if elected, he will have to govern with a Congress Democratic in both branches. This was equivalent to a dispensation from party narrowness, and permitted him to go to the very extreme of independence and frankness in stating his views of the true national policy in regard to each of the controverted topics of the day. At some points he would have approached the Democratic majority, in many he would have been not farther from them than from his Republican colleagues, in all he would have extorted the respect of both parties. Considered as the substance of the writer's possible first message to Congress, its inappropriateness and feebleness are apparent at once. It neither invites co-operation in a patriotic spirit nor promises a firm resistance in accordance with well-defined principles. The unworthy phrases in which Mr. Garfield's ideas are concealed, or his old professions recanted, betray a want of backbone of which Mr. Hayes's letter gave no sign, and which must greatly embolden a hostile legislature.

It may be doubted whether there is any propriety in a candidate for Vice-President making an elaborate confession of faith by way of acknowledging the compliment of his nomination. In the first place, it is apt to be no compliment; and in the next, as the office has no political weight or influence whatever, except in case of the President's demise, the latter might well be left to speak for "the firm." The custom, nevertheless, had its advantage for General Arthur, who was looked upon, if not exactly as the wicked partner, at least as the poor relation. He has availed himself of it effectively, and must be surprised to find his character rising by simple contrast with his chief. Only two points in his letter, which is nearly as long as Mr. Garfield's, require mention. "Our paper currency," he says, with a directness certainly not imitated, "is now as good as gold, and silver is performing its legitimate function for the purpose of change. The principles which should govern the relations of these elements of the currency are simple and clear. There must be no deteriorated coin, no depreciated paper; and every dollar, whether of metal or paper, should stand the test of the world's fixed standard." This has a very different ring from talk about a happy equality. General Arthur distinctly gives the civil-service plank his approval, and says he believes in tests of fitness for office, though the "particular measure" of examinations seems to him inadequate. "The rules which should be applied to the management of the public service may properly conform in the main to such as regulate the conduct of successful private business. . . . The tenure of office should be stable." He has, he says gravely, always acted on these principles. Following Mr. Garfield, he defends the right of office-holders to be political "workers," but probably does not mean to cover the case of such as work against the Republican party; just as, as the World points out, Mr. Garfield does not mean by his doctrine about taking advice of Congressmen in regard to local Federal appointments, that he would consult Mr. Lamar before filling a Mississippi vacancy. The straightforwardness of General Arthur's letter is its great merit.

In addition to his other sins, General Hancock is charged with having a son who made a clandestine marriage with a young lady whose father is a rebel sympathizer, and who, after the marriage, set his son-in-law up in business on a Mississippi plantation. "Here young Russell has been in sympathy with the rebels of the South. He joined the Mississippi bull-dozers, and at the last election was as much in favor of obstructing the freedmen's vote as the rankest rebel. On this point the views of the father and son harmonize." The Baltimore American's exposure of General Hancock's disloyalty at the time of McClellan's removal from the command of the Army of the Potomac is corroborated by the Buffalo Express, which is able to "furnish some information" on this point, to the effect that "a gentleman residing in this city" (Buffalo) remembers, and "probably can never forget, the intense excitement and dissatisfaction that prevailed among McClellan's friends and admirers." General Hancock "used the most violent language," and "said that the people ought 'to hold indignation meetings in every town and hamlet, and pass resolutions,'" etc. All this must have been under great excitement, because, according to a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, the General is of a very phlegmatic turn. He "does nothing but eat, drink, and enjoy himself sensually," "never reads books," and, "if he were not a major-general," would probably be "a country landlord who sits around and lets his wife do the cooking, while his son attends to the bar."

General Hancock's traitorous disposition and willingness to conciliate rebels are further illustrated by his hauling down the American flag in order to make a dinner more pleasant for General Beauregard. But to this we have already alluded. A verbatim copy of Beauregard's note was sent to "a gentleman in Toledo" from "a friend in Vicksburg," who luckily happened to be living in New Orleans at the time. In the year 1866 or 1867 General Hancock met General Grant "on the street," when General Grant accosted him in a friendly way, saying "Good morning, General Hancock." To this General Hancock made no reply, but merely touched his hat and passed on. Some time subsequently they met at a wedding-party, when General Hancock turned his back on General Grant. With regard to the charge that in 1877 General Hancock notified some one that in the event of Mr. Tilden's taking the oath of office he should recognize him, the Chicago Evening Journal points out that "it is quite immaterial to whom the letter was addressed," and that it would have been quite as bad" to have sent such a notification "to a brother major-general, to a brigadier, or to any other officer." It seems to us it would have been just as bad if it had been communicated orally to a corporal of the guard. It should not be forgotten, however, that the period referred to was an exceptional one, and that for several months we were only preserved from civil war by our universal disinclination to fight. The excitement of the period had a marked effect upon the imaginations of all but the strongest men, and it would not be fair to hold every one to a strict account of what he did and said then. General Hancock may have been inclined to take his resolution to support Tilden on learning that the Administration had determined to let General Stewart L. Woodford kidnap him with a swift gunboat. We should like, by the way, to have some accurate information from our contemporaries as to which side General Hancock favored during the war. Most of the facts in his career would seem to accord best with the supposition that he was a rebel Brigadier.

With the luck that has attended several of their investigations, the Democrats have so far got small comfort out of the Wallace Committee's enquiry into election frauds. Last week this committee resumed their sessions in this city, and have listened to the luminous testimony of Mr. George Bliss and Commissioner Davenport, with the net result, so far as we can make out, of freshening the public recollection of one of the most scandalous chapters in the history of the Democracy. The story of the naturalization frauds of 1868 is well enough known, but in twelve years its flagrancy has more or less lost distinctness; thanks to the present investigation, however, we shall not be surprised to find Mr. Davenport's exhaustive account doing good service on the Republican stump. His tabulated statement of the '68 naturalizations is very easily cut out and pasted in the hat, and a reading of it will only need to be enforced by insistence that the Democratic party "is everywhere and always the same." Davenport's conduct in 1878 was undoubtedly "arbitrary," and, if we have understood his various defences, he has himself generally maintained that it was necessary to fight the devil with fire, and has let the matter go at that. The vast disproportion between his arrests and imprisonment of men till after the close of the polls, and the convictions procured, is significant. But, as he remarked the other day, he has been waiting in vain "all these years" for somebody to sue him for false imprisonment. Transformed as the courts now are, it seems clear that this course would have been a wiser one for the Democrats to have taken, as it would certainly have been cheaper and more consistent.

There was nothing picturesque about the arrival of the obelisk on Tuesday, for it came like any other freight in a vessel's hold. This prosaic mode of transportation had at least the advantage of preventing any claim for salvage that did not cover the vessel also, as well as any claim for customs duty by reason of irregular entry upon a foreign coast. The safe arrival of the monument is a matter on which all concerned in its bringing over are to be heartily congratulated. Instead of a period of four to six months, as was at first anticipated, the transfer has occupied as nearly as possible eleven months; but no part of the delay was due to any failure of the machinery contrived for taking down and stowing the mass, and the whole operation reflects the highest credit upon Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe and his associate, Lieutenant Schroeder. A broken shaft, which was repaired in mid-ocean, was the only accident of the voyage. The setting-up of the obelisk will be the exact reverse of the lowering, and will be one of the summer sights for New-Yorkers, though it can hardly be as impressive as the overthrow. The site is yet undetermined, though Central Park seems the only available place. But for the ugly Worth monument already there, the intersection of Broadway and Fifth Avenue would have offered perhaps the nearest approach to the conditions under which the Paris obelisk is visible.

It already appears clear from the testimony in the Stonington-Narragansett enquiry at New London that little or no advantage was really taken of the few moments that elapsed between the vessels' sighting each other and the collision. There was plenty of signalling, but it was either so confused or so misunderstood as to be of no practical benefit. The captain of the Narragansett says that when he sighted the Stonington he sounded two short blasts in quick succession, put his helm to starboard, rang to "slow" and stop, and sounded two blasts three times, and then rang to back and gave three blasts—in short, did all that he could exactly as it should have been done. The Stonington commander affirms that at no time before the collision did he hear the signal that the Narragansett had stopped, and that the two whistles indicating her change of course were given only a minute before the vessels came together. Each account is corroborated by other testimony. For some minutes, however, the whistle of the Narragansett had been heard on the Stonington, and was interpreted as a general fog-alarm, the three blasts indicating her change of course undoubtedly being thus misunderstood. It is difficult to excuse this, for the pilot rules make the length of the blast distinguish between a general alarm and a specific signal—a difference which the captain of the Stonington appears clearly to have belittled or ignored. On the Narragansett the conduct of the officers, so far as yet appears from the testimony, afforded no ground for the general censure of the passengers, which latter is perhaps explainable by the great and unavoidable confusion. Both vessels were moving at nearly a "fair-weather" rate.

There was a further decline during the week in the rates for foreign exchange, and at the close gold could have been imported with but slight loss—less than one cent per pound sterling. The tendency of the foreign exchanges is to gold imports, and it is now likely that these will begin in the early future. With such a prospect all the domestic influences continue in favor of an increase of loanable funds, the surplus reserve of the New York banks having risen during the week to nearly $18,500,000. The condition of the crops in the Northwestern States improved during the week, and speculation at the Stock Exchange, from having been directed to lower, turned towards higher, prices. All classes of investments were in great demand, and United States four per cent. bonds advanced to 108¾. The Clearing-House exchanges and the reports of railroad traffic both indicate that the volume of mercantile business is very large, and the tone of the various trade markets is more settled and confident than for a long time. The present estimates are that the yield this year of food products of all kinds will be the largest in the history of the country, thus ensuring both an abundance of cheap food and of money.

The Compensation for Disturbance Bill still occupies the House of Commons to the exclusion of other matters, and has undergone several amendments at the hands of the Government itself. Its fate is more than doubtful. It is urged as an exceptional measure to tide over the present distress, and to save the necessity of a military occupation of Ireland if evictions are allowed to go on, with the humane disposition of individual landlords as the sole restraint upon them. But it is also declared to be a mere carrying out of the spirit of the Land Act of 1870, which recognized a right of property in the rent-paying tenant. In that case, the Economist contends, the act should be permanently modified in the sense of the present bill, for crop failures may certainly be expected to occur again. Moreover, it is feared that though the legal remedy is limited and temporary, the effect on the mind of the peasantry will be lasting, by weakening the sense of their obligation to pay rent at all. Doubtless to the relief of Dean Stanley as much as of any one, the House has declared its opinion that the proposed monument to the late Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey would be inconsistent with the national character of the edifice. The Dean has accordingly notified the trustees of the memorial fund, who must now go elsewhere for a site. The recall of Sir Bartle Frere has again been made the subject of enquiry in the House since the news of the refusal of the Cape Colony to be party to a conference looking to confederation of the South African colonies. This refusal dissipates the dream of the Jingo Government which furnished the only pretext for the Zulu and other native wars and the annexation of the Transvaal, and removes the last excuse for keeping Sir Bartle Frere at his post.

The collective note embodying the determinations of the Supplementary Berlin Conference was presented to Premier Tricoupis at Athens on or about the 17th of this month, and was, of course, readily accepted. To the Porte it "was to have been" presented about the same time, and there has been telegraphed all over Europe a great variety of speculations concerning the attitude of Turkey in response to it. That her answers will be evasive, as long as evasiveness is encouraged by a hope of serious dissensions among the great Powers, may be presumed with certainty, although voices in favor of gracious yielding to the inevitable are not wanting in the Sultan's councils. Both Mahmud Nedim Pasha, Minister of the Interior, and Abeddin Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, are reported to advocate a peaceful course. Osman Pasha, who counselled resistance, has been removed from the War Office, but he holds an office in the Palace, and his influence is still deemed great. Besides, many high trusts are now in the hands of Albanians, whose country is to be despoiled of districts for the aggrandizement of Montenegro and Greece, and the Sultan himself deems it his duty to yield only to actual force of arms. The question is, Will Abdul-Hamid's attempts to procrastinate and, if possible, to resist be secretly encouraged by one or another of the Powers? And, if not, will the European concert stop short of execution by combined force, if collective dictation and admonition fail of success?

Russia is evidently anxious to promote violent measures. Goschen and Tissot, the ambassadors of Great Britain and France, are said to be most outspoken in their representations to Abdul-Hamid concerning the perils to which defiant opposition to the decree of Europe would expose his empire and even his throne—M. Tissot reminding him of the fate of Khedive Ismail under similar circumstances. Italy, though somewhat piqued by late rebuffs while acting "in concert," is too much inclined to win the favor of Greece and Montenegro—the gainers by the Berlin decisions—to pursue a different policy. But the intentions of Austria are gravely suspected, her interests in the affairs of the Balkan Peninsula being generally believed to demand the preservation of a strong Ottoman Empire; and Germany, now so cordially allied to Austria in view of possible future conflicts with Russia, is supposed to be inclined to strengthen this bond by supporting her ally's interests wherever they clash with those of the great Slavic power. Bismarck, however, seems intentionally to play an apparently double game, giving orders, on the one hand, to fit out a naval contingent for a joint expedition to the Archipelago, and, on the other, lending the Porte German official wisdom—for financial reorganization—in the persons of some conspicuous Prussian functionaries. Meanwhile, the Albanians—no doubt secretly encouraged by officers of the Porte—continue to prepare for resisting any surrender of their territory; and, on the other hand, the Pan-Bulgarian agitation, north and south of the Balkan, is assuming threatening proportions, in the hope—which is probably also encouraged—that Russia will ultimately make an effort to revive the San Stefano treaty.

REPUBLICAN PROPAGANDISM AT THE SOUTH.

TO a number of influential Republican newspapers it has seemed a solemn duty for the party managers to embrace the South in their plan of campaign. To send speakers into States which could by no possibility be won over at this election from the Democracy would at least be an assertion of the national character of the party, and this cannot be thought a purely abstract consideration. But it would also stiffen and confirm the Republican sentiment already existing at the South, help maintain the organization, and perhaps save some Congressional districts. Wherever intimidation prevents the full polling of the party vote, the presence of delegated representatives of the main body would inspire courage, and give reality to the connection between the Northern and Southern wings, now only traceable in the comparatively small number of Federal appointments. The dread of encountering rudeness and violence would be no excuse for shirking the duty of discussing Republican doctrine on Southern soil. Every instance of interruption, in proportion to its grossness, would react at the North in favor of the party which, whatever its sins, has never resorted to mobs for silencing its opponents. The manly way, too, of curing Southern intolerance is not to denounce it at a distance, but to meet it and put it to shame; and happily there is a local trait which ensures the success of such an attempt—we mean the fondness for joint political debate on the stump. The so-called "Mississippi plan" was a bad example of a good custom, and if, as is reported, the Republican Executive Committee are preparing to canvass the South, we hope they will instruct their orators to invite controversy at all their meetings.

For the good of the country at large it makes very little difference whom the Committee select for the purpose. The canvass will be a touchstone for both parties. On the one hand, we can predict in all the centres of population a self-restraint that will relieve the Republican speaker of any fear for his personal safety. On the other, we may be sure that he will more or less consciously adapt his discourse to the place and circumstance, seeking for a common ground of agreement or honest difference, and carefully avoiding certain familiar modes of advocacy calculated for another latitude and the opposite side in the civil war. There would be something extremely edifying in the prudent utterances of a Blaine, a Boutwell, or a Logan, before an audience which would resent castigation of the Brigadiers, and would laugh at the terrors of a solid South. Still, we do not counsel any experiments likely to bring in question the sincerity of the canvass, and wisdom would dictate the sending of the best and discreetest heads the party can muster. They would not be missed at the North, because all eyes would be fixed on them in their Southern tour, and their speeches be reported by the Associated Press, and read with an interest entirely novel to this generation. If they succeeded in justifying their mission they would be making converts on both sides of the line. They would, from the necessities of the case, elaborate the best possible party platform, namely, the body of opinions and aspirations which can be vindicated in a hostile camp, and will therefore be divested of claptrap and demagogy.

Under the best auspices, it must be admitted, the task would be one of unusual difficulty, requiring extraordinary tact. The historical claims of the Republican party would have to be dismissed altogether, or treated with philosophic breadth in terms not borrowed from the preambles to convention platforms. Its title to existence must be derived not from what it has achieved but from what it means to achieve. Here begins the perplexity, which has been vastly increased by Mr. Garfield's letter; for the single important particular in which the party's and the candidate's declarations are precise and unequivocal is the Federal supervision of Federal elections. As we remarked last week, this is an altogether acceptable issue for the Democrats, and Republicans must, of course, face it at the South unhesitatingly; but if it constitutes their sole stock in trade their usefulness on the stump is certain to be very greatly curtailed. The principle may be never so sound, the fact remains that the supervision will be controlled by the party in power, and that the absence of supervision will be to its detriment. Practically, therefore, this feature of the Republican policy is as liable to the charge of selfishness as any, and strengthens the inference drawn from its ambiguous utterances on other topics that its chief concern is to retain possession of the Government. If Mr. Garfield had made a purely formal acknowledgment of his nomination, it would have been possible at the South, as at the North, to put aside the platform as a test of party purposes, or to have interpreted it in the light of his well-known position on the currency, the tariff, and on civil-service reform. It would have been fair to claim for the party the merit of its chosen leader, and hold him up as the exponent of a tendency superior to the calculated professions of a mass convention. But this resource has been taken away. The candidate, in endeavoring to identify himself with the platform, has translated it into something inferior to the original—more partisan and less patriotic, and, where it trimmed evenly, leaning to the baser side.

We shall not, therefore, be surprised if Mr. Jewell finds it impracticable to devise a line of argument for his Southern speakers. What, for example, could they say in behalf of civil-service reform? They must explain the party's reward of defiance of President Hayes's order by the elevation of Messrs. Cornell and Arthur; the speeches of Secretaries Evarts and Sherman at the Cooper Union last fall; the reporting of the Chicago platform without the civil-service reform plank, and its insertion on compulsion with a bad grace and after Mr. Flanagan's honest disclaimer; and Mr. Garfield's defence of the right of Congressmen to share in making appointments. They must do more: they must satisfy their hearers that the reform does not mean maintaining the status quo of the Federal appointments at the South, even if it does not mean the "clean sweep" called for by a correspondent on another page. On the currency and the tariff their remarks will be still more interesting and delicate. In Virginia, especially, they can profitably labor with their own brethren on the subject of honest money and the public credit. In short, the Republican propagandist at the South, be his views what they may and his sincerity what it may, will find his path beset with difficulties well-nigh insurmountable. If he begins with exposition he will halt in his exhortation; and if he begins by exhorting, he will be in danger of ending in a disastrous failure to make clear the grounds of his appeals. We cannot resist the belief that the present is a much less favorable occasion for a Southern canvass than Mr. Hayes's nomination afforded, and that every obstacle to it which existed at the close of the Chicago Convention has been aggravated by Mr. Garfield's letter. Nevertheless, we still hope that it may be undertaken, as it offers the first chance for genuine debate in twenty years—debate which cannot be had north of Mason and Dixon's line. We should not be opposed to it even if each party confined itself to proving the total depravity of the other. This would not be a very lofty contest, but it would be easier for both sides, though the intellectual exercise in dodging assaults would be mutually considerable. A good deal of humbug would perish in the encounter, and a good many illusions.

THE CIVIL-SERVICE ISSUE IN THE CANVASS.

A RESIDENT of Washington who was one of the earliest advocates of civil-service reform, with ample opportunity of studying the situation in Washington during the last three years, and having a personal acquaintance with the President and his Cabinet without the bias of official relationship, contributes some views and observations that help to explain the course pursued by the present Administration in regard to the civil service. The substance of our correspondent's observations are these:

When Mr. Hayes was nominated for the Presidency in 1876 he had studied the abuses of the civil service, he had seen its corrupting influences in Congress, and the corrupt purposes to which Congressmen apply it; he understood the changes necessary to effect reform, and he believed that a healthy sentiment within the party had defeated Conkling and Blaine in the Convention and was sufficiently powerful to effect a great change under a new administration. When Mr. Hayes came to Washington he still believed in all of this, and was sincerely desirous of making his mark in Presidential history by accomplishing two great results—the pacification of the South, and the reform of the civil service. His inaugural, which had been prepared before he reached Washington, reiterated all that he had promised in his letter of acceptance, and his selection of Mr. Schurz as a member of his Cabinet was for the purpose of having the foremost civil-service reformer of the party as an effective element in the new administration. But so soon as Mr. Hayes sent his nominations to the Senate an explosion of wrath was felt, and the same Senatorial intimidation which so successfully brought down General Grant in 1869 was tried upon the new reform President. The "Senatorial Group," or great machine managers of the Senate, cared little about Mr. Key, but they hated Mr. Schurz. Eight years before they had forced the "Man from Appomattox" to put a politician like Mr. Boutwell in the Treasury, and nothing seemed easier than to force Mr. Hayes into a similar surrender. From the humiliation of having his nominations rejected Mr. Hayes was saved by the indignation meeting in New York, and the Senatorial managers retreated but bided their time.

But, apart from this clog in the Senate, Mr. Hayes speedily found himself enveloped in a cloud of baffling influences. In the first place, he was not a reform President triumphantly elected on that issue, but, on the contrary, the reform issue had been thrown to the dogs by the great men of the party during the campaign, and he had been dragged into office at the last possible moment by the party tactics and discipline of such efficient workers as the two Chandlers. Furthermore, he found himself handicapped by debts of gratitude. He owed his nomination to the management of Mr. Sherman, and his office (many people thought) to the zealous advocacy of Mr. Evarts. Both of these gentlemen had the Presidential bee in their bonnets; neither had serious convictions about civil-service reform; each feared the party indignation about the Louisiana compromise, and the threats that were thrown out relative to the conference at Wormley's Hotel. It was their policy to conciliate the party, and in the absence of Sir Robert Walpole's pension-list and secret-service fund, they were for resorting to the usual American corruption fund of Government patronage and civil-service appointments. But, worse than all, a singular apathy had fallen upon the better portion of the party. The events which followed the election had made civil-service reform seem a much less important matter than it had previously appeared. The conduct of the Democrats in the House of Representatives, moreover, had proved that there was no element of reform in that party, and that the "spoils system" was never so greedily maintained and shamelessly operated; and for the party in possession of the executive branch of the Government to practise "hands off" while the party in possession of the legislative plundered right and left, was more than ordinary political nature could endure. Finally, when the President began his work and published his executive order, and sought to remove Arthur and Cornell, he found himself defeated in the Senate and derided in the Iowa Republican Convention. He found, moreover, that his mild, negative policy, philosophically right and thoroughly sincere, had made him a kind of Quaker general, whose conscientious scruples would neither allow him to plunder and devastate the enemy's camp nor allow him to hang the spies and emissaries sent in to stir up sedition in his own. In other words, the President could not use the civil service to break in pieces the New York Machine—i.e., to control primaries and carry conventions; but Mr. Conkling could use the whole Government patronage within the State to defeat or belittle the reform purposes of the President.

If Mr. Hayes had been a different kind of man; if he had been a natural reformer, bold and earnest; if he had been such a man as Mr. Tilden, shrewd, audacious, and unscrupulous, it is very evident that he could have made warm work for Mr. Conkling, and could have awakened among the better class of citizens the same spirited indignation which came to his support on the steps of the Custom-house in March, 1877. But Mr. Hayes is not a natural reformer nor an aggressive politician. He found his Cabinet, with one exception, against him. The Republican press were against him. Such papers as the Tribune, which had clamored for reform, turned and clamored against any reform which might help the Democrats. The reform element in the party seemed to think that, having forced the nomination of Mr. Hayes, it was his business to effect a good result. To Mr. Hayes himself it seemed as if he stood alone, as if the country was not yet ready for civil-service reform; and he shrank from being classed with the "traitor Presidents," Tyler and Johnson, and concluded that all he could accomplish was to secure a pure and decent administration of the Government in the public offices in Washington.

Whether this diagnosis of Mr. Hayes's case be, indeed, the true exposition of his change of policy, it is not our purpose to discuss. A man's motives are known generally only to himself, and it is not unlikely that when the diaries and autobiographies of his Cabinet and friends and advisers come to be published they will not agree as to what the reasons were which influenced the President, and indeed that they will offer the most diverse reasons and demonstrate the most opposite motives. But what has been stated concerning Mr. Hayes furnishes a tolerably clear exposition of the weakness of the Presidential office, of the influences which will surround any President, and of the impossibility of procuring positive, effective reform by simply "defeating a ring" at Chicago or "breaking a slate" at Cincinnati. What, then, is the position of that unorganized party known as the Independent voters? What chance of effecting some reform have those intelligent and conscientious persons who see that a debased civil service is the material of the modern political "machine," the corrupting element of our Government?

In the first place, it may be conceded that many persons who in 1876 deemed a pure civil service vital, now regard it as merely desirable. An administration so clean as Mr. Hayes's has made them forget the dangers which the Grant régime brought prominently into view. But, on the other hand, there is a larger body of voters who are examining the evil from another point of view, who do not, as they say, "take much stock in civil-service reform," but who are beginning to see clearly the dangerous and tyrannical power of the political "machine." The "Scratchers" of 1879 brought into being the revolt of 1880. The hopeless duty of scratching Cornell bore the unhoped-for result of dividing the New York delegation and defeating Grant. The growing disgust felt toward the machine will not only lead to fresh "bolts" and new breaches of discipline within the ranks, but will also add to the number of reflecting persons who, as they are emancipated from party shackles, become necessarily independent voters. Sooner or later these persons will see that the "machine" is merely one side of our present civil service, and that the purpose of party managers in having a bad civil service is to have a good "machine." If it were not so, such "practical politicians" as Mr. Conkling would care nothing whatever about the civil service. So soon as he found that the civil service had become a mere instrumentality of government, a thing to be managed on business principles exclusively for the benefit of the American people and not for the benefit of professional politicians, he would be quite willing to hand it over to the "doctrinaires," and deliver his "crushing speeches" on more "practical" subjects than appointments and confirmations. When people begin by hating this or that machine, they are in a fair way to end by detesting all political machines; and whoever is heartily opposed to machine politics is not very far from the conclusion that a debased civil service, be it national, State, or municipal, is the material, and the only material, out of which the American political machine is made.

In the second place, the Democrats have done their utmost during the last six years to demonstrate the fact that the defeat of the Republican party does not mean reform. A minority party ought to be, and ordinarily is, the party of reform; and if the Democratic leaders had been possessed of ordinary political sagacity and a decent portion of patriotic integrity, they would have made their party the party of reform, and would have insisted as strenuously as the Nation has ever done upon a pure, non-political civil service. If they had done so, and had coupled with their professions an illustration in the management of the Senate and House of Representatives, the great body of the Independent vote would have gone over to them, and the country would now be assured that a great and growing danger had substantially been stamped out. Instead of doing so, they maintained as stoutly as the worst of their following could desire the spoils doctrine, and showed, both by the wholesale indecency of their removals and the low character of their appointments, what the country must expect if the whole executive "patronage," as it is called, should pass into the hands of a Democratic administration. The humiliation of successive defeats has not given to the Democratic party a higher creed than its old maxim that to the victor belong the spoils. Success cannot be expected to do more for it. The new Administration, starting from a low plane, would bring into office an inexperienced, undisciplined throng of needy working politicians, strong in the belief that the public offices had been rightfully captured, and should be unscrupulously used to maintain their party in power. In a word, it is evident that while the Independent vote has dictated something to the Republican party—has defeated the nomination of Grant and Conkling and Blaine—it has made no impression whatever on the Democratic party.

This consideration seems to us decisive for all those who hold that the taking of the public offices out of politics is the main question now and as long as it remains unaccomplished; and who at the same time believe that a beginning has been made by the Republican party, and distrust its friendliness to civil-service reform when in opposition more than they despair of overcoming its lukewarmness and hostility while in power. The argument, we admit, does not serve when applied to the tariff or the currency, and it is sadly weakened by General Garfield's retrograde attitude on all these points. But it avoids what we may call the Providential view of political duty, which consists in standing aloof and leaving the issue of events to a higher power, and which is exemplified in the celebrated story of the backwoodsman, his wife, and the bear.

SORGHUM SUGAR.

A STRIKING feature of American agriculture is the enormous aggregate yield of most of the crops which are cultivated. It is not merely that we have an extensive country laid out upon the large scale, with great prairies, rivers, lakes, and railways, but that the country is inhabited by a singularly homogeneous people, subject to like influences and motives and having on the whole very much the same wants and aspirations. It may even be said, in one sense, that the kinds and amounts of crops gathered depend less upon soil and climate than upon the cheapness of land and the uniformity of the methods of cultivation. The number of bushels of Indian corn harvested, for example, or the number of hogs, even, that are fed with the corn, are well-nigh inconceivably large because almost every one has a hand in growing these "crops." Even broom-corn, from whose panicles common brooms and brushes are made, yields a crop in this country such as has never been thought of elsewhere. The plant is a native of the East Indies, and has long been cultivated there and in Italy, and brooms have been made from it time out of mind; but to-day the familiar corn-broom is almost as much an American article as if it had been here invented, and as if the plant were indigenous to our soil. Where multitudes of intelligent, and in some measure instructed, men are thus occupied with a kind of farming whose details are essentially the same over a wide extent of territory, the introduction of a new crop suited to the conditions and circumstances of the country, or of any new machine, method, or invention which helps to grow or harvest a crop, has very great importance. This truth has been made manifest repeatedly in the case of machines for reaping, mowing, and threshing, and of devices for the better management of milk, and is now receiving new illustration by a great movement in the cultivation of sorghum for sugar, which is rapidly becoming a matter of truly national significance.

Nearly thirty years ago the French consul at Shanghai sent home seeds of a sugar-producing sorghum which attracted much attention; for it was seen at once, and perhaps even more clearly then than it is now, that a Northern sugar-cane would be a great desideratum. It was not long before other varieties of the sweet sorghum were brought from Zululand to Europe, and both the Chinese and the African plants were soon introduced into this country, where their seeds were widely distributed. Hopes were entertained at that time by many people that the general cultivation of sorghum at the North would have an important influence upon the great question of the day—the relations of slavery to labor; and no little excitement attended the dissemination of the plants. These anticipations were not to be immediately realized. On the contrary, it soon appeared that, although the sorghum-plant yielded an abundance of sweet juice, there was some difficulty in the way of getting from this juice profitable quantities of solid, crystallized sugar. It was shown, indeed, long ago by the highest chemical authority that there is an abundance of cane-sugar in the sorghum-plant, particularly when it is thoroughly ripe, and it is now known that the failure to get crystallized sugar, though due in some part, perhaps, to the immaturity of the plants, must be chiefly attributed to improper methods of procedure in attempting to clarify the juice and to prepare the syrup for crystallization. It has finally been made clear that unless the juice is properly managed most of the cane-sugar contained in it easily changes to an uncrystallizable variety of sugar, so that nothing but molasses is obtained on evaporating the juice. The necessary operations are not difficult, but they require prompt action. The juice should not be left to itself after expression: a small quantity of lime must be added to it, to neutralize the slight natural acidity; and the defecated juice should be boiled down speedily to the consistence of syrup. As in the making of maple-sugar, very simple appliances yield good results.

After a few years of active effort, the conviction became general that there was no likelihood of the plant's competing with the sugar-cane of the South, and with this conclusion the general public lost its interest in the subject. But the cultivation of the plant was continued nevertheless, and became widely extended in the Southern and Western States. Many farmers continued to grow small quantities of sorghum for the sake of the syrup, which is readily obtained and which served to replace molasses for household use. During the war, sorghum molasses was of no little significance to the people of the Southern States. It will be remembered that General Sherman, in describing his March to the Sea, mentions the destruction of sorghum products as a noticeable means of distressing the enemy. At the West the African varieties of sorghum seem to have been preferred to the Chinese, because the plant itself is less liable to be broken down by the prairie winds, because it ripens earlier, and because its juice was thought to crystallize more readily. For a number of years samples of crystallized sugar have occasionally been prepared from sorghum syrup at the West, and a certain mild interest in the question of sugar-making has been manifested there all along, until, within the last year or two, the attention of the agricultural public has again been everywhere awakened, and the conviction has become general that the subject is really one of vast importance.

The period of comparative quiescence which succeeded the excitement of twenty years ago appears to have been of no little use both in perfecting the sorghum-plant and the processes by which sugar is prepared from it. It was fortunate, withal, that both the Chinese and the African plants were introduced into this country, since, by the crossing and hybridizing of varieties, new and better kinds of sorghum have been obtained, several of which are particularly well adapted for the Northern States. It is claimed for the several varieties that one or another of them will succeed wherever Indian corn can be grown, so that there is hardly a State in the Union from which the cultivation of the plant is necessarily excluded. It seems to be plain, at all events, that henceforth the corn-growing States are to be sugar-producing States also. Indeed, the general resemblance of sorghum to Indian corn will, perhaps more than any other single circumstance, ensure its successful growth in this country. The resemblance between the two plants is so close and the cultivation they require is so nearly similar that, from the farmer's point of view, sorghum is hardly to be looked upon as a new crop. It grows well on "corn land," even of the lighter and drier sorts, and has no marked needs or peculiarities to be studied and allowed for; and since every farmer in the land knows how to grow corn the transition to sorghum cannot fail of being easy. Our farmers have, moreover, in process of time, arrived at singularly cheap and effective methods of corn-growing which are almost absolutely applicable to the new crop.

Both the cheapness of its culture and, practically speaking, the familiarity of our farmers with the method of culture place sorghum upon a wholly different footing from the sugar-beet, a plant which has often been commended as worthy of cultivation in this country, and for the encouragement of which money bounties and grants have at one time and another been unwisely voted by the legislatures of several States. To say nothing of our climate, to which sorghum in its several varieties is now well suited, the beet-root is known to require rich ground, careful culture, and much labor. Another advantage to be credited to sorghum is the freedom of its juice from offensive impurities. Beet-juice is contaminated with some substance which renders the brown sugar obtained from it unfit to be eaten. In order that it may be palatable, beet-sugar has to be refined to brilliant whiteness, and the molasses obtained incidentally in the process of manufacturing beet-sugar is useless except for purposes of distillation. The better kinds of sorghum are free from this reproach. The juice of approved varieties has no disagreeable flavor, and both the brown sugar and the molasses obtained from it are palatable and fit for domestic use. Hence the crop is particularly adapted for our American conditions and well suited to the habits of our people. Any small farmer may make sugar from his sorghum crop as readily as the New-Englanders make sugar from maple sap, and the residual molasses will serve as well as maple syrup for family use. More than this, the sorghum-plant yields large quantities of seeds rich in starch, which are capital food for poultry, swine, and cattle, and the refuse stalks from which the saccharine juice has been expressed are excellent fodder, which can readily be saved for winter use. As with Indian corn, so with sorghum: one conspicuous merit of the crop is its adaptability. Both large farmers and small may cultivate it with profit, and it may be put to many different uses.

The question of sorghum sugar has recently been studied very satisfactorily by Professor Collier, of the Department of Agriculture at Washington. He finds that there is no difficulty in making from sorghum an abundance of sugar of first-rate quality, which will compare favorably with the best product from sugar-cane grown in the most favored localities. He confirms the fact that the percentage of crystallizable sugar in the juice is largest when the plant is dead-ripe—that is to say, when all parts of it have thoroughly matured. His plants maintained this condition of maximum sweetness very well when once it was attained, some of them for a period of two months, which gave him nearly twice the time that is commonly had in Louisiana to work up the cane. He finds also that the process of manufacture has been very satisfactorily improved and methodized of late years, and that former failures to get crystallized sugar from sorghum syrup are to be attributed for the most part not to the absence of such sugar from the plant, but to improper manipulation of the juice after expression. In a considerable number of trials, with different samples of sorghum from various localities, he obtained, as the average yield, more than a ton of sugar to the acre of land. In one instance he got three tons of sugar to the acre, and he has no doubt that from some of the Southern varieties two tons of sugar may be obtained practically. The significance of these results is well brought out by the statement of the Commissioner of Agriculture that there were imported into this country from abroad in the year 1878, 1,741,650,000 lbs. of sugar, to say nothing of molasses, while the yield of sugar from the tropical cane in the Gulf States amounted to only about 250,000,000 lbs. Our people are said to consume sugar at the rate of about forty pounds to each person every year; but for fifty million inhabitants this would amount to a couple of billions of pounds, which, at no higher price than five cents the pound, would come to a hundred millions of dollars per annum.

One interesting result of Professor Collier's researches is that the making of sugar from corn-stalks, as invented by the ancient Mexicans and practised by our ancestors during the War of the Revolution, has much more merit than had commonly been supposed. He finds that the methods now in use for obtaining sugar from sorghum are applicable to corn-stalks also. Somewhat unexpectedly, though the fact accords absolutely with what is known to be true of sorghum, the thoroughly-ripened stalks, from which hard, ripe ears of corn have been harvested, yield the most sugar; and there are doubtless many places where sugar may be profitably made from corn-stalks after the crop proper—the grain, namely—has been gathered. In general, however, sorghum is to be preferred to corn as a sugar-producing plant. Professor Collier has no hesitancy in predicting that within five years all the sugar needed for use in the United States will be produced by American farmers, and he deems it probable that within ten years we shall export more sugar than we have ever imported.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—I.

LONDON, Saturday, June 12, 1880.

ONE of the most curious features of Mr. Gladstone's mind is his intense dislike to London, London people, and London ways. The society, the clubs, the wealth, the luxury, and the frivolity of the capital offend his austere and puritanical tastes; but of all things relating to London that which he dislikes the most is the London press. He never misses an opportunity of contrasting it unfavorably with provincial journalism. The secret of this preference is easy of discovery. Mr. Gladstone is criticised by the newspapers of London: he is flattered by the newspapers of the Provinces; and it is one of Mr. Gladstone's most conspicuous weaknesses to hate criticism and to relish flattery. In this respect he resembles Garrick—"Who peppers the highest is surest to please." He prefers to be abused even in the most rancorous manner to being fairly and candidly estimated, if the fairness and candor involve any degree of qualification or of disparagement. Mr. Gladstone is always fond of referring to the superior knowledge of the provincial press as compared with its London contemporaries. The newspapers of the great manufacturing towns of Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham are regarded by him as the true exponents of political opinion. What they think, he is in the habit of averring, the nation thinks. The truth is that what Mr. Gladstone thinks provincial papers think. They take the word of command from his mouth and echo his opinions, and that which is merely a return of his own voice to him he takes as an independent utterance confirming his own judgment.

Mr. Gladstone resembles in one respect the provincial notoriety who finds that while he was all the world at home, he is only one of the world in London. His preference of the provincial newspapers is the preference of the social lion for the society in which he can dictate, over the society in which he has to recognize the equal claims of other men; and he seeks a refuge from contradiction and the mental independence of the London press in the obsequiousness of provincial journalism. In the speeches which he made in Mid-Lothian and in other parts of the country he referred to the support given him by the newspapers of the large towns outside London as an augury of the successful issue of the general election. He has since, on at least plausible ground, maintained that in this estimate of them he has been justified by the result. The metropolitan journals prophesied defeat; they were wrong. The provincial journals prophesied success; they were right. Therefore Mr. Gladstone's conclusion is that provincial journals understand and reflect public opinion, while the metropolitan mistake and mislead it. But Mr. Gladstone confines himself to the year 1880; he does not look back to the year 1874, when the provincial journals prophesied his victory at the polls, and he very soon found out they were completely wrong. The fact is that the great majority of the provincial papers are Liberal, and that, the wish being father to the thought, they always prophesy a Liberal victory. They are like a clock which is not wound up; the index-finger points steadily to one hour on the dial, and therefore within the course of the twenty-four hours which make up day and night it must be minutely and accurately right at least twice. But there are metropolitan journals and metropolitan journals. Some London newspapers, unlike the majority of their contemporaries either in town or country, were right both in 1874 and in 1880. In the former year they predicted Mr. Gladstone's defeat; they warned him months beforehand of the mistakes which he was committing. They told him what was already the feeling of the country, and earned his dislike and animosity by doing so. He did not take the warning. Encouraged by the chorus of approbation which came to him from his friends of the provincial press he went his own way, and the result was that he found himself in a minority and out of power. In 1880 the same journals confidently predicted, and did a good deal to prepare for, the Liberal success. But it is not enough for Mr. Gladstone that the metropolitan press should be right when he is right; it must also be wrong when he is wrong. To have foreseen things which he did not foresee, and to have warned him of perils to which he shut his eyes, is an offence which it takes some time for him to forgive. There is no doubt that Mr. Gladstone is justified in his dislike of many of the features of London journalism, and that is easily explicable. It is his fault rather than his misfortune to have made acquaintance only or chiefly with its least worthy members. During his former tenure of power his relations with the press of London were confined almost entirely to those members of it who condescended to hang about him for information, who ministered to his appetite for flattery, and who were content to hold, or at any rate to express, any opinion which he might dictate to them. Of course when he fell from power these summer friends deserted him, and were as malignant and unscrupulous in their vituperation as they had been in their flattery. It is by this experience, which reflects quite as much the infirmity of Mr. Gladstone's own character as the unworthiness of the London press, that he seems to judge metropolitan journalism, which he is always denouncing.

Unfortunately, to use a phrase of Goethe's, there are but few voices while there are many echoes, and the most ignoble and unworthy sounds are reverberated as noisily and incessantly as more noble and intelligent utterances. Everybody knows the fable of the ass and the lion's skin; but occasionally we have the more pitiable spectacle of the lion in the ass's skin. The king of the forests condescends occasionally to imitate the voice of the more ridiculous animal, and his unnatural bray is followed by a great many very natural "hee-haws." The provincial press and the second or third-rate members of the Liberal party have echoed Mr. Gladstone's attacks upon metropolitan journalism. Even Lord Hartington's common sense, which too often runs into something like commonplace, failed him so far upon a recent occasion as to lead him to the mere repetition of Mr. Gladstone's disparagements of the newspapers of London in comparison with their provincial contemporaries. This was at the dinner lately given in the Devonshire Club to Mr. John Morley. The candidate for Westminster has now become, as you are aware, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. Very lately in that capacity he proclaimed the doctrine which seems to be becoming an article of faith with his party—that the true indications of national opinion are to be looked for in the provincial newspapers. That being so, it is fair to ask why the Pall Mall Gazette should come out at all, or why, at any rate, Mr. John Morley should think it worth his while to edit it? It would be reasonable for him to retire in favor of the Manchester Guardian or the Birmingham Daily Post. A London evening journal ought surely to be something more than an organ of organs of provincial opinion.

The fact is that this vital difference of opinion between the London and provincial journals is little more than a fantasy of Mr. Gladstone's own mind. The men who conduct the one are, for the greater part, of the same training, character, and associations as those who conduct the other. The only difference is that with a few exceptions the editors of provincial newspapers are young men who have not yet won the highest success in their profession, or somewhat older men who have distinctly failed in it. In every career capacity and character gravitate towards London. Journalism is no exception to the rule. It holds good with regard to the professions in art and in literature. Provincial newspapers are edited by men who have either not yet succeeded in working their way to London, or who have failed in maintaining themselves there. Here and there, no doubt, an exception may be found. A man of real newspaper capacity may be tempted by offers too liberal to be resisted to undertake the editorship of a great provincial paper, but these instances are few. No one who can live in London will live, if he can help it, at Birmingham, or Leeds, or Manchester. The journalist established in one of these great towns somewhat resembles a colonial bishop in the frequency of his absence from his diocese. He comes to London as often as he can. He tries to get into the political clubs of his party. He cultivates relations with his local member, and through him with the subordinate officials, about whose places of business he hangs, and from whom he busily endeavors to extract information. In fact, so far from society in London offering a hindrance to the formation of sound opinions and the acquisition of accurate knowledge in politics, a provincial journalist who affects to look down upon it is always doing his utmost to force himself into it. The only difference between him and a conductor of a London newspaper is that the one gets by fits and starts, and in an imperfect manner, the opportunities of that general acquaintance with public affairs, and of that political information, which are constantly open to the other.

In subsequent letters I may, if you think the matter has any interest for your readers, review in more detail the characteristics of journalism in England, both in the country and in the provinces. B.

"A CLEAN SWEEP."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It seems to me that the Nation, in giving utterance to an expression of horror at the contemplation of a "clean sweep" as likely to follow General Hancock's election and inauguration (we have unfortunately learned that one of these events does not necessarily follow the other), has lost its usual admirable equipoise.

Certainly, in the South, men who feel most repugnance to politicians of the "loaves-and-fishes" school—and that school never found much favor here—would be grievously disappointed should an incoming Democratic President fail to make a "clean sweep" of the carpet-baggers and negroes who for the last twelve years have divided among them the Federal offices throughout this section. Even Mr. Hayes should have done it, and would perhaps have been glad to do it, only, as these men furnished the "returns" by which the Electoral Commission found it possible to declare him elected, he could not. Besides keeping them in place and rewarding the Returning Boards who did the fraudulent work, he had to provide for most of the "Visiting Statesmen" under whose auspices and with whose assistance it was done. And General Garfield being himself one of the "Statesmen," though not himself thus rewarded, presumably sympathizes with them, and will not probably, if President, remove either them or the others now holding and dishonoring Federal commissions in the South.

I venture to ask the question, and shall be glad to have it answered: Is the South wrong in desiring, so far as this section is concerned, a "clean sweep"? Let the Editor of the Nation put himself in the place of a Southern subscriber, and however little he may desire position for himself, I fancy he will say that the prospect of retaining the present incumbents of Federal office in the event of the success of General Garfield, and of their removal should General Hancock become President, is of itself enough to justify the South in being "solid" for the latter.—Very respectfully,

R. B. Hilton.

WHY INDEPENDENTS SHOULD NOT SUPPORT GARFIELD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Allow me to take issue with your reply to the Wilmington Every Evening in the Nation, No. 782. I think that the Democrats have a right to complain of the action of the so-called Independent Republicans. In 1876 these Republicans virtually pledged their support to the candidate best representing their views, as set forth in the appeal of the Fifth Avenue Conference. Did they keep that pledge? In 1880 the New York "Scratchers" reiterated the appeal of 1876, and immediately accepted Garfield as their ideal candidate, whose superior could not be nominated at Cincinnati.

The Independents are ostensibly free-traders. The Cincinnati platform demands a tariff for revenue only. They are opposed to "stalwartism." The Democratic candidate affords ample security for the honesty of that party's desire to allay sectional strife. Will the Independents yield him even a qualified endorsement?

But you say, or at least insinuate, if the Democratic candidate is a man of high character he is chosen from policy and not from principle. That is exactly what I would say of his opponent. The action of the Chicago Convention proves to my mind that nothing but the fear of defeat prevented the nomination of Grant or Blaine. And speaking of "the innate wickedness of the bulk" of the respective parties, let me give you a few samples of the delegates to the Chicago Convention: S. W. Dorsey, Powell Clayton, and O. A. Hadley, of Arkansas; Sayles J. Bowen, of Washington, D. C.; F. C. Humphreys, of Florida; John A. Logan, Emory Storrs, and Green B. Raum, of Illinois; H. C. Warmoth, W. P. Kellogg, John T. Ludeling, A. S. Badger, Jack Wharton, J. Henri Burch, and Don A. Pardee, of Louisiana; J. A. J. Creswell, of Maryland; G. S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts; Roscoe Conkling, C. A. Arthur, A. B. Cornell, Edwards Pierrepont, Thomas Murphy, G. H. Sharpe, of New York; W. E. Chandler, of New Hampshire; James McManes, J. D. Cameron, and John Cessna, of Pennsylvania; E. W. M. Mackey, R. B. Elliott, C. C. Bowen, and W. J. Whipper, of South Carolina; Webster Flanagan, of Texas. Perhaps you can lengthen the list, but as it is I think it represents more "innate wickedness" than the entire Convention at Cincinnati.

Allow me further to suggest that in your Crédit-Mobilier editorial you omit to mention that March 20, 1868, Mr. C. C. Washburn, of Wisconsin, exposed the true nature of the connection between the Crédit Mobilier and the Union Pacific Railroad, and that General Garfield was present and voted with the friends of the Crédit Mobilier to refer the subject in order to shut off debate. And in all the votes Garfield's name appears for, never against, the interests of that corporation. Compare this with Garfield's sworn testimony that he did not know the nature of the connection between the Crédit Mobilier and the Union Pacific until informed by Judge Black in the winter of 1869–70. Moreover, was not his conduct throughout that of a friend of the Crédit Mobilier?—Yours, etc., W. I. Chase.

WHY INDEPENDENTS SHOULD HESITATE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have looked to the Nation with confidence, for the last six years, for an able and candid discussion of political questions. But I fancy that I find a slight departure from its usual judicial tone in its treatment of the late National Conventions and their work, especially in the articles in the last issue entitled "Campaign Issues," and "Why Independents Side with the Republicans."

Four years ago a well-known writer in an article in the North American Review criticised the Independents for falling into line in so great haste, and the Nation assented to the justice of the criticism. Is it not possible that there is ground for the same criticism in this campaign? Has there not been too great hopefulness on the part of Independents in persuading themselves that reform is really progressing in the Republican party? Do they carefully bear in mind some of the striking events which immediately concern them and the principles which they cherish, which have occurred within four years? In 1876 the party in convention, by a large majority, signified its preference for a Presidential candidate by adhering through five ballots to such reformers as Blaine, Hartranft, Conkling, and Morton, and, as your Cincinnati correspondent pointed out at the time, finally nominated Mr. Hayes rather than Mr. Blaine by the merest accident. Even then a candidate succeeded whom the Fifth Avenue Conference had excluded in saying that it must be no one "who, however favorably judged by his nearest friends, is not publicly known to possess those qualities of mind and character which the stern task of reform requires."

It is true the Convention gave to reformers a tolerable platform, though neither the platform nor the candidate was the model which the Nation had suggested (No. 567); but from that time forward, as the Nation had frequent occasion to observe during that campaign, the party managers, including the candidate for Vice-President, gave notice that the platform was to be utterly ignored. It is true, too, that the candidate's letter of acceptance was generally satisfactory; but few real Independents can now think of that except with a sense of bitter humiliation, in the light of rewards to Visiting Statesmen, members of returning boards, and pot-house politicians; of general orders to office-holders, to be flagrantly violated by the tacit or express permission of the President, in every critical election that has occurred since. Sporadic instances of his carrying out the views expressed in his letter of acceptance have only served to bring into stronger relief his opportunities and his failures. His course has provoked the laughter of his enemies and the profound sorrow of his friends.

But has the tendency meantime been towards reform within the party? Have converts been made to the idea of the necessity of such reform? Have not many timid reformers been convinced that reform is visionary and impracticable? Let us apply a very simple test: Did Independents at Chicago make as good a showing in point of numbers or influence as at Cincinnati in 1876? Did politicians recognize as urgent a necessity for pacifying or conciliating them? A vast majority, nearly four-fifths of the Convention, sought with great persistency the very worst thing of which the Convention was capable—the nomination of one or the other of two candidates who, in the judgment of the Nation, about equally suggest the hopelessness of reform within the party. And it is self-evident that if Blaine, Conkling, Logan, and Cameron had been in harmony the reform element would have been in a ludicrous minority. The Committee on Resolutions emphatically rejected any allusion to civil-service reform in the platform, and the Convention only adopted a resolution after having deprived it of its virility, taking pains to neutralize even that resolution by its nomination for the Vice-Presidency. The candidate's letter of acceptance is the legitimate and logical sequel. In effect it is little less than a contemptuous assumption that Independents will fall into line, that they need not be conciliated, that it is not even necessary to beguile them with seductive promises, as it was in 1876. The letter shows, at least, the candidate's estimate of the progress of reform within the party. On the other hand, can it be fairly said that the Democratic Convention showed any disposition to do its worst? No man was even suggested as a candidate so offensive to the better sentiment of the country as the two leading candidates at Chicago—certainly not, if we make one exception. The choice of the Convention seemed to lie between Mr. Payne, who was suggested, in the correspondence of the Nation in 1876, as a candidate who would be acceptable to Republicans in the event of the nomination of Mr. Morton; Mr. Bayard, whose statesmanship, purity, and independence no one questions; and General Hancock. Of these Mr. Bayard would undoubtedly have had by far the strongest following if weight had not been given—undue weight, perhaps—to his "impediment," which the Nation has fully discussed (No. 766).

It will be said that the Convention would have preferred a worse nomination if it had dared to make it, but it may be said with greater certainty that the Chicago Convention would have nominated General Grant if it had not been convinced at the last moment that it would be suicidal. It will be said, too, that the Democratic candidate and platform, though fair enough to look upon, cover a vast amount of inherent wickedness and iniquity. But it is unprofitable to discuss the latent sinfulness of a party. And it is, perhaps, impolitic to keep a party in power whose most solemn promises are not "deliberate convictions resulting from a careful study of the spirit of our institutions and the best impulses of our people," but "the temporary devices of a party to attract votes and carry an election," in the fear that another party may prove equally insincere and faithless.

It is not strange, perhaps, that an Independent who has been educated in the Republican party and has usually voted with that party should "side with the Republicans" in this campaign. But is there not a state of affairs in which such an one may hesitate; may look upon the views of the Nation, as expressed in the articles to which I have referred, as savoring too much of optimism—of a dangerous hopefulness on the one hand, and an instinctive rather than a reasonable distrust on the other; may cast his lot with the Republicans, if at all, with the gravest misgivings; may even decide to vote for Hancock? He need not, perhaps, come to him as to a model candidate. He need not try to reconcile himself to the record of the party which nominated him. But he may say to himself that it is safer to invite a possible or a probable evil than to endorse a certain one. He may convince himself even that the party, the record of whose better days he holds precious, may do nobler service in the end if chastened by defeat than if again made insolent by victory.—Respectfully, F. W. L.

THE NEW-LONDON ACCIDENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your comment, in the issue of July 8, upon the death of Mr. Lincoln at New London I was sorry to notice what appears like an entire acquittal of the railroad management. I have been looking in vain for some public criticism of the manner in which that "observation train" was made up—viz., a long line of passenger cars, with a locomotive at each end. Such an arrangement has been universally condemned by all prudent managers for over thirty years past, owing to the inherent difficulty of securing perfect concert of action between the two machines when so separated. It was doubtless thought by those in charge on this occasion that the low rate of speed to be used and the efforts made to foresee and provide for all contingencies would cancel this risk. But the result has not justified their action. Educated mechanicians can readily cipher out the strains imposed upon the train by the want of perfectly synchronous movements on the part of the two massive engines, but that is not necessary. Hundreds of examples are on record showing how readily freight trains are broken apart by such arrangements, even at low speeds.

I hold these two points to be beyond all question or dispute: 1. It is not to be expected that two locomotives, when separated by several hundreds of feet, can be made to move back and forth, when impelled and controlled by two separate minds, as if they were one machine. The consequent probable lack of harmony in their movement when coupled to opposite ends of a train, and when taken in connection with the momentum due to their weight, produces strains upon the couplings that are practically irresistible within the limits of all ordinary coupling apparatus. Even if one engine only is allowed to use steam at the same time, as is said to have been the case at New London, the risk is not avoided, for the great weight and consequent inertia of a locomotive is an unmanageable element when placed at the end of a train farthest from the source of power. It acts like a slung-shot, and can hardly be controlled at the end of a long line as it might be close at hand.

2. When the public are invited to visit an exciting spectacle, like a boat-race, on a moving stage it is not reasonable, from what we know of the human mind, to expect each and every spectator, even though he be a railroad president, to keep in mind during every instant of the time the risk of the train's being jerked apart by breakage of the couplings, and to expect him so to fortify his position by grip upon railings, or by mental allowance for their omission if no such railings exist, as to render his position safe during such a shock as must needs occur when the train is forcibly and suddenly torn asunder.

It follows, then, that people should not be invited to expose themselves as these two unfortunate persons were exposed. I know the American habit is to expect every man to look out for himself, and that people often resent a caution proffered by a railroad brakeman as an interference with the rights of an American citizen. Yet, even considering this "etiquette" on the part of the brakeman, that official would doubtless have cautioned Mr. Lincoln and Mrs. Appleton if he had expected or even thought it probable that the train would be subjected to such a shock. The error was an error in judgment in so arranging the train that the shock came as a natural consequence of that arrangement. I am not inclined to depreciate the amount of care and attention devoted to the safety of that train by the men in charge, and I am aware that errors in judgment are disagreeable errors to criticise, but this is a case where the situation involved too great and too unavoidable risks to be allowed to pass unnoticed or unweighed by a public lacking such light as I have endeavored to throw upon it. Notes.

THE next volume of the "Leisure-Hour Series" will be 'Troublesome Daughters,' by Mrs. Walford, author of 'Mr. Smith' and 'Cousins.' ——A campaign 'Life of General Garfield' will be written by Major J. M. Bundy, of the Evening Mail, and published by A. S. Barnes & Co. It will contain three portraits of him.——Harper & Bros. have in press a 'History of the Colored Race in America from 1822 to 1880,' by the Hon. George W. Williams, of Ohio—a work whose title raises lively expectations. ——Mr. Charles T. Congdon's 'Reminiscences of a Journalist,' which have been appearing in the Tribune, will be published next fall as a book by J. R. Osgood & Co.——A. Williams & Co., Boston, have issued an Albert-type fac-simile (reduced, but within the bounds of legibility for the figured references) of Wm. Price's engraving of Boston, dedicated to Peter Faneuil in honor of his recent gift to the city of the hall which bears his name. The hall was built in 1742, but there is evidence in the text that Price's plate was first executed some time after 1723 and then retouched, and this has been confirmed in other ways. The print embraces Roxbury and Cambridge at either extreme. It offers an interesting comparison with Paul Revere's much less painstaking and comprehensive print of 1768, representing the landing of British troops at Long Wharf, the point of view being almost the same. Already, for instance, Faneuil Hall had been burnt down (1761) and rebuilt, the spire being exchanged for a cupola.——By an unfortunate printer's-error last week the late Library Journal was referred to in these columns as the "Literary" Journal.——The July-August number of the Revue Historique has a timely article, by M. A. Gazier, on the "Expulsion of the Jesuits under Louis XV." Its bulletin of current historical productions in various countries includes a summary review for the United States during the past year by Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. It is gratifying to find so considerable an exhibit, whether as regards quantity or quality. The Revue notices the recent appearance of vol. i. of M. Paul Viollet's translation of Ad. Schmidt's "Paris during the French Revolution," a work of great value based on the secret police reports. The translation is most legitimate, and restores the original French texts wherever cited.——Students of mediæval literature know the important part played in its sources by the pseudo-Gospels of the childhood of Christ and the Virgin Mary. This subject has been thoroughly treated in a recent monograph by Dr. Robert Reinsch (Halle: Niemeyer. 1879. Pp. 138). The author first examines the authors, contents, and date of the Greek and Latin pseudo-Gospels of the Infancy, and then the use made of them in the literature of the North and South of Europe. This second part is arranged according to countries, and in the section devoted to France copious extracts from the MSS. are given. The author has with great industry brought together in one work the entire literature of the subject.

—"An Englishwoman in the New England Hill Country" is the sufficiently descriptive title of a paper in the August Atlantic which is really worthy the abused epithet "suggestive." Its suggestiveness, in fact, is perhaps its main merit, for though the instructed reader will not find many causes for disagreement, he will certainly find some, and it is apparent that the writer's observations have been made through English spectacles. This, however, considering her experience and acuteness, is an advantage. Though possibly a little "thin," Mr. John Burroughs's "Pepacton: A Summer Voyage" is delightful, and Mr. Luigi Monti's "Sicilian Hospitality" and Mrs.

Wallace's "Among the Pueblos" entertaining reading. Mr. F. D. Millet, the painter, says some things that needed to be said about the late Wm. Hunt's art instruction. Mark Twain's "Edward Mills and George Benton: A Tale" can be laughed at here and there, but in the main it has the tedium natural to serious fables by humorists; we confess, too, for our own part, to have got a little tired of this particular moral, but that is a matter de gustibus. Mr. Aldrich reaches the twenty-third chapter of his "Stillwater Tragedy" and leaves his readers properly tantalized, though we feel justified in assuring them that everything will come out right eventually—a confidence which is, of course, an implied criticism upon the order of stories Mr. Aldrich writes. Besides the reviews, the "Club," and other miscellany, there is an article on "The Republicans and their Candidate," which seems badly belated just now, and a sound, if not particularly novel, paper by Mr. Richard Grant White, which may soothe any sensitiveness annoyed by the English article above mentioned.

—The August Lippincott calls for nothing beyond a catalogue of its contents. The opening article by Will O. Bates is about "American Aeronauts," and is a series of short biographical sketches, illustrated by portraits of the best known. More popular adventure is represented by the first of two papers on "Canoeing on the High Mississippi," by A. H. Siegfried. "The Early Days of Mormonism," which is compiled by Frederic G. Mather, chiefly from the reports of the neighbors and acquaintances of Smith in the beginning of his career, is interesting in its presentation of the prophet as the typical Yankee who is too lazy to earn his livelihood except by his wits, and who might have stepped out of one of Mrs. Stowe's stories. "Dungeness, General Greene's Sea-Island Plantation," "An Old English Home: Bramshill House," the latter by a daughter of the late Canon Kingsley, are articles of a like nature, which dwell on the memories that cluster about places of departed grandeur. There may be some readers who will be instructed by Mr. Varney's "Where Lightning Strikes." "Adam and Eve" and "Studies in the Slums" are continued, and there are the usual short stories, of the usual excellence.

—Harper's for August is a peculiarly seasonable number, and the two voices of summer ("one is of the Sea, One of the Mountains") are both freely represented in it. Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis resumes her "By-Paths in the Mountains," and, beginning with the wilderness about the upper waters of the West Branch of the Susquehanna River, passes abruptly to the Black Mountain region of North Carolina by way of Richmond and Salisbury. The incidental sketches of Southern character are of equal excellence with the descriptions of nature. Beautiful illustrations accompany the article, but we miss the helpful map of its predecessor. Mr. Wm. H. Bishop's "Fish and Men in the Maine Islands" is also remarkable for its engravings, and is in itself one of the very best of the kind of papers indicated by its title. The double avocation of the coast population of Maine, the changes in prosperity caused by the failure of granite-quarrying and of certain fisheries, the character of the natives and their amusements, are depicted humorously and with insight. Orr's Island was one of the places visited, and Mr. Bishop discovered from their comments on Mrs. Stowe's famous novel that the inhabitants have very realistic standards in fiction. Mr. M. D. Conway undertakes in "A Martin Summer in France" to trace the evolution of a modern saint, and at least succeeds in being entertaining. Mr. C. E. Chase tells of "The Cruising Canoe and its Outfit"; Mr. James's "Washington Square" fairly attains its momentum, and fixes the reader's interest; the significant poem of the number is Mr. Longfellow's "Robert Burns."

—The Hudson, in its varied physical, economical, and picturesque aspects, is no less instructively than agreeably characterized by Mr. John Burroughs in the leading article of Scribner's, with the aid of designs by Mrs. Foote which merit a separate commendation. Linda Villari relates well enough "The Plain Story of Savonarola's Life," and Mr. Cole admirably interprets with his graver the portrait of the monk by Fra Bartolommeo. Principal Grant, in a fourth paper on the Dominion of Canada, has something to say of Montreal wharves, commerce, and churches, explains the mixed motives of the popular clamor for a protective policy, repudiates the idea of any real decay of "national" feeling or any inclination toward annexation, and, like a loyal Scotchman, advances as a conclusive argument against a union with the United States "the possibility of our having to fight some day against Great Britain." If this is the "last ditch" of Canadian independence, we can only say that the union Mr. Grant deprecates is nearer at hand than we supposed it was. Some hesitation is visible in the attempt to make a pictorial exhibition of the scenes and places in England commemorated in Dickens's novels, but a fair beginning is made with 'Oliver Twist.' Mr. Hamerton's critical estimate of Mr. Seymour Haden's etchings, apparently composed in connection with a catalogue, has the usual merits of this writer on art. It is doubtful whether more than two or three of the wood-engraved imitations of the etchings convey a sufficient idea of the originals to make them worth the pains. Mr. Cable's "Grandissimes" should be almost finished. He has by no means overstayed his welcome, but the conclusion, unless a surprise awaits us, is already in clear view.

—The most important of the three papers printed in the first Report of the Archæological Institute of America, now put forth in a handsome bound volume, is Mr. Lewis H. Morgan's essay upon the Houses of the American Aborigines. It contains a detailed description of the system of house-building practised within historic days by typical Indian tribes, such as the Iroquois and the Mandans, and of the ruins found in New Mexico, Arizona, and Central America. The facts are grouped in accordance with the author's theory that Indian life was communal in many respects, and showed traces of an older and more complete communism. The essay appears to have been written, however, not to settle any doubtful questions or to support any particular view, but to suggest the directions in which enquiry should be made, and the matters to which special attention should be given, by any expedition that the Institute may send out. Mr. Morgan puts forth his theory that the Mound-Builders were Village Indians of New Mexican origin, and constructed their mounds as platforms on which to build long, narrow houses similar to the Pueblos; and he holds that the "magnificent temples and palaces" of the Mexican Indians were also simply better-constructed Pueblos, and do not indicate the existence of populous cities or of a high civilization at the era of the Spanish conquest. The view that these Mexican ruins "were either temples or dwellings for princes and other persons of rank," as Professor Rau, of the Smithsonian Institution, has lately maintained, Mr. Morgan relegates to "the class of puerile conceptions" of which the "tendency is to stultify and disfigure American archæology." According to his own view, the tribes were comparatively small in numbers, and groups of families, aggregating several hundred individuals, lived in common in each of these great buildings, which were erected at a later time than is generally supposed. The essay, as a whole, is an excellent introductory study, and its value is greatly increased by the plans and views with which it is copiously illustrated. Mr. W. J. Stillman contributes a short account of his examination of the ancient walls near Monte Leone which have lately attracted attention. He concluded that the walls were older than the Pelasgic age, and were built as a land-defence by some immigrating colony which settled at Monte Leone when the sea still washed its bases, and he conjectures that here may have been "the original settlement of the Umbri." The third paper is by Mr. J. T. Clarke, who narrates his voyage down the Danube into the Ægean Sea, and describes the ancient sites he visited, giving a sketch of the history and ruins of each. The account of Trajan's bridge over the Danube and the description of the site of Assos are especially interesting. Throughout, the author succeeds in conveying a clear imaginative impression of the characteristics of Greek shores in classical times. This essay, like Mr. Morgan's, is introductory to more important work. The three papers, taken together, are an earnest of the sort of work which the Institute will accomplish if it finds support, and they show equally how wide and varied is the field of labor and how valuable the results are likely to prove.

—Volume xi. of the new 'Encyclopædia Britannica' (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.) shows by the comparative brevity of its articles that the publication has passed the meridian of its course, though the alphabetical compass of the volume (Gou–Hip) is far from indicating it. It is in the nature of cyclopædic works that the earlier parts are ampler and fuller than the latter, not only on account of editorial improvidence in fixing the limits of the single contributions before decided want of room compels strict economy, but also, and perhaps mainly, because distinct or tacit references, facilitating abridgment, to articles already given are so much easier and natural than references to contributions to be written, and therefore of partly unknown contents. A writer on Greek history, for instance, who has the articles on Athens, Bœotia, Corinth, Alexander the Great, Aristides, Aristotle, Epaminondas, and many others of similar contents before him—some of them, perhaps, written by himself—will be both inclined and able to make "Greece" much shorter in proportion than is, for instance, "Austria," which precedes, instead of completing, "Bohemia," "Hungary," etc. We are thus not surprised that "Greece," embracing geography, history, language, and literature (by Professors Jebb and Wilkins and others), fills fewer pages than "Egypt"—not to speak of "England" or "France." Unfortunately, however, that part of the history of Greece is the briefest which is least supplemented by other notices—the history of the last sixty years. The Encyclopædia contains, for instance, no separate notice of either Canaris or Colocotronis, and its "Capo d'Istria" consists of eleven lines, with a reference to "Greece," which has nine lines on the man and his administration. Next in extent and importance to "Greece" are "Gunmaking," "Gunnery," "Gunpowder," "Harbors and Docks," "Heat," "Heraldry," and "Hieroglyphics" (by Reginald S. Poole); most of these contributions are richly illustrated. Some of the biographies—such as those of Lady Grey, the Guises, Gutenberg, and most Gregories and Henries—are very meagre; among the fuller and more interesting are the sketches of the Grimms, Grote, Guicciardini, Guizot, Mme. Guyon, Robert Hall, Sir W.

Hamilton, William Harvey, Warren Hastings, Hegel, Heine, Herder, Herschel, Greeley, Alexander Hamilton, and Hawthorne—the last three being copyrighted in this country. The notices of Guzmics, Gyöngyösi, and other Hungarian subjects show a strict Magyar revision; those of Hanka, Hertzen, etc., betray a lack of Slavic knowledge. Professor W. Robertson Smith contributes "Haggai," "Hezekiah," and very valuable articles on the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Hebrew language—not untinged with fresh heresy—but not the article "Heresy." Among the most noteworthy geographical articles are "Herat" (by Sir H. C. Rawlinson) and "Himalaya" (by General R. Strachey).

—M. Paul de Saint-Victor's volume, 'Les Deux Masques' (Paris: Calmann Lévy), devoted to the study of the origin of the Greek drama and to a critical examination of the works of Æschylus, is the first part of a very extensive work which the author has begun to recast from the studies which he has been making for years past in his weekly feuilletons in the Moniteur Universel and elsewhere, and which will comprise, in three distinct series, some of the grand epochs of the dramatic art. The first series will be devoted to the theatre of the Greeks—Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes—to which will be added a study on Calidasa, the most celebrated poet of the Indian stage. The second series will be filled by Shakspere, and in the third series M. de Saint-Victor will study the French stage from its origin down to Beaumarchais. In his study of the Greek stage he has treated his subject differently from his predecessors, and in a manner, indeed, which, even if they had had his style and imagination, they could scarcely have employed. Mythology and history hold as large a place in his book as literary criticism and æsthetic development. Nearly half of the present volume on Æschylus is devoted to the history of fire-worship, of Bacchus, and to a marvellously comprehensive résumé of the history of the Hellenic world up to the battle of Marathon. The gods come in almost on every page of these studies of the Greek dramas, which were above everything religious fêtes. As each god and each personage enters upon the stage M. Paul de Saint-Victor lifts the mask and describes his religious physiognomy or his legendary character. A thorough master of all the discoveries that have been made during the last thirty years in the comparative science of religions, there is no stage of the plastic or moral growth of a god, no phase of transformation or of symbolism, which he does not explain when the occasion presents itself. One great charm of the book is the utter absence of pedantry.

—Two recent collections of Italian popular tales testify to the continuing interest in this fascinating branch of folk-lore. The first and most important, 'Sessanta Novelle Popolari Montalesi (Circondario di Pistoia) raccolte da Gherardo Nerucci,' (Florence, 1880), contains, as its title declares, sixty popular tales in the Tuscan dialect of Montale, near Pistoia. These stories are noteworthy for their lively dramatic form, and their language will interest the students of Italian dialects. As to their contents, they contain little that is new; we may note, however, several stories (Nos. 40, 48, and 54) which are found also in the 'Arabian Nights,' and one (No. 45) which is from the 'Decameron,' ii. 5. This last is very valuable as showing the passage of stories from literary sources to the people, a process already demonstrated as to popular poetry by D'Ancona in his 'La Poesia popolare Italiana' (Leghorn, 1878). The second collection, 'Tuscan Fairy Tales, taken down from the Mouths of the People' (London: W. Satchell & Co. 1880), is a dainty little volume of 112 pages, printed in brown ink, with sixteen illustrations, and containing ten stories from the Val d'Elsa, the Garfagnana, and the neighborhood of Carrara. These are well rendered, but are only versions of tales already printed in other collections. We may mention here that the seventh volume of the 'Canti e Racconti del Popolo Italiano,' published last year by Signori Comparetti and D'Ancona, contains fifty popular tales from the province of Mantua, collected by Isaia Visentini. The stories are given in an Italian translation.

HEILPRIN'S HISTORICAL HEBREW POETRY.*

THE general characteristics of Mr. Heilprin's second volume of translations and critical notices of Old Testament poetry are the same as those of his first volume, which appeared about a year ago, and which was noticed by us at the time of its appearance with considerable fulness. The favorable opinion which we then expressed of the merits of Mr. Heilprin's work has since been supported by the opinion of many competent critics. Especially noteworthy is the welcome accorded to the book by Dr. Abram Kuenen, the acknowledged head of the Dutch school of Biblical criticism, whose 'Religion of Israel' and 'Prophets and Prophecy in Israel' are the most important Biblical studies that have appeared since Strauss's 'Leben Jesu,' and the most worthy of that so lightly-used designation, "epoch-making books." Mr. Heilprin's desire to advance certain critical ideas rather than his own reputation for novelty or originality, led him in his former volume to fall back in many instances on the expressions of other scholars even when his own enquiries had anticipated their results; and this modesty on his part argued to some of his more careless readers that his book was largely a compilation of the results of other critics. The more careful could not have been so mistaken. At every turn there was for such the evidence of a mind as easily at home in Old Testament studies, their broader aspects and their nicest verbal intricacies, as any of the most famous critics of our time. Dr. Kuenen has amply recognized this fact in his review of Mr. Heilprin's first volume. Mr. Heilprin is, in fact, so little servile, so freely speculative, so daringly original, that not the least of his merits is his ability to refrain from the suggestion of theories which have not yet arrived at definite scientific confirmation. In the second volume we have the same unconventional treatment of the general subject as in the first, the same willingness to subject the most cherished theories to the tests of scientific study, and, consequently, the same wide departure from those opinions of the Old Testament literature which are commonly held among us. Even the translations sound the knell of many a fond illusion, resolving words that have long been used as theological weapons into the nothingness of total misinterpretation; and this, too, without the appearance anywhere of any dogmatic impulse whatsoever. Intent only on a correct translation of the ancient Hebrew, Mr. Heilprin never shows the least desire to rob a theologian of some cherished text.

The translations in this volume engross much more space and deal with texts of much greater interest than in the former. The gain in intelligibility over our common version is no greater than the well-instructed would anticipate, but to the uninstructed it must seem immense, and we can imagine the mingled feelings of distress and pleasure with which the average Bible-reader would find the cabalistic phrases which he has read so often without attaching to them any definite meaning suddenly becoming apprehensible to his understanding. But with all this there is not much if any loss of poetic charm. This is the more remarkable to an English reader, because Mr. Heilprin was not to the manner born of our common version, and apparently he has made no attempt, as many of our translators very properly do, to conform to this as nearly as possible. His success is simply that of a man who has a nice feeling for words, who likes them homely and strong, and knows that only such are a fit vehicle for the transmission of the ideas and sentiments of ancient Hebrew poetry.

The present volume begins with David, and, like the former, follows the chronological order of events and not that of the literary matter. Having shown already how little reason there is to suspect David of literary authorship, it is now shown that he is only incidentally the subject of his nation's poetry. The most considerable mention of him is in Psalms lxxxix. and cxxxii., and here it is the late echo of popular traditions already formed, and is entirely at variance with the comparatively trustworthy accounts of the historic books. Solomon, who figures so magnificently in the prose histories, "besides figuring as an author in spurious superscriptions," is not honored by either prophet or psalmist with so much as the briefest mention. To the "Song of Songs" Mr. Heilprin accords no historical relation to Solomon, either subjective or objective; hence it does not here fall within the scope of his criticism. Yet in one of his longer notes he is led to declare with emphasis in favor of the theory, defended by Graetz, which considers the "Song" a product of the age of the Ptolemies.

The twenty-third section of Mr. Heilprin's studies is one of the most interesting in his series, and reveals as well as any the acuteness of his critical perceptions. It deals with the successors of Zimri, Omri, and Ahab, the objects of the prophet Micah's severest animadversion in the book of prophecy ascribed to him. In the Book of Kings elaborate mention is made of Ahab; and a prophet Micaiah, the son of Imlah, figures conspicuously. The narrative has many points of contact with the prophecies of Micah of Moresheth. These are variously explained. Mr. Heilprin, accepting as the most plausible hypothesis that Micah introduced into his book fragments of the older prophet, applying them to the events of his own time, rescues a number of passages which he conceives to be of the more ancient date, and assigns to them a definite historical importance. Hardly less interesting here than the critical result is the side-light which it throws upon the literary methods of the prophetic period. Evidently the right of property in ideas was then but little understood, and there were no conceptions corresponding to the words plagiarism and forgery.

The next following section introduces us to the famous Moabite stone discovered at Diban in 1868. Mr. Heilprin gives a translation of so much of the decipherment as the ablest expounders—Schlottmann, Nöldeke, Kaempf, and M. A. Levy—are fully agreed upon, following it with an account from Kings of the subsequent course of events. The poetic fragment corresponding to this is found in Isaiah xv. and xvi., which have been fully established to be not Isaiah's, abounding as they do in peculiar and archaic forms of expression. Nothing else in the Old Testament, says Knobel, can be the production of the same author.

The next five sections of Mr. Heilprin's book, from the twenty-fifth to the thirtieth, deal exclusively with the prophecies of Amos of Tekoa, who, about 800 B.C., came from Judah to preach righteousness in Israel.

* 'The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews. Translated and Critically Examined by Michael Heilprin.' Vol. II. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

"We can almost image to ourselves," he says, "the plain, poor man from Tekoa—for he was one of the shepherds of that little town who tended their flocks on the borders of the wilderness of Judah—standing before a concourse of people at the public place of Beth-El or Samaria, reading from a scroll brought with him the last of a string of direful prophetic utterances, and suddenly breaking off at the fresh remembrance of shocking experiences, and wildly pouring forth against his hearers accusations, reproaches, and imprecations. It was heartless oppression of the poor by the rich and the guardians of justice, and shameless licentiousness fed by extortion, which wrung from him this outburst of wrath."

The translation which is thus introduced is full of energy. The translator has put his heart into it as well as his head, and the sentences clash and ring in primitive Oriental fashion. Following up this translation with others bearing on the historical events of Amos's time, he comes in the twenty-seventh section to the passage on Assyria, the nation in which Amos saw the future chastiser of Israel. The black obelisk inscription discovered by Layard at Nimrud is parallel with Amos to some extent, and so, too, is the monolith inscription found at Kurkh, and Shalmaneser's "bull inscription"; or, rather, these various inscriptions indicate the state of things which was imminent in the time of Amos, and which he might well anticipate with terror. The last three chapters of Amos have a visionary character which distinguishes them sharply from the chapters that precede them. These chapters Mr. Heilprin assigns to a period some years later than the preceding. The concluding verses of Amos, which are of a much more optimistic and consolatory character than the body of the work, bear a strong resemblance to the concluding passages of Joel and Zephaniah. They were probably added, Mr. Heilprin thinks, by some one of the redactors of the minor prophets in order to wind up the book with predictions of lasting prosperity and peace.

A chapter on the general characteristics of Amos and of the prophetic office is appended to the translations and criticisms of the prophet's book. It is introduced by an exposition of the passage in 1 Kings xii. 32–xiii. 6, in which the actual Amos is made over into a mythical person as different from him as the prophets of the historical books generally are different from the prophets whose writings have been preserved for our instruction. In the histories, miracle-working and miraculously precise revelations of the future form the staple of the narrative. In the writings of the prophets, the conspicuous thing is moral exhortation, based upon the natural relationships of cause and effect. To some it will no doubt appear that the prophets of the histories are much more exalted personages than those of the canonical prophetic books. To Mr. Heilprin it does not so appear. What impresses him in Amos and the rest of his great company is a certain moral grandeur. This he fully recognizes and to this he pays due reverence, and the concluding passages of his treatment of Amos rise with his honest enthusiasm to a height of eloquent expression which, if not anticipated in a discussion naturally somewhat dry and bare, is none the less welcome, certain as we are of its unqualified sincerity.

The thirtieth and concluding section of the present volume deals exclusively with the book of the prophet Hosea. An interesting problem meets us at the very threshold of this book in the astonishing parabolic utterances with which it begins. That these utterances are parabolic has strangely enough been doubted by a critic so reasonable in his conclusions generally as Dean Stanley. To suppose them narrations of literal fact is to credit Hosea with carrying symbolic action to a disgusting extent. The conclusion of Mr. Heilprin, who is by no means solitary here, that these utterances are purely parabolical, is a conclusion as much more pleasing as it is more rational than the other. The differences between Amos and Hosea are clearly indicated. In the latter with an equal earnestness there is an added strain of tenderness. The translations from Hosea are copious; the critical remarks are few and still sufficient. The translations are very spirited, and make many dark sayings of our common version clear as day. Some fifty pages of critical and explanatory notes at the end of the book appeal to those who are versed in the niceties of scholarship rather than to the general reader, but they will be appreciated by those for whom they are intended. We are obliged to lament, as in the former volume, the absence of any index or table of contents, an absence the more noticeable as in other particulars the book-maker has seconded the author in the most creditable and even luxurious manner. The concluding volume will, no doubt, repair this deficiency.

PURITAN NAMES.*

AN account of the Christian names given by English Puritans between the years 1560 and 1660 occupies the chief part of Mr. Bardsley's book. The period mentioned is clearly marked. The earlier date is that of the Genevan Bible—"the Puritan's Bible and the household Bible of the nation"; the later is the date of the Restoration. The relation of this period to previous periods in English Christian namings is pointed out in a prefatory chapter which is not the least interesting part of the book.

1. Before the Conquest "there were no Scripture names in England. If any are found in the old English period, they were ecclesiastic titles, adopted at ordination. Greek and Latin saints were equally unnoticed." Our readers will remember that a full account of the early English names is given in Miss Yonge's 'Dictionary of Christian Names.'

2. With William came in Bible names, saints' names, and his own Teutonic names. Godric, Godgiva, and the other old English names "bowed to them and disappeared. . . . The Norman list was a small one, but it took possession of the whole of England. Before many generations had passed, Bartholomew, Simon, Peter, Philip, Thomas, Nicholas, John, and Elias had engrossed a third of the male population." By the year 1300, nearly one-third of Englishmen were named either William or John; there were often two or three Johns in the same family. The natural result of this shortening of the list was to compel the invention of many new variations upon the names in use. Mr. Bardsley makes two main classes of these variations; (a) "nick forms," as Wat from Walter, Tibbe from Theobald, Cisse from Cecilia, Hikke from Isaac; and (b), "pet desinence" forms, as Emmott for Emma, Batkin for Bartholomew; other ancient variations on this name are Bat, Bate, Batty, Bartle, Bartelot, Batcock, and Tolly or Tholy. The favorite enclitics were "kin," "cock," "on," "in," "ot," and "et." Thus, from Johannes came both Hankin and Hancock; from Beatrix, Beton or Betoun; from Hugh came Hugyn, a name which survives in the contemporary Hugginses. "All our Wyatts in the directory hail from Guiot, the diminutive of Guy," as Wilmot hails from William. Cecilia gave the pet names Cissot or Syssot; Custance, Cussot; the Norman name Hamon became Hamnet, Hamlet. This name was very popular (Hamnet Shakspere was so baptized), and it survived into the eighteenth century. Multitudes of these forms remain in the ancient parish books; they are now almost entirely disused. For what reason? The Puritan names displaced them. "It is hard to realize that a custom equally affected by prince and peasant, as popular in country as in town, should have been so completely uprooted that ninety-nine out of the hundred are unaware that it ever existed" in England. In France these forms, or similar ones, remain in use to the present day: as in Margot, Goton, Margotin, from Marguerite; Lambin, Lamblin, Lambertin, from Lambert; Jannotin, Jacquinot, and Perrinot from Jean, Jacques, and Pierre respectively. These, and many other pet desinences of Christian names, may now be found as surnames in the Paris directory. The Scripture names in English use before the Reformation were (a) "mystery names," such as Adam, Judith, Hester; (b), "crusade names," as Baptist, Elias, Jordan (the two latter survive, by the way, as the surnames Ellis and Judd, Judkin, Judson); (c), "saints' calendar names," including all of the saints and all of the apostles except Judas; (d), "festival names," like Noel, Pascal, Easter, Pentecost. These classes of Christian names were not, however, large ones.

3. This entire system of naming was to be revolutionized within forty years by "The People's Bible" in Puritan hands. Mr. Bardsley says:

"No such crisis ever visited a nation's register before, nor can again. Every home felt the effect. It was like the massacre of the innocents. 'There was not a house where there was not one dead.' But in Pharaoh's day they did not replace the dead with the living. At the Reformation such a locust army of new names burst upon the land that we may well style it the Hebrew Invasion. . . . During the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, the whole of James's reign, and a great part of Charles's reign, there prevailed a practice of baptizing children by Scriptural phrases, pious ejaculations, or godly admonitions. It was a practice instituted of deliberate purpose as conducive to vital religion, and as intending to separate the truly godly and renewed portion of the community from the world at large. . . . The Puritan was ever trotting out his two big Ps, 'Pagan' and 'Popish.' Under the first he placed every name that could not be found in the Scriptures, and under the latter every title in the same Scriptures, and in the church system founded on them, that had been employed previous to the coronation of Edward VI. To reject the Richards, Mileses, and Henrys of the Teutonic, and the Bartholomews, Simons, Peters, and Nicholases of the ecclesiastic class, was to remove the Canaanite out of the land."

The old "nick forms" and "pet desinences" rapidly disappeared; and with them were lost, too, the original names upon which we have seen that they were formed; with Elena, Lina, and Linot, for instance, went Eleanor. The intruding Scripture names did not lend themselves to diminutive forms, which popular feeling withheld from them. "Not a single name, saving [perhaps] 'Nat-kin,' introduced by the English Bible has become conjoined with a diminutive." Shortening, however, was a necessity in handling many of the names not literally Scriptural; as in the case of a brother of the celebrated Praise-God Barebone, who was entitled If-Christ-had-not-died-for-thee-thou-hadst-been-damned Barebone. "Whether the title was given at the font or adopted," says Mr. Bardsley, "there is no doubt that he was familiarly known as Dr. Damned Barebone"; and he adds, quoting Notes and Queries (March 15, 1862), that "this abbreviated form, as his morals were not of the best, appeared to suit him better than his entire prefix." Clearly we are a long way already from the winning names we have left—Amice, Lettice, Aliot, Beton, Audrey, Gawyn, Custance, Gillian, and the rest.

The New Testament names, as a class, spread the most rapidly, "especially girl-names of the Priscilla, Dorcas, Tabitha, and Martha type . . . Persis, Tryphena, and Tryphosa were also largely used. . . . By slow degrees Cecilia, Isabella, and Emma lapsed from their pedestals, and the little babes were turned into Sarahs, Rebeccas, and Deborahs." As the seventeenth century went on and the Puritan movement spread to the northward of the Trent, nearly all the names of the Old and New Testaments were brought into use, even the most objectionable ones; girls were named Tamar, Sapphira, Dinah, Drusilla, Bathsheba; boys, Ananias, Antipas, Milcom, even Barabbas and Beelzebub. We must suppose that the ill-savor of these names was sufficiently corrected in the Puritan mind by the fact that they formed part and parcel of the Scripture. Unkind critics were not wanting, however, of the Puritans' scriptural devotion. Bishop Corbett is quoted by Mr. Bardsley as making a zealot minister say, in the "Maypole":

> "Brothers and sisters in the fields may walk,
> Beginning of the Holy Word to talk;
> Of David and Uriah's lovely wife,
> Of Tamar and her lustful brother's strife."

The list of eccentric Scripture names is a long one. "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were in every-day request, Shadrach and Meshach being the favorites." Kerenhappuch Benett, Melchisedek Fritter, Maher-shalal-hash-baz and Zaphnaphpaaneah Clarke, Pontius Pilate Pegnail, and Eli-lama-Sabachthani Pressnail are a few of these names, some of them even now, or but lately, in use in England. Not a few curious names other than Scriptural were also favored, in particular some Latin names, which served at the outset as a transition from the old names to the new. "Redemptus was less grotesque than Redeemed, and Renata than Renewed." But a little later in the movement these were disused, and "the English equivalents ruled supreme." The highest point of fanaticism was reached about 1580.

Of the "grace names" that are not less familiar in New England than in Old, Mr. Bardsley gives a sufficient account in his loose-lively style, tracing the spread of the "Puritan nomenclature" in our Eastern States. The following grace names, transcribed from the registers of old Killingworth, Connecticut, may be added to Mr. Bardsley's account: Desire, Hope, Concurrence, Submit, Delight, Experience, Patience, Marah (bitterness), Deliverance, Thankful. These names are mostly of the seventeenth century. Other New England names that we have noted are Alethea, Yetmercy, Hopewell, Hopestill, and Waitstill. Mr. Bardsley's book ends with an "Epilogue on Double Christian Names." The whole embodies much curious research and makes a volume that will usefully supplement Miss Yonge's important 'Dictionary.'

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.—I.*

MR. GEORGE endeavors to show that the cause, or principal cause, of poverty and wretchedness in the midst of wealth and abundance in the world is the private ownership of land, whereby a few persons are enabled to exact from the many a rental for the use of something which is limited in quantity and indispensable to the human race. Rent signifies, of course, the surplus obtainable from the use or cultivation of any particular piece of land over and above the sum obtainable from the poorest land in use, which latter yields only the ordinary rate of wages and the average rate of interest on the capital employed upon it. It is immaterial whether the owner grants the use of the land to another for an agreed compensation or uses it himself—the surplus goes into his pocket and is denominated rent. It is likewise immaterial whether the land consist of farms, mines, forests, game-preserves, fishing privileges, race-courses, oyster-beds, water-power, stone-quarries, or city lots—all these are limited in amount, all are natural agents capable of assisting the labor of man in the production of wealth, and are indispensable thereto; they have a monopoly value, and consequently yield to their fortunate possessors something for nothing. All who do not possess land are toiling for those who do, and this is the reason why progress and poverty go hand-in-hand from one generation to another. As population increases, the landlords are enabled to exact a greater proportion of the total production of the world from the landless, and do exact it.

This thesis is by no means new. It has agitated the world for centuries, and it constitutes the foundation or starting point of agrarianism and all sorts of utopias. Yet Mr. George is not an agrarian, or a communist, or in any sense a disturber of the peace and good order of society. Whether his visions are utopian must be learned from an analysis of his argument. Granting all that he claims in the first five chapters of his book, his remedy is nothing more irregular than the exercise of the taxing power of government to confiscate rent, so that landowners shall be put upon the same level as other people, and shall get nothing except what they work for. We infer that he would apply the same principle to all other monopolies, natural or artificial, although this is not clearly stated. What is to be done with the proceeds of such extensive taxation the author does not say. He assumes that if the state were virtually the sole landlord, wages and interest would rise, poverty would disappear, incomes would be equalized, and an Arcadia would dawn upon the earth. But the only mode or process for reaching this result is the abolition of all taxes and tariffs except that upon land, which, by the hypothesis, is the collection of rent for the use of government, as in India at the present time. The case of India is an unfortunate one for the purpose of illustrating Mr. George's thesis, but he ascribes the poverty and helplessness of the Indian ryot to other causes than the mode of collecting the rent-tax. If this rent-charge went into the pockets of landlords instead of the coffers of the state the condition of the farmer would be no better, and it might be worse.

Mr. George's first postulate is that wages are not drawn from capital, and consequently are not kept down by the limits of capital, so that the cause of low wages and of poverty is not any want of capital, but must be sought elsewhere. The fact that wages are to a large extent paid out of the proceeds of the laborer's product, and that oftentimes the laborer advances his own wages to the employer and does not receive his pay until the product is sold, was pointed out some years ago by Mr. Francis A. Walker, and the doctrine is now generally accepted by economists as an important modification of the old doctrine that wages are drawn wholly from capital. Yet the effect upon wages of brushing away all the circulating capital now in existence would be so depressing that we are not permitted to expunge the wage-fund theory entirely, and set up in place of it the theory that wages are produced altogether by current labor, without reference to the fund derived from previous labor and set apart for its employment. In order to trace the inequalities of wealth among men to the prime cause of land monopoly, it is necessary to exclude other causes and especially those to which economists have for the most part assigned those inequalities. These are the Malthusian law of population and of "diminishing returns" and the doctrine that wages are limited by capital. It is the latter which Mr. George first attacks, and it may be admitted that the attack, though not entirely novel, has a great deal of force.

So much cannot be said of his attack upon Malthus, which, though ingenious and vigorous, falls far short of demolishing that stubborn earthwork. Mr. George contends that there is not necessarily any such thing as a pressure of population upon the means of subsistence, because there is evidence that population at a former period of the world's history was, over large portions of the earth, much more dense than it is now, and because the tendency of a high stage of civilization is to lessen rather than increase the number of births to each family. Neither the one nor the other of these facts, if admitted, proves anything against Malthus. Mesopotamia and Peru may have been once filled with mighty cities where now the jackal and the bat abound, yet the tendency of population to increase more rapidly than the means of subsistence may be and is an observed and demonstrable fact. All that can be argued from the examples of Mesopotamia and Peru is that they are for some reason less populous than formerly; perhaps by reason of wars, famines, pestilence, bad cultivation, bad government. Nothing goes to show that if those countries could be restored to their former physical condition their populations would not grow to the former dimensions and then begin to press against the means of subsistence. The drift of Mr. George's argument is that if there was at one time a larger population on considerable tracts of territory than now, it is an unfounded assumption to say that population tends to increase at all, still more that it tends to increase faster than the means of subsistence. There are acres of lava on the side of Vesuvius where a few years ago were fruitful fields and happy villages. There are large tracts of country in Southern Europe, which once supported dense populations, wholly tenantless by reason of the removal of timber from the uplands, which formerly sheltered them from sudden thaws and freshets. The arable land has been washed into the sea and its place filled with gravel and boulders. The law of Malthus, however, governs the adjoining districts, as it governed the now denuded districts in the time of the Cæsars. For all purposes of the argument, war, pestilence, famine, and misgovernment are the correlatives, the same thing in substance, as lava overflows and mountain floods, except that Malthus pointed out war, pestilence, and famine as the regular correctives of over-population, while lava and mountain torrents can only be counted as accidental. The pains taken by Mr. George to show that population was here and there greater some centuries ago than now is bootless. It is true that Malthus collected statistics to show the progressive increase of population under favoring conditions, and no writer of authority has ever disputed their substantial correctness. If it could be shown that the whole world was once as populous as Belgium now is, it would become important to discover what causes led to the depopulation, but the law of Malthus would not be affected by the result.

Is it true, in fact, that as civilization advances, the number of births to each family is lessened? The only evidence offered upon this point by Mr. George is that certain families in the British peerage have become extinct.

* 'Progress and Poverty: An Enquiry into the cause of Industrial Depressions and of the Increase of Want with the Increase of Wealth. The Remedy. By Henry George.' New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

This is true, but it is also true that certain other families in the peerage have multiplied beyond reasonable bounds, while the British nation at large, which may be accepted as a type of the highest existing civilization, has increased during the past two centuries many fold more rapidly than during the previous eras of barbarism and semi-barbarism.

The Malthusians, when driven into a corner, have contended that the time must come, if population increases in its present observed ratio, when the last acre of arable land will be under the plough, and that since there is a limit to the amount of food an acre of land can produce, there must then be a pressure of population upon the means of subsistence. Mr. George is ready to meet them on this ground.

"For," he says, "that man cannot exhaust or lessen the powers of nature follows from the indestructibility of matter and the persistence of force. . . . Life does not use up the forces that maintain life. We come into the material universe bringing nothing; we take nothing away when we depart. The human being, physically considered, is but a transient form of matter, a changing mode of motion. The matter remains and the force persists. Nothing is lessened, nothing is weakened. And from this it follows that the limit to the population of the globe can only be the limit of space."

By space he means not space for cultivation but mere "elbow-room." It is true that matter remains and force persists, and that when a grain warehouse burns up, all its constituents still exist in one form or another, but it is not true that the resulting ashes are, equally with the original grain, adapted to the support of human life. It is true that the force which cuts down a forest and thus causes inundations which wash arable land into the sea is persistent, but it will never bring the land back from the sea or cause a blade of corn to grow on the denuded acres. If all the force which runs to waste in lifting the ocean-tides could be applied scientifically to the cultivation of land, the law of diminishing returns would still hold good. Beyond a certain point there would be no increment of the crop in response to the increment of capital, or force.

By way of final disproof of the Malthusian dogma the author points out that in any given state of civilization the densest aggregates of population are those showing the greatest accumulation of wealth—London, Paris, New York, for example. On the other hand, the most sparse and scattered populations are generally the poorest. Hence it is inferred that the wealth is great because the population is numerous. The Malthusian contends that the population is numerous because the conditions for producing wealth are great, and he holds that if the population of London, with all their existing wealth, were removed to the centre of Arizona, and forced to remain there, two-thirds of them would starve before the end of a year.

STEPHEN'S POPE.*

IN a prefatory note, indicating his authorities, Mr. Leslie Stephen modestly characterizes his book as a "necessarily brief and imperfect sketch." It is, of course, brief, but considering the voluminous literature that exists in the case of Pope, that is nothing to apologize for, and so far from being imperfect it seems to us the very ideal or type of the class of criticism into which any work by Mr. Stephen must naturally fall. It is directly written, the narrative is full without being over-minute, the discussions of doubtful points—in which any biography of Pope must abound—are candid and evidently follow upon a patient and thorough investigation; the criticism of Pope's writings sufficiently recognizes their well-understood character to avoid an elaborate consideration of them de novo, and is interwoven with the biographical portions in such a manner as agreeably to preserve the unity of the book. Add to these merits the account taken of contemporary writings and events, by which the subject's association with its environment is constantly kept in view, and it should be clear that Mr. Stephen has provided ordinary readers with an intelligent and compact guide to the life and writings of Pope, and has, perhaps, simplified the labors of "the ideal biographer of Pope," whom he protests we have still to await.

To explain with any precision, therefore, why Mr. Stephen's work leaves the impression of an unsatisfactory performance is a task of a good deal of difficulty; it is the more difficult because it concerns general principles of criticism, and the critic's natural equipment. "The ideal biographer of Pope," says Mr. Stephen, "must be endowed with the qualities of an acute critic and a patient antiquarian; and it would take years of labor to work out all the minute problems connected with the subject." Such a personage would indeed be an ideal biographer; there are evidences enough, however, that in the possible incompatibility between the two qualifications he mentions, Mr. Stephen's preference is for the solid qualities of the latter, and his allusion to "the qualities of an acute critic" may be taken to be perfunctory, since it is plain that his insistence is upon research. Indeed, it would not be going too far to say that to Mr. Stephen and to the school to which he belongs research is not so much the safeguard as it is the essence of criticism. This is not only the case in their practice, but it is definitely propounded in their theory. Briefly stated, this theory admits that facts are only of importance as they explain truths, but maintains that if you discover all the facts and set them in order the truth will discover itself spontaneously. It has taken a great while for the Baconian point of view, which was adopted by philosophy as soon as it was stated, to capture the citadel of literary criticism as well, but at last it has succeeded, and in Teutonic countries, at least, the advantages of its sway are considered priceless. It has, indeed, been refined upon and elaborated with results which one is at liberty to suspect would surprise its more abstract originators. It has developed what is now familiar to contemporary applause as "the historic method," the only recognized method of criticism in Germany, the triumphant one in England—where writers of the temper and tenets of Professor Seeley, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and Mr. Stephen illustrate it admirably—and in the country of Sainte-Beuve it is now being vindicated by the scientific historian of contemporary France, and has lately been eloquently defined by Sainte-Beuve's successor to be a method "which seeks to account for a work from the genius of its author, and for the turn which this genius has taken from the circumstances amidst which it was developed. From the analysis of the writer's character," M. Scherer goes on, "and the study of his age a correct understanding of his work arises spontaneously." This is criticism made simple; after what is called "eliminating the personal equation," all that is necessary is research.

As generally happens, however, Mr. Stephen has not been able completely to "eliminate the personal equation," though it is equally clear that his attempt to do this is nothing short of heroic. His dislike of Pope's writings and contempt for his character lie very near the surface of every page. "To know a thing," says Mr. Carlyle—"what we call knowing—a man must first love the thing, sympathize with it." This is not true, but perhaps it is Mr. Carlyle's heightened way of saying what is incontestably true, that to know a thing one must first have sufficient intellectual sympathy for it to understand its law, and in the case of a man to "put one's self in his place," in familiar phrase. Mr. Stephen concerns himself with Pope far more than with his writings and position in literature, but it is impossible to imagine any intellectual sympathy between the two. He knows, for example, far more about Pope's life, about those minute problems which it would require years of labor to work out, and we think we may add about Pope's milieu, the Anne-Augustan age, than Thackeray did. Thackeray's criticism is, it need not be said, little better than obsolete at present; a critic of the present day who assumed Stella to be a natural daughter of Sir William Temple merely because "it must have been so," would be ridiculous. But the difference in matters beyond the reach of verifying documents is worth noting. Thackeray was, one may say, saturated with the spirit of the Queen Anne age; Mr. Stephen is "barnacled" with facts about it; and the way in which each treats such a detail as the celebrated quarrel between Pope and Addison may be taken as an illustration here pertinent. Every one knows the current story, and we do not intend a tedious rehearsal of it. Mr. Stephen in ten of his two hundred pages recounts the circumstances at length. After reading them several times we are unable to make anything positive out of them; indeed, Mr. Stephen says himself one is inclined to doubt after investigation whether there was any quarrel at all. But we get Mr. Stephen's opinion that it was "very improbable" that Addison should have enjoyed the joke on Steele associated with Pope's attack on Philips; that Pope was "almost subject to the illusion characteristic of actual insanity"; that he doubts whether Addison ever saw the Atticus verses; and adds that "Pope himself appears not to have devised the worst part of the story till some years later." Now, it is clear here that the historical method has broken down; the facts are few and in dispute, and Mr. Stephen's careful scrutiny of them results only in darkening counsel. Speculation is necessary, it is a question of probabilities, the critic is thrown back upon himself, upon his own force of divination and insight. And the question is important—so far, at least, as Addison is concerned. We all remember how Macaulay settled it after his rhetorical fashion by the flimsy expedient of exaggerating the charge against Addison into a "villany" and "conspiracy," and then pronouncing it incredible. Mr. Stephen's opinion seems to be the same, expressed temperately and acknowledging that there is little to go on. This is what Thackeray says: "Did Mr. Addison, justly perhaps, thinking that, as young Mr. Pope had not had the benefit of a university education, he couldn't know Greek, therefore he couldn't translate Homer, encourage his young friend Tickell, of Queen's, to translate that poet, and aid him with his own known scholarship and skill?" and he goes on to say that the conduct of each was "natural" under the circumstances. With what is "natural" a critic like Mr. Stephen will have nothing to do in general; in general he has a praiseworthy desire to get at what is in a given case. But it is unfortunately true not only that no synthesis would ever be possible if we had to wait for all the facts, of having which we can never be quite certain, but that very often at the most interesting and important juncture there are no indicative facts at all.

It is no disparagement to the value of research and erudition to recognize the fact that, owing to the construction of the human mind, the historian, biographer, critic finds a working hypothesis a great convenience. Practically, in nine cases out of ten, he does not know how he comes by it, but in one way and another, for the most part unconsciously perhaps, he gets a conception to set out with, to be verified or disproved as he proceeds with his investigation. This is really Mr. Stephen's method; but the school to which he belongs, having in mind the abuse of it which has resulted from inadequate verification and an unwillingness to admit disproof, are excusably chary about acknowledging it. It is not easy—though it is possible—to overestimate the service which they have performed in ridding criticism of personal crotchets and caprices, in enduing it with the convincing power of candor, and, in a word, transplanting it from the sphere of passion and prejudice to that of impersonal science. But, after all, criticism is not to be called an exact science, and the personal quality of the critic, dealing with anything so fluid and many-sided as literature or life, will always be of more consequence than that of a demonstrator. It is certain, at all events, that if he consciously and conscientiously strives to repress it, he will become dull in proportion to his success. Mr. Stephen's book is dull; it is overloaded with material and in many parts is chronicle rather than history, and reads like a parliamentary report upon the mysteries of Pope's career. Partially, at least, this would have been avoided if Mr. Stephen did not look upon literary art as something very nearly akin to rhetorical affectation; but our main objection is that at the point where he is perforce thrown back upon himself and deserted by the record, and again where he distrusts the spontaneous arising of a correct understanding of Pope and gives us his own, he fails in sympathy and clairvoyance. His 'Johnson' was perhaps equally free from the graces of diction, but it was captivating in comparison, because it was both impersonal and sympathetic.

* 'Pope. By Leslie Stephen.' (English Men of Letters.) New York: Harper & Bros. 1880.

For ourselves we find it impossible to account for the existence in any society of such a man as he paints Pope, not to speak of the immense social esteem and personal affection which Pope enjoyed. When we remember how general among the Queen Anne wits were coarseness, chicanery, low views of women, brutality of satire, and so on, it is difficult to account for a judgment which regards Pope as the particular Blifil of the age. "With all his delinquencies," says Mr. Stephen, "and with all his affectations, there are moments in which we forget to preserve the correct tone of moral indignation." But Mr. Stephen seems to succeed admirably. He points out that "there is no particular merit in loving a mother," but that this is all we have in Pope's case to indicate that he was "really deserving of some affection." He refers again and again to Pope's "following Wycherly about like a dog," emphasizes the ridiculousness of his love-making on account of his contemptible physique, endlessly reiterates reprobation of his deceit and malice; curiously introduces all the qualifying commendation, we have remarked, in subsidiary clauses and sentences with "buts" and "yets"; and at the end, asking what must be "the final element in our feeling about the man," concludes his volume with: "Let us hope that it may be the pity which, after a certain lapse of years, we may be excused for conceding to the victim of moral as well as physical diseases." His reprehension of Pope, moreover, has not the perfunctory ring, but displays the vivacity of sincerity; and we cannot help feeling that it ought to be encouraging to those who fear for the effect upon morality of an abandonment of evangelical theology to find even moral considerations so carefully attended to in a literary biography by so eminent a sceptic. In fine, Mr. Stephen takes his subject with all the seriousness of a writer to whom 'Candide' is "biting sarcasm" (page 171). Those, again, who fear the renaissance of the literary methods and canons of the eighteenth century will rejoice to find that they receive little countenance from Mr. Stephen; his abundant objections to Pope's artificiality are perhaps modified by his excusing the quality in the translation of the 'Iliad' on the singular ground that it would have seemed far more flagrant if Pope had endeavored to interpret the spirit of Homer; but this is only a momentary aberration, and in general we have Pope measured by true Wordsworthian standards. Criticism is at present so unanimous concerning Pope that no one is likely to quarrel with most of Mr. Stephen's judgments, in detail, but his book justifies the natural expectation that Pope's work as a whole, his service to and place in English literature, are not likely to be seized with conspicuous firmness and presented with vivid distinctness by a Wordsworthian who admires Wordsworth because "his ethical system is as distinctive and capable of exposition as Bishop Butler's." Mr. Stephen is an authority upon the eighteenth century, but the rhetoric and classicism of the eighteenth century will never be interpreted quite adequately, we may be sure, by a criticism which sets great store by "a scientific system of thought" in poetical matters. At bottom, the two have too much in common, and the ends of truth are served only indirectly by disagreements of the doctors.

A Collection of Legal Maxims in Law and Equity. With English translations. By S. S. Peloubet. (New York: George S. Diossy. 1880.)—The object of this work, as announced in the preface, is to collect in a small compass all the principal legal maxims scattered through treatises and the series of reports. The author has collected 2,613 maxims, a rather startling number and probably far more than can be found in any two other books on the subject. The number has been artificially swollen, however, by the introduction of a great number of phrases which are not, properly speaking, legal maxims at all. Some of these are proverbs, which it is a mistake to insert in a collection of this kind. Bis dat qui cito dat, for instance, is the expression of a moral not a legal saw, and there is no more reason for giving it a legal status than there would be for setting down Aut Cæsar aut nullus, or Dulce est pro patria mori, as maxims of jurisprudence. Again, many of Mr. Peloubet's "maxims" are mere phrases taken at random from the authorities. In omni re nascitur res quæ ipsam rem exterminat rests upon the high authority of Coke, but it has no other importance. Others, again, are less maxims than statements of propositions of law. When it is laid down in the pages of the learned Jenkins that Juratores debent esse vicini, etc. (p. 133), it is stated as the law of England governing the constitution of juries. A legal maxim properly speaking is different from all these: it is a general legal truth which bears very nearly the same relation to actual law that a proverb bears to moral and social law. It is an exaggerated expression of a generally-observed legal truth, but it is not law in the sense of being obligatory upon any one. Lex vigilantibus non dormientibus subvenit; Equitas sequitur legem; There is no right without a remedy; Equity treats that as done which ought to have been done—are all instances of true legal maxims. The importance of maxims like these in our system of law is for obvious reasons very slight. They settle nothing, they decide nothing; but they have undoubtedly a good effect upon the ear. The distinction we have ventured to suggest between maxims and propositions of law in the form of maxims is frequently overlooked, but should be carefully kept in view by writers of compendiums like Mr. Peloubet's.

The Week.

THE publication by the World of an alleged decision by Judge Swayne of the Supreme Court, to the effect that the retainer of General Garfield in the De Golyer pavement business was a "sale of official influence," has been met by a flat denial by Judge Swayne. The judge says that the matter was never before him in any way. This has induced the World to make a thorough investigation by means of what the Tribune would call its "staff correspondents," with the following results: In 1874 Chittenden, the lobbyist through whom the De Golyer contract was obtained, brought a suit in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, for his services. The defendants set up as a special defence that the award of the contract was void, as against public policy, or, in common parlance, as being immoral, for the reason, among others, of the Garfield retainer. To this the plaintiff demurred—or, in other words, contended that, even admitting the facts to be as stated by the defendants, there was nothing in the defence. The judge decided that the demurrer was good. Mr. J. R. Doolittle, who was of counsel for the defendants, submitted a brief in which he made a quotation from an opinion of Judge Swayne's in another case, which he argued controlled this one, and then proceeded to state his own view of the connection of Mr. Garfield with the De Golyer contract. He naturally did this in strong language, and it was this language which was erroneously attributed to Judge Swayne. It is quite apparent from this that the facts in the case have never been passed upon by any judge, the plaintiff's demurrer in the Cook County case being only an admission by counsel for the purpose of having a question of law passed upon. But the World thinks that, inasmuch as Judge Swayne did originally decide a case about contracts contra bonos mores, and in it used language which, in a certain view of the Garfield case, would involve a strong condemnation of General Garfield, the original story is at least sufficiently made out for campaign purposes, and intimates now pretty distinctly that Judge Swayne is lying and that General Garfield's friends are in despair at the exposure.

The affair can hardly help being damaging to the World as an evangelical organ, which we regret extremely, as our esteemed contemporary supplies in this capacity a want long felt. The other campaign stories of the week are not bad. General Hancock has at last been exposed as having wilfully failed to do his duty in one of the fights before Richmond. He confessed, as usual, on the night before the engagement, to a man who slept in the same tent with him, that he took no interest in the fight, "because, if there was any glory in the thing, Sheridan would get it all." Accordingly, he so arranged matters that the men of his corps on coming into action only fired two rounds each, and then ran away. It only remains now for the man to appear who met Hancock the day before, and, although seeing him for the first time, clearly perceived his traitorous designs in the expression of his face, and would have felt justified before God and man in shooting him on the spot if he had had a pistol about him, like Colonel T. C. H. Smith in the Fitz-John Porter case. We have little doubt this witness will turn up before next week. The Times calls this an "unpleasant story," and so it is; but, esteemed contemporary, it is nothing to those which are still coming when the old soldiers get through the haying and have a little leisure. We have not yet reached the first of August. On the other hand, President Hayes, while travelling on the railroad in company with some delegates to the Cincinnati Convention, freely expressed his belief that Hancock was "a noble fellow," and would be his (Mr. Hayes's) successor. General Beauregard, by the way, requests us to say that there is no truth in the "story" to which we recently referred, that he refused an invitation to dine with General Hancock unless the latter hauled down the American flag from over his own door, and that it was hauled down accordingly. General Beauregard says he never was invited to dinner by General Hancock at all. We had suspected as much.

It appears to be true that General Grant has accepted the presidency of a mining company, on the news of which the stock made a magnificent jump from 1⅛ to 3⅝. Most people who either feel grateful to or admire him will be sorry to hear it, for the place is one which can hardly be called becoming, even if it turns out better than places in mining ventures are apt to do. It makes the third-term movement, too, seem more deplorable than ever, because there is little doubt that half the energy expended in pushing it would have induced Congress to make some fitting provision for him during the remainder of his life. It is not by any means creditable to the country that he should have to jostle for either fortune or occupation among the crowd of financial adventurers. A military position with a suitable salary, or better still, if it did not need a Constitutional Amendment to create it, a life-senatorship, is as little as his services entitle him to, and as little as the nation can, with due regard for its own dignity, afford to offer him.

His restlessness, as displayed in his continued travelling about, would seem to indicate that he finds it hard to settle down to purely private life and non-political pursuits. After twenty such years as he has passed it must be difficult to do so, and we fear his supporters are not doing anything to make it easier for him. As a correspondent suggested the other day, a great many of them treat their defeat in Chicago as only temporary, and confidently look forward to seeing him again in the Presidency, and will do their best to keep alive the same expectation in his mind. The fact is they had so good a time when he was in the Presidency, it was so bright, so happy, that they cannot and will not believe that it is gone for ever. So they hang around him and hanker after him like hungry tramps round a butcher's shop, and while away the time by measuring with their eyes the prime cuts in him, and calculating the best mode of making him go round among "the boys" and yet leave something over for the poor.

The mystery as to the intentions of the Grant leaders with regard to the Garfield canvass is not yet dispelled, though the Democrats continue to get a good deal of comfort out of interviews with them, which reveal, if not apathy and indifference, at least a frame of mind which is the reverse of enthusiastic. It is not merely that they are not prospectively pleased with the chance of four years of an Administration headed by a President who secured his nomination through an anti-Grant combination, but that retrospectively the recollection of the last four years of a reform Administration under Mr. Hayes is not agreeable to them. They could hardly have had a milder or more thoroughly sugar-coated dose of reform than Mr. Hayes has given them, but even this has been too much. Mr. Simon Cameron has been relieving his mind on this subject to a Herald reporter, and his remarks are worth noticing—not so much for their inherent importance as for their indicating the condition of mind in which many eminent Republicans now find themselves. Mr. Cameron declares that "Hayes's advisers are a queer lot" and that he "can't see much in them." Mr. Evarts's foreign policy has been "to protect Seward, that consul in China." Evarts, it seems, "held up one side of the coop while Seward crawled out." As to his son's letter, declining to serve as Chairman of the Republican Committee, he was very glad to see it. "Don's" health will not permit him to manage a campaign. "Then, too, why should he? It's not only a tiresome but an expensive business." "I tell you," Mr. Cameron feelingly added, "the Chairman of that Committee has to go down into his own pocket and his friends' very often." The campaign of 1876 "cost my son a pile of money." "Zach" Chandler was, it seems, very close, and funds at one time ran so low that "Hayes was whining for pocket-money," upon which "Don" gave him five thousand dollars "out of his own wallet." As to the reform of the Indian Bureau, what Mr. Cameron wants to know is, "Who says Hayes is reforming any thing?" "If Hancock should get in," he thinks it might be reformed by putting it under the War Department. This does not suggest a "ringing campaign" in Pennsylvania.

We venture to suggest to our esteemed contemporaries who may be in want of subjects of campaign investigation the Milligan case, reported in the fourth volume of Wallace's Supreme Court Reports. Milligan was a "traitor" who was tried by military commission during the war, but within the limits of the State of Indiana, and sentenced to be hanged. That he was a bad man and richly deserved hanging there can be little doubt, but there was a question whether a man could be legally sentenced by a military commission within a jurisdiction in which there were civil courts sitting for trial of crimes and felonies of all kinds. The matter was brought before the Supreme Court at Washington, and many able counsel appeared and made arguments, among others General Garfield, in favor of Milligan. The case attracted much attention at the time, and the decision, which was that habeas corpus ought to issue, was generally regarded as a triumph for civil liberty. It brought to an end all trials by military commissions, and from that time (December, 1866) to this no Democrat has been hung in the United States except after trial according to all the forms of law and a verdict by a jury. The wide-spread criminality prevailing among the Democrats made the decision of the utmost consequence to them, and it is singular to reflect that while it was through General Hancock that Mrs. Surratt was hung, it was partly through the efforts of General Garfield that the practice of hanging Democrats by means of military commissions was brought to an end.

Ever since the Democratic Convention at Cincinnati earnest efforts have been making in this State to unite the two wings of the Democratic party upon a single electoral ticket. The Kellyites from the time of their campaign against Governor Robinson have kept up an independent organization, and their State Committee met last week at Saratoga to see what could be done for "harmony." The resignations of the Kelly electors nominated at Syracuse last April were accepted, and an address drawn up calling upon all Democrats to rally to the support of the party candidates. This address is a stirring appeal. It justifies the revolt of Kelly against the regular organization as having been made against "an unwarrantable and undemocratic attempt to use the power and prestige of a great party for personal ends"; says that it "taught officials" that "the Machine" has no place "in Democratic politics," but that, this lesson having been fully taught, no repetition of it is needed. The nomination of Hancock "has blotted out past alienations by a grand hope," and "the times are resplendent with omens of victory." The action taken in 1879 was forced upon the Kellyites by the fact that "for years there has been a growing tendency in the Republican party, and unfortunately to some extent in our own, to use organizations formed for and devoted to public objects for selfish personal ends." Having corrected this by securing the election of a Republican governor last year, the Kelly faction is willing to go to work with a will now to elect Hancock and English.

The only allusion to silver in Mr. Schurz's speech last week is probably to be found in a hopeful sentence expressing the speaker's belief that "the disagreements still existing upon financial subjects of minor importance" will be solved for the best by the Republican party. There was not, we think, any lack of candor in Mr. Schurz's comparison of the two parties. Nevertheless it is noticeable to what an extent the following account of the Democratic medley is applicable to a not very distant stage of the Republican party also:

"Thus we find there the hardest of hard-money men hand in hand with the wildest of inflationists, the freest of free-traders, and the stiffest of protectionists; we find them in their platforms declaring for the restoration of specie payments to satisfy one part, and the repeal of the Resumption law in the same sentence to satisfy the other part, of the organization. We find men who would scorn the idea of faithlessness to our national obligations in the closest alliance and co-operation with those who repudiated their debts in their own States, and who would not hesitate a moment to repudiate the debts of the Republic. . . . And it must not be forgotten that upon these different elements the official declarations of platforms have not the least effect."

An official statement of the foreign trade of the whole United States for the year ending June 30 shows that the total imports were valued at $667,885,565 and the total exports at $835,793,924. This largely exceeds the figures of any year in the history of the country. During the last half of the year there was a reaction from the extreme speculative activity which had characterized every branch of business. Within the last few weeks, and notably during the last week, there have been many indications of a return to activity and higher prices. In the trade markets the demand for consumption appears to have again overtaken the supply, and the natural result is advancing prices. Aside from this perfectly legitimate reason for a recovery from the downward reaction, the extreme ease of the money market bids fair to breed further speculation. The New York banks still hold a surplus reserve of more than $16,500,000, although the Treasury is taking in money very rapidly and is not paying it out, the Secretary having for the present deferred bond purchases for the Sinking Fund. Foreign exchange has fallen so near to the gold-importing point that several lots of cheap bar-gold, aggregating about $1,600,000, have been bought in London and Paris for New York, and are likely to be the forerunners of an important movement which is expected to begin in the early future. It is now tolerably certain that the crops throughout the country will be unprecedented in amount. At the Produce Exchange there are those who calculate on a crop of 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 1,800,000,000 to 2,000,000,000 bushels of corn, while at the Cotton Exchange well-informed speculators are betting on a cotton crop of 6,250,000 bales. These figures largely exceed anything on record. Railroad earnings continue to show an increase over the large receipts of a year ago. While there are these substantial factors for successful trade, credits are far from being unduly expanded. At the Stock Exchange it has been a week of advancing prices and, in the speculative share list, buoyancy. United States 4 per cent. bonds advanced to 109⅜, which, considering that they carry less than one month's interest, is the highest point ever reached for the Government credit. In London these bonds are at 112½, and the 4½'s at 114½.

General Weaver and his arithmetical friends have been for some time showing that the Greenback vote will cause a non-election of President by the people, and that the small knot of Greenbackers in the House of Representatives, of which the Rev. Mr. De La Matyr is a leading figure, will be able to control the vote there in favor of their candidate. It seems not improbable that in the popular vote more disturbance will be caused by the Greenback element than is now commonly anticipated, and perhaps this will first appear to be the case in Mr. De La Matyr's own State. This gentleman is desirous of retaining his seat in Congress, and it was supposed that a bargain had been struck with the "Nationals" by which they were to support the Democratic candidate in the Ninth District in return for the Democrats "endorsing" De La Matyr in his own. But the endorsement has been withheld, and a straight and not very strong nomination has been made by the Democrats. The Nationals are expected to wreak their revenge on Landers, the Democratic candidate for Governor. The fear of an October disaster has given rise to the rumor that the Governor means to call an extra session of the Legislature in order to submit the constitutional amendments anew to the people. It would be strange if the Republicans, under these circumstances, should not be found voting against them.

It is evident that the personal courage of the Greenback Presidential candidate is equal to his confidence, as he is now engaged in making an active canvass of Alabama, which, it is well known, is a procedure attended by great peril in the case of any but a Democrat, and a regular Democrat at that, the State being, next to Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina, perhaps the most completely given over to White Leaguers of any in the South. He has induced Mr. J. L. Pickens, who is described as "a veteran and fearless politician," to become a candidate for Governor, and the two are carrying on what is called an aggressive campaign. Mr. Pickens, in his letter announcing his candidacy, boldly tells the Democrats of Alabama that they have trampled the rights and liberties of the people under their feet and rendered the elective franchise a mockery. So far neither he nor General Weaver has been shot at or in any way molested, which could be easily understood if the bands of intimidators regarded their canvass as futile; but they are, on the contrary, described as being "both irritated and alarmed," and it is difficult to understand their pusillanimity in merely replying to the Greenback leaders by quoting from Weaver's letter of acceptance his favorable references to Abraham Lincoln and Thaddeus Stevens. This indicates a primitive notion of the province of discussion, but it is certainly a very mild form of intimidation, and argues that even Republican orators might find a Southern stumping tour less dangerous than it is often considered.

The news from Afghanistan is highly important. Abdurrahman Khan, a nephew of Shir Ali, has been acknowledged as Amir both by the Kabulese and the British. In his younger years Abdurrahman fought against his uncle for the Afghan throne, and after 1868 lived in exile in Samarcand, under the protection and patronage of the Russians, who in an emergency expected to make him their tool against Shir Ali. During the troublous time which followed the successive overthrows of Shir Ali and his son Yakub Khan, in 1879, he received permission to go to Khokan, and soon after, in the winter of 1880, appeared in Afghan Turkestan, and gradually made himself master of a large portion of that country, as claimant for the succession to Yakub Khan. There were various other claimants, among them Yakub Khan's infant son, Musa, in whom, however, the Government of India could see no guaranty of stability after the withdrawal of the British forces from Kabul. Abdurrahman, though originally appearing on the northern borders of the Hindu Kush as a natural enemy of the British invaders and protégé of Russia, soon showed himself accessible to negotiations fully compatible with "British interests." Lord Lytton began, and his successor, Earl Ripon, continued them. Abdurrahman was allowed to cross the Hindu Kush, and advance with a small force to Charikar, in Kohistan. Near this place he was met by a deputation of sirdars, who informed him of the British terms of agreement. These he accepted, knowing that only the active support of the Indian Government could place and keep him on the throne. A great durbar was then held at Kabul on July 22, attended by sirdars and Afghan gentlemen, by delegates from Abdurrahman and many British officers. Of these, Mr. Griffin acknowledged Abdurrahman as Amir, in the name of the Empress and the Viceroy of India. Many of Yakub Khan's adherents declared their adhesion. A formal proclamation followed, Abdurrahman's name being solemnly recited in the mosques. Harmony and satisfaction seemed to prevail in Kabul, which is shortly to be evacuated by the invaders.

Of the nature of the agreement, Lord Hartington, Secretary for India, has given a lengthy explanation in the House of Commons. "No formal engagement has been entered into with Abdurrahman Khan. He has simply been recognized as Amir of Kabul"—not of all Afghanistan. He "has been informed that no negotiations can be entered into as yet, respecting Kandahar or the districts named in the treaty of Gandamak." To Herat no reference is made in the abstract. It is probable that the British Government means to keep "the districts"—or most of them—to protect Kandahar as an independent state, and to help its Wali or the Amir of Kabul in conquering Herat. "No foreign minister or foreign interference will be allowed at Kabul." This, if verbally correct, is a distinct declaration that another Russian mission to Kabul, such as was Stolietoff's in 1878, will lead to another invasion of Afghanistan—under Gladstone's auspices. "Temporary assistance is promised the Amir" against rivals, fanatical enemies of the English, or sirdars bent on independence. "He will not be asked to receive a British mission, but a Mohammedan envoy will be sent to Kabul on behalf of India." This arrangement is obviously intended to prevent another Cavagnari massacre, the mob of Kabul being expected to be less ferocious towards Moslem than towards Christian representatives of the Empress. "It is hoped the troops will soon be able to retire, handing over the city to the Amir"—not the whole country, a portion of the troops being just now engaged in fighting Ayub Khan of Herat, whose forces, operating against Kandahar, have reached the Hilmend, above Girishk. Nor are "the arrangements for the retirement of troops altogether contingent upon the proceedings of Abdurrahman Khan or the people of Afghanistan." "The uncertainty of Afghan politics," Lord Hartington candidly admits, "is so great that it is impossible to feel that all our troubles there are ended"—a real foreboding, in view of the latest news that Gen. Burrowes's brigade has been "annihilated" at Kandahar, and that the remainder of the garrison, under General Primrose, has retreated into the citadel.

Considering the number of lives which have been sacrificed on both sides, the amount of suffering inflicted, a large part of it on helpless women and children, by the destruction of their villages, and considering that the war proves to have cost up to the present $75,000,000, instead of about $15,000,000, there is something worse than melancholy in the news that the principal object of the war—the forcing of British envoys on the Amir—has been abandoned. Abdurrahman Khan is not to be asked to receive one. But the work of slaughter seems to go on, in spite of the fact that peace is certain. Wherever a party of armed Afghans get together, which they are sure to do frequently as long as the invaders remain in the country, the British cavalry goes out and charges and sabres them. Two hundred out of a mob of eight hundred were slain in this way the other day, the only possible result being to make the survivors hate the British name more cordially than ever.

The advent of the Liberal Ministry has, as was expected, at last compelled Dean Stanley to give up the scheme of setting up a monument in Westminster Abbey to the late Prince Imperial. As soon as Mr. Gladstone came into power the opposition to it became stronger and more active, but was confined to public meetings and articles in the newspapers, and it was hoped that, as agitation about a tomb is an unseemly thing, the Dean would see the desirableness of not insisting on burying any one in the Abbey, and especially any foreigner, in the teeth of any respectable opposition whatever. He stuck to his project, however, with a curious and somewhat petulant obstinacy, and then, as a last resource, the subject was brought before the House of Commons, which passed a resolution condemning the erection of the monument. Before this the Dean has given way, in a letter, the text of which has not reached us, but which the London correspondent of the Tribune says is "unworthy of him and disrespectful to Parliament." The monument will now be put up in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, an appropriate place enough. The affair has probably been more trying to the Dean as a courtier than the outside world imagine, but his mistake was in ever giving it any countenance whatever. That he did so was undoubtedly due, as we remarked, to the prevalence of the Imperialist atmosphere at the time, and the unconcealed contempt of society in London for Liberal opinions or prejudices.

The text of the Collective Note delivered to the Porte by the ambassadors of the Powers at Constantinople and Athens contains nothing not already known. It simply informs the Sultan that they have traced out a new frontier line between Turkey and Greece and describes it. The Porte has constructed a reply not yet presented, declaring, it is said, the acceptance of the line impossible and denying that the Conference had any power to arbitrate. The Turks are actively preparing for war, relying on their ability with the help of the Albanians to make short work of the thirty-five thousand men which are all that Greece can put into the field, but more than all on the inability of the Powers to agree on any plan of active interference. This last expectation, however, seems likely to be disappointed. The British Foreign Secretary has announced positively that concerted action looking towards coercion has been settled, although its precise nature could not yet be made public. It is all but certain that it will consist in a naval demonstration, which to be effective must be prepared to force the Dardanelles. That there will be risings in Rumelia and Macedonia in case any armed pressure is brought to bear on the Porte is now generally expected. The Bulgarians, both in Bulgaria and Rumelia, have been arming rapidly, and Russian officers have been passing into the country in considerable numbers. That they look in both provinces to a speedy reunion, or, in other words, to the practical execution of the Treaty of San Stefano, is now generally conceded.

THE SOUTHERN QUESTION IN THE CANVASS.

THE net purport of the thoughtful and entertaining work of Judge Tourgee entitled 'A Fool's Errand' is, that the work of reconstruction after the close of the war was wrongly conceived, and that all the turmoil, confusion, and bloodshed that have ensued are chargeable upon the leaders of the Republican party, who had not the sagacity and nerve to follow up the victory of arms by establishing military governments in the conquered districts until such time as society could reconstruct itself upon principles of political justice and equality. The removal of the pressure of force, he shows, was followed by the revival of every idea on which the Southern whites had been bred during two hundred years, and just in proportion as the force was lessened these ideas were carried into practice. The establishment of negro suffrage was regarded by the whites as having been put upon them not as an act of justice, not even as a means of ensuring the supremacy of the Republican party in national elections, but solely in order to humiliate them in the eyes of the world and in their own eyes. This needless and superfluous indignity, as they esteemed it, roused bitter resentment, and they resolved to circumvent negro suffrage at all hazards. Hence arose the Ku-klux Klan with its barbarities, and hence the milder forms of intimidation which now prevail. It is the author's judgment that the Southern whites will surely have their own way on this point; that the present generation will never admit that the colored men are their political equals, and that there is not enough force (that is, political force) in the North to execute reconstruction in the spirit in which it was conceived. The fatal mistake having been made of treating the South as States of the Union instead of conquered territory, and its people as political integers instead of prisoners of war, it is no longer possible, considering the form of our Government and the balance of political parties and the temper of both sections, to prevent the Southern whites from being the masters of every Southern State, whatever be the numbers of the colored voters therein. In short, however the Northern heart may be fired, however vigorously the "bloody shirt" may be waved, the end will be the same—the negroes will be allowed to vote, and their votes will be returned and counted, only so far as they vote in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the whites; or if there be any exceptions to this rule, they will be such as it suits the purposes of the whites to allow, and will only serve to prove the rule.

All this seems highly detestable at the North, and the Republican party holds it to be necessary to overcome and break down this unreasonable prejudice, and to provide, as Gen. Garfield declares in his letter of acceptance, "that every elector shall be permitted, freely and without intimidation, to cast his lawful ballot at such election, and have it honestly counted, and that the potency of his vote shall not be destroyed by the fraudulent vote of any other person." This is what Judge Tourgee, after much reflection and experience in the midst of the White Leaguers, tells us cannot now be done, although it ought to have been done, and might have been done if a different policy had prevailed when the work of reconstruction was commenced. The Southern question to-day is a dispute upon this point. Gen. Garfield and those who agree with him—that is, the great majority of the Republican party—insist that the blacks shall not be intimidated. The Democrats deny the intimidation, and demand that the Government shall leave the Southern States as well as the Northern to manage their elections in their own way. The controversy respecting troops at the polls and the appointment of deputy-marshals as supervisors of elections has its foundation here. It is needless to add that the Democrats made a great mistake in raising an issue in Congress upon this question, since it was the sole issue upon which the Republicans were likely to be united and victorious. The troops were too few to exercise any appreciable influence upon the elections, as was proved in Louisiana in 1876. President Hayes had come to the wise conclusion that even these few ought to be withdrawn; and as for the deputy-marshals, they would have proved as impotent in the future to bring the intimidated out of their hiding-places, and make good voters of them, as in the past.

We have no doubt that intimidation of colored voters is the rule and the absence of it the exception in the Gulf States, that it prevails largely elsewhere, and that it prevails to the greatest extent and is most effective in those places where the colored population is most numerous in proportion to the whole. But we can see no remedy for such a condition of things which does not begin by infusing courage into the intimidated class. A remedy which provides merely that the colored voter shall be protected in the act of voting is no remedy at all. What he fears is not merely that his vote will be refused, or that he will suffer violence in the act of casting it, but that he will be made to suffer subsequently. To reach and cure this species of intimidation he must not only be protected at the polls, but provided with a body-guard till the next election. This is obviously impossible, but nothing short of it will accomplish what the Republican party insists upon. Intimidation is a disease on the part of the intimidated as well as a crime on the part of the intimidators. It is true that if the crime were made impossible the disease would cease to exist, but if the disease itself were eradicated the crime would cease to exist. If the native population of Texas should attempt to intimidate their neighbors of German birth and descent, they would find it impossible to do so. It is because the colored people are naturally born to fears, because the stripes of slavery are still remembered, that they are the subjects of intimidation. No person or class liable to be intimidated, bribed, or cajoled can be counted as having any political opinions. All such persons are worthless as political factors. Any attempt to make them valuable to the state as part of its governing force must work upon the voter's character as well as his surroundings. Hence it is an indispensable part of the task which Gen. Garfield assigns to himself and to the Republican party—viz., "that every elector shall be permitted, freely and without intimidation, to cast his lawful ballot"—to take steps to improve the colored man's courage. Any plan which seeks to cure intimidation without curing the timidity upon which it works, will prove a failure.

The most rational means for curing timidity is to show the colored voter that he has numerous and powerful friends interested in his welfare, and the only practicable method of bringing this knowledge to him is, as we urged last week, to send Northern speakers of repute to the South to take part in the present and future political campaigns. There is one other reason for such a course which must not be overlooked. The Republican party has in the Chicago platform, and General Garfield has in his letter of acceptance, approved, if not adopted, the theory that all races are not equally fit to live under the American system of government. They have acknowledged that particular habits, traditions, and mental and moral conditions may make large bodies of men dangerous to the Republic. Their attitude towards the Chinese question does, there is no doubt, give some countenance to the unwillingness of Southerners to accept the rule of negro majorities. In asking them to accept it, we are asking them to face without fear a problem which no Northern State has ever been called on to face, and which we have no doubt none of them would face with equanimity or in a spirit of strict legality. We have no right, therefore, to treat the South Carolina and Mississippi dread of the kind of government the negroes would set up, if let alone, as utterly baseless or unreasonable. We all know we should be greatly alarmed by the prospect of anything of the kind in Massachusetts or New York or California. We are bound, therefore, to do something (and nothing whatever has yet been done) to bring Northern opinion to bear directly on the negro voters, in the form of instruction and advice from the lips of Northern men whom they will respect and trust, as to the conditions of social and political prosperity. We owe this to the Southern whites, on whom we have forced the solution of a difficulty which has as yet nowhere been solved, and in the solution of which we take no direct share. We owe it also to the negroes, whom we have saddled with responsibilities such as only the foremost races of the world have hitherto been called on to bear, and which no race but the negro has yet assumed without demanding them, striving for them, and, if need be, seizing them with the strong hand. The very least we can do for both whites and blacks, therefore, is to send down some of our best speakers to tell them to their faces in what manner we think they can get out of the very serious fix in which we have placed them. Our newspapers do not reach them; neither do our orators when they speak on Northern soil. The fittest place to debate the Southern question is, in fact, the South.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE IRISH COMPENSATION BILL.

THE passage of the Irish Land Compensation Bill has furnished a good test of the real hold of Mr. Gladstone on the present House of Commons. He could hardly have offered the Whig wing of his party a more trying dose. Having swallowed it they will find any demands on their fidelity which are still to come comparatively easy. But it is probably as such a test that the bill is now most interesting, for there is not the least chance of its passage in the House of Lords, and its defeat there so near the close of the session would be the last of it for the present. Having passed by a good majority in the Lower House, if it should be defeated by a large majority in the Upper House, as is probable, the effect on the temper of the Radical wing of the Liberal party, both in and out of the House, is likely to be very aggravating, and to stimulate that hostility to the Lords which is one of its principal characteristics. The plea that the Lords are acting as the defenders of property and of vested rights in general will hardly have much weight under such circumstances, because it is useless to maintain that the House of Commons as at present composed is indifferent to the rights of property. In fact, one of the reproaches now most frequently made against it by the Radicals is that it is an assembly of plutocrats. The great majority of the members are either men of considerable wealth, or are the sons or brothers of men of considerable wealth. Any measure which it sanctions by a large majority will, therefore, not be viewed by any considerable portion of the party as really dangerous to property in general. The resistance of the Lords will be treated simply as resistance to interference, not with the rights of property-holders in general, but with the privileges of the owners of one particular species of property, viz., property in land, and the Lords can assume no position more dangerous to their own order as a branch of the legislature than that of defenders of privileges as against the poor.

The weak point in the case of those who oppose the bill as an attack on property analogous to a stay law directed against all creditors, lies in the fact that landed proprietors now enjoy, and have always enjoyed, an exceptional position both as owners and creditors. For instance, the landlord is in England and Ireland the only creditor who, in claiming rent, is not obliged to prove his debt in court, and obtain a legal judgment to enable him to levy on the debtor's goods. He has the power when the rent becomes overdue to enter on the tenant's land with his own bailiff and distrain everything movable he finds on it, no matter to whom it belongs, even the cattle of a man who may have hired grazing of the tenant. In fact, we believe in a recent case the courts refused relief to the owner of cattle which were merely trespassing when seized by the landlord. This exemption from the necessity of seeking satisfaction for a money-claim through the courts is probably the most remarkable relic of mediæval usage now existing in any European country, and yet it is only one of the anomalies which are now likely to deprive the landlords of the benefit of the undoubted tenderness for property which is one of the most marked characteristics of English opinion. The facilities the law has hitherto given for preserving game, at whatever cost to the tenant or hardship or temptation to the poor, is another. The annexation of such rights to the possession of any other species of property—consols, for instance—would be deemed monstrous. But the most serious of all is the great political influence and authority which the ownership of land has hitherto carried with it. The county government in England and Ireland—we cannot speak with certainty about Scotland—has hitherto been in the main lodged in the hands of the chief landowners, as lord-lieutenants, sheriffs, and justices of the peace, in complete independence of popular feeling or opinion; and no claim for participation in this duty on the ground of possession of any other kind of property than land, has ever received any recognition. All great property-holders have been in the habit of "intimidating" their dependents into voting their way at elections, though since the adoption of the ballot and the transfer of the trial of election-petitions to the judges there is much less of this than formerly. But the number of a landlord's dependents is much greater than that of any other rich man's, and he is the only rich man who has the power of imposing his will on any considerable body of persons by turning them out of house and home. Consequently his interference in politics has taken an unusually conspicuous and, to the Radicals, obnoxious form.

For these reasons, and we might add many others of a less tangible character, the attack on property in land, which Mr. Gladstone's bill undoubtedly is, is not likely to spread serious alarm outside the land-holding class, or to give the opposition of the Lords the character of resistance on the part of the Haves in general to the encroachments of the Have-nots, which is the only thing that could make the overwhelming defeat of the bill in the Upper House a safe occurrence for the peers. The authority of this House has been steadily declining since the passage of the Reform Bill, both owing to the loss of the greater portion of the power previously possessed by it over the composition of the House of Commons, and to the steady loss of interest on the part of the peers in legislative work. In fact, the initiation of important legislation in the Upper House has for more than a generation been a very rare thing, and the cases in which it has ventured to make important amendments in measures sent up from the Commons almost as rare. But perhaps nothing has done so much of late years to diminish its prestige, and weaken its hold as an institution on the popular sentiment, as the growing identification of the peers with what is called "the pleasure class" in society. The fact that the late Premier and Foreign Secretary sat in the House of Lords, gave it during the last three years of the Beaconsfield ministry a more businesslike air, and made it the scene of more interesting debates, than for a long while before. With the triumph of the Liberals, and the transfer of the seat of government, if we may use the term, to the House of Commons, the peers have gone back very much to their previous position of what is called "leaders of society"—that is, active promoters of the amusements of the wealthy of both sexes. The insignificance of the dukes in any other sphere than that of amusement has for some time been one of the standing jokes of the British press. Those of whom the public hears much of late years have generally been triflers and sporting men. They race horses; they drive four-in-hand; they yacht; they roam the world in search of good shooting and fishing; one of them has been very remarkable as a diligent attendant at London fires; another is mainly occupied with Catholic miracles and pilgrimages. The members of the lower orders of the peerage are not, as a whole, much better known for devotion to serious pursuits. What they lead in is the discovery and promotion of new modes of killing time, which has now become, we may almost say without exaggeration, the most absorbing interest of a large proportion of the wealthier members of British society. There is in England to-day an ardor and ingenuity in pleasure-seeking amongst this class such as the modern world has probably never seen. In fact, they have made pleasure a kind of business or profession, with various branches to which men of different tastes devote themselves or "go in," as the slang phrase is, with all their powers both of mind and body. This tendency or passion has been immensely and, it must be confessed, most unfortunately stimulated by the Prince of Wales, whose influence has undoubtedly done much to make serious business of any kind unfashionable with rich men and women, and to give a sort of dignity to mere trifling. His "set" is probably unrivalled in its diligence and success in the pursuit of mere pleasure in and out of doors, and in giving life the air of a long holiday.

The temper of democracy was, however, never less tolerant of the right of wealth to amuse itself than it is just now. The right of the rich man to pass all his time in play was probably far more freely acknowledged in France just before the Revolution than it is in England at this moment. There could hardly be a greater misfortune for the British aristocracy than to be led in society, at a time when the world is so profoundly moved by the idea of the community in rights and interests of all classes, by an heir-apparent to whom fun is more welcome than affairs. A hard-working king of the Prussian type, fond either of war or politics, and with that happy sense of being a salaried servant of the state which the Hohenzollerns, with all their faith in their divine right, have managed to retain in remarkable efficiency, would probably have done much to give the House of Lords a new lease of life. For nothing is more certain than that the idea which is gaining force in politics most rapidly, is the idea that wealth shall not lessen but increase the weight of a man's social burdens; that nothing shall exempt any one from contributing by the labor either of mind or body to making life easier and more wholesome for all who dwell under the laws by which he and his fortune, be it great or small, are protected.

PHILOSOPHY AT CONCORD.

CONCORD, July 21, 1880.

THIS is happily one of the New England towns that may yet be called a village—happily or sadly, for the day of these is passing so swiftly that one breathes the repose of the ancient streets with a thought of regret; even the great elms claim an interest that is half-compassionate. It would seem ridiculous to continue the style peculiar to pretentious domestic architecture fifty years ago, a combination of Greek temple and green blinds, and I do not know that townspeople can any longer be expected to let the grass grow in their door-yards, contesting the neglected ground with hollyhocks and peonies; nevertheless, the eye is sadly pained by the invasion of brick blocks among the elms, and even Queen Anne's cheerful progeny hold their ground with a certain tentativeness. The Summer School of Philosophy recently begun in this village is sufficiently allied with the past, however—the past of Concord in especial—to blend well with the elms and the visible tradition of the quiet streets. The philosophers, so the assembled strangers are known, take their way decorously by Mr. Emerson's house and along the Lexington road to the Alcott chapel, which lies snugly under the very hill where Septimius Felton, pacing the crest, meditated his elixir of life, that rosy and fatal liquid. As the School is now in the second session and has advanced upon the attainment of last year in some other respects, perhaps, than the matter of numbers—at least, the management has had the opportunity to substitute experience for conjecture in ordering its plans—it is fair to regard the institution as showing itself for what it is.

The philosophical substance of the School is woven of three strands which should be essentially distinct, except to the metalogical courtesies of remark after debate: these strands are Hegelianism, Mysticism, and Platonism. They are woven with a distinct implication of Theism, often of Christianity, but there is much divergent liberality of sentiment notwithstanding. The most dogmatic attitude of the School is towards science, especially towards empiricism; by dogmatic I mean, for instance, the habit of contemptuous reference unsupported by evidence, a common method of comment in this direction twenty-five years ago, but which now has no other aspect than one of extreme staleness. Every one should be aware by this time of the larger amenities of the intellect radiating from the centres of thought, aware that the opposing systems of knowledge are learning to regard each other with a good-humored if not often an appreciative tolerance. One instinctively doubts the substantial greatness of any system of philosophy which has bad names for its neighbors; Philosophy, the most comprehensive and lofty knowledge of things, will at its truest pitch certainly see the inner error of lesser systems as well as the veracity of its own, and this vision of error, the sad blind groping for the truth, the waste of precious life, is one that in the mind made large and charitable by high insight should be, one imagines, a motion to pity or even a foundation in discipline. In an authorized foresketch of the present session the statement appears that "the whole field of empirical and phenomenal investigation will be left for those who have a taste for it," which is well enough, quite well enough in fact; but the intelligent friends of the school can only with regret hear from the lecture-chair sentences such as "Honor to the physicist is nothing, no microscope reveals it, no balance turns with it," or "The blood of science is water, the blood of philosophy is the wine of life." On the other side it is fair to say—premising, somewhat in explanation, that the various utterances regarding the likes, the dislikes, the purposes, and the hopes of the School are distinctively non-Leibnitzian in their freedom from pre-established harmony—to say that one name was considered for the this-year faculty which would have added to it, had acceptance been feasible, the power of the best modern criticists in the line of Kant, Renouvier, and Hodgson. This implies considerable elasticity, and still more was implied in the mention, merely as a hope, of the name of one who has been compelled to leave the largest and most liberal universities of this country for England, there to find an avenue for fine capacities as thinker and lecturer.

To return to philosophy. The Hegelian side is presented by Mr. W. T. Harris, editor of the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, the mention of whose name in this connection quite disestablishes the office of criticism; undoubtedly there is no one in this country with so skilful and delicate an expository touch for the great German, or more minutely and sympathetically familiar with the ground of his labor. The sweep of Hegelianism no one who has ever talked with its disciples will underestimate, or the tremendous explanatory solvency of its methods; in this latter it has the remaining philosophies greatly at a disadvantage, since they have pursued the eternally fugitive Explanation, the permanent possibility of an answer, in a foreign way, while Hegelianism boldly built its house over the nomad, making it a permanent guest, for ever to be seen at the windows. A meeting ground for Hegelianism and Mysticism is not immediately evident, unless it fall from their common possession of the transcendental mark; but one is logical, the other emotional, transcendentalism. Their relation is more properly complementary; in any event, both have enough organic elasticity to prevent any jar of contact. Mysticism in the School is heard in five lectures from Mr. Alcott upon representative mystics, and a series from Rev. Mr. Channing on the oriental and mystical philosophy. Dr. Jones successfully expounds the Platonic philosophy.

The immediate thought in the philosophical public, hearing again of propagandism at Concord, will be of transcendentalism; many would rejoice at an announcement of its rejuvenation—those, that is, who do not claim perpetual juvenescence for "this southern slope of the mind"; many will be interested to know whether transcendentalism can ever again become pronouncedly efficient, waking from the condition of diffusive or merely leavening action in the world of thought and belief which President Eliot and Dr. Holmes in their addresses of last Anniversary Week mentioned as the greater though less evident contribution of Unitarianism to progress. There is nothing at present in Concord to warrant a consistent hope in this direction. Quite on the other hand, the resistant conditions which gave the movement of forty years ago an animating, and by contrast illustrative, opposition have evidently vanished. New England no longer is so audibly Puritanical as to oppress the sensitive ear; there only lingers an undertone, somewhat stern and grand, which we may hope will endure; nor is the intellectual situation as naïve as when, so one may imagine, volumes of Fichte and Schelling passed with a look from hand to hand. The present trouble of the nation and the individual is less an unrealized capital than the difficulty of wisely directing what is already in possession. The time of revelling in the general situation is passed, and though "every soul" continues to have "an open sea-front," there presses for attention under the acute activities of these days the large inland territory, fertile to effort and surely degenerative under neglect.

In the matter of transcendentalism, therefore, the interest of the School is, at most, local, biographical, and reminiscent; and this to the sympathetic mind, which on such ground can hardly fail any one, is sufficient. It makes memorable days to sit in an audience of which Emerson is one, to see and hear men who knew Thoreau and Hawthorne and John Brown and the young man Alcott in the days of the Dial, and to observe the generous faith still alive, in many cases happily ameliorated from the early exclusiveness that appropriated all lofty conviction and insight to its own belief. One hears Mr. Channing's words as the voice of available enthusiasm, in line with recent science and criticism, and reflects that if the world cannot immediately be purified, at least the password to the ideal is being kept for the future. So the revival of philosophy as a summer school in Concord is sober, earnest, and informed; standing fully apart from the two shallow sensationalisms at present the greatest misfortunes of national thought—I mean the raw atheistic movement of the Mississippi Valley, which is characterized by pride of destructiveness rather than the sober poise of enquiry; and further east, in the (it is said) most cultivated city of the country, the histrionic exhibition of dogmatic theology wedded to pseudo-science. It would be a mistake of generosity to find in the pleasant five weeks' school of Mr. Alcott and Mr. Harris any sufficient counteractive for these two sensationalisms, but the little audiences that disperse meditatively from the lecture-room door down the shady streets—the Concord streets are very considerate to the meditative mood—must feel that what is being done here is being done in the right direction.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—II.

THE TIMES.

LONDON, Thursday, July 16, 1880.

THE Times, if it is so disposed, will shortly be in a condition to celebrate its centenary. Its existence under the name which it now bears dates from the year 1788. But the name is not so old as the newspaper, which was started in 1785 under the cumbrous title of the Daily Universal Register, rather, as it would seem, as an experiment in what is called logographic printing than as a purely journalistic speculation. Logographic printing failed. It still has its devotees—unhappy men who pass through life burdened with the hope of success, which, like Shelley's passion, is too like despair for patience to smother. There are inventors and contrivers who still expect, after nearly a hundred years since the first attempt, to make something of it, and possibly they may do so, for the benefit of others. The logographic experiment of the first Mr. Walter failed, but the newspaper of which it was the vehicle became what all the world knows. It bore its title of the Daily Universal Register for three years only, and then the name was formally withdrawn in a prefatory address of a character illustrative of what was considered in those days to be humorous and polite writing. The first Mr. Walter, the aboriginal—for there have been three John Walters, as there have been three John Murrays, and, titularly, three Napoleons—complained that the Daily Universal Register was always getting mixed up with other publications. Coffee-house politicians asked for it by the last word of its complex title, and they found that all sorts of other Registers were put into their hands—the Court and City Register, the old Annual Register, the New Annual Register, and even Harris's Register of Ladies. To remedy this confusion the name was changed, and the Daily Universal Register became the Times. Mr. Walter plumed himself on having found a monosyllabic title, much as the late Mr. T. W. Robertson delighted in doing in the case of his plays. The considerations by which the name is justified seem almost prophetic. "The Times," Mr. Walter writes, "what a monstrous name! Granted, for Times is a many-headed monster that speaks with a hundred tongues and displays a thousand characteristics, and, in the course of its transitions in life, assumes innumerable shapes and humors." "The Times," he goes on to say, "being formed of and possessing qualities of opposite and heterogeneous natures, cannot be classed either with the animal or vegetable genus, but, like the Polypus, is doubtful, and"—the transition from metaphor to fact is rather abrupt—"in the discussion, description, and illustration will employ the pens of the most celebrated among literati." The following also might seem to be prophetic: "The political head of the Times, like that of Janus, the Roman deity, is double-faced." The explanation, however, shows that the duplicity avowed was not of the character which is sometimes thought to be illustrated in its subsequent career. "With one countenance," we are told, "it will smile continually on the friends of England, and with the other will frown incessantly on her enemies."

There have been, as we have said, three Walters who have presided over the destinies of the Times, and the number of the editors has not been much more considerable. The first of them was Dr. (afterwards Sir) John Stoddart, who will be best remembered as the Dr. Slop of Moore's satiric verses, although he had his own claims to literary distinction as the brother-in-law of Hazlitt. His fierce anti-Bonapartism brought his connection with the Times to a close, and he made an attempt, which had a certain literary but not the requisite commercial success, to establish a rival to the journal which he quitted, under the designation of the New Times. His successor was Thomas Barnes, the friend at Christ's Hospital of Charles Lamb, and a man celebrated for his scholarship and his tact, and for a certain bitterness of expression which did injustice to his really fine qualities of mind and character. He was described as "the best good man with the worst-natured tongue." It was under him that the Times achieved the position which it has since maintained, notwithstanding some mishaps and threatenings of decline, among the newspapers of the world. Barnes is said to have possessed in an unusual degree the art of imposing a certain aspect of unity and consistency on the deliberate self-contradiction and apostasies of the journal which he conducted. On his death the editorial chair fell to Captain Edward Sterling, the father of John Sterling, whose life Carlyle has written, and in commemorating the son has contributed also to draw aside the veil which hid the mysterious personality of the "Thunderer" of those days. Carlyle's portraiture of Sterling the elder is a description, as he himself proclaims, of the Times. "There is not," he writes, "a faculty of improvising equal to his in all my circle. Sterling rushes out into London society, rolls about all day, copiously talking modish nonsense or sense, and listening to the like, with a multifarious miscellany of men, comes home at night, redacts it into a Times' leader, and is found to have hit the essential purport of the world's immeasurable babblement that day. This was what the multifarious Babel sound did mean to say in clear words—this more nearly than anything else."

To Sterling succeeded Mr. Delane, who, within the memory of living men, was always considered to be the Times itself. His method was also Sterling's method—of mixing in society, gathering up the prevailing sentiment, and giving it articulate expression and coherence. It is a tribute to Mr. Delane's sagacity and skill as an editor that the decline of the Times, perhaps only a temporary decline, dated from his break-down in physical and mental health. In his best days he had the art of selecting the best writers for journalistic purposes, and finding them their proper materials and putting them to their proper work. He did not himself hold the pen, but he guided the hands which held it. The question whether the editor of a great newspaper should himself write is perhaps incapable of any single and simple answer. It is not possible to say distinctly and positively either "yes" or "no." Much, of course, depends upon the man and upon the circumstances. The editor who does not write is not very likely to be as exactly informed on questions of current politics as one who does. The inducement or the necessity to acquire a precise knowledge of economical or political arguments, of legal and diplomatic niceties, of geographical and historical details, does not press on him if he holds himself entirely exempt from the necessity of writing. He will pick up his opinions from the views prevalent in the society in which he moves, and leave it to his contributors to find arguments and knowledge in support of them. In Mr. Delane's case this want of general, and still more of special, knowledge, often led him into serious blunders. In many cases it is necessary yourself to know in order to be able to pick out the man who knows, and Mr. Delane's ignorance occasionally put him at the mercy of the ignorance of others. Many notable blunders were committed during his editorship of the Times. Perhaps the most celebrated of them was the publication of a leading article commemorating the supposed fact that Prussia had joined the Zollverein. An article announcing that Massachusetts had joined the American Union, or that England had been annexed to the United Kingdom, would scarcely have confounded in a more ludicrous manner the notorious facts of history. Prussia, as everybody but Mr. Delane and his contributor knew, had really formed the Zollverein or German Customs-Union, and the other states which entered in simply joined themselves to her. On the other hand, the editor who does not write is more likely to avoid being drawn into extreme partisanship than one who does. A man is sometimes a slave to his own knowledge, and he is never so obstinately convinced as when he is a convert to his own arguments. He is like a general who himself would engage in the heat and fury of personal conflict, instead of standing aloof and coolly directing the operations of the army which he commands. He is likely to be carried away by a false sense of consistency. He may object to unsaying on Tuesday what he has said on Monday, but he has not so strong an objection to letting B. contradict on Tuesday what A. has said on Monday. He is not likely to keep so vigilant an eye over his own indiscretions as over those of a contributor. He is reluctant to sacrifice what may be an imprudent cleverness or a poignant criticism of his own, whereas he would have no scruple at striking out the dangerous brilliancies of another's pen. If he himself writes he is apt to lose his sense of the relative proportion of topics, and to fancy that the public is interested to the same extent as himself in subjects in which he has succeeded in strongly interesting himself. In a word, he does not sit loose enough to the topics of the day to be able to look at them with that eye of the general reader which ought to be a species of second-sight in an editor. Mr. Delane had this gift during all except the closing years of his career in an eminent degree, and it more than compensated for the mistakes, which furnished nine hours' talk, into which his insufficient knowledge occasionally betrayed him. It was said of the Times that it had 365 opinions in the year on every subject; but the opinion of each day reflected the prevalent popular impression of that day, and was forgotten when the impression changed, to be as faithfully reflected by the opinion which followed it.

On Mr. Delane's death he was succeeded in the editorship of the Times by a very accomplished scholar and able journalist, Mr. Chenery, who resigned the professorship of Arabic at Oxford to take the chair, not less important though of a very different kind, in Printing-House Square. Mr. Chenery's editorship of the Times has been a good deal, and somewhat unjustly, sneered at, but the difficulties with which he has had to contend ought to be remembered. The illness which Mr. Delane did not recognize as incapacitating until long after it had incapacitated him for the work which he went on discharging, brought the Times office into a state of disorganization and disorder which was reflected every morning on the face of the newspaper itself. When Mr. Chenery succeeded to his post very large changes were made in the working staff of the paper, and the old disorder was perhaps inevitably succeeded by a new one. In the mechanism of a great journal it takes a long time to bring men into discipline and under drill. New machinery has a tendency to get out of gear. The mistakes and omissions and oversights which have been apparent in the conduct of the Times are, no doubt, largely attributable to this cause, and will disappear as things fall into smoother working order. The principle which has always characterized the Times, of making it reflect the opinion of the day, has been followed, after a brief period during which another course was attempted, by Mr. Chenery. In the beginning of his editorship he set himself to oppose both the policy of Lord Beaconsfield's Government, which was then in the full tide of its popularity, and the general sense of the country on the Eastern question. But this line was not long persevered in. The Times suddenly turned round and became the organ of the Ministry and of the prevalent sentiment of the day. With the general election and the return of Mr. Gladstone to power and of the Liberal majority to the House of Commons, it has made another revolution. Within certain limits, which in this case appear to have been exceeded, the rule of giving support to the Government of the day and of echoing the national opinion admits of a certain justification. The lines dividing parties and principles are not very sharply drawn in England. The question between Liberals and Conservatives here is not, as that between Republicans and Monarchists in France, one of absolutely divergent principles, but only of more or less in the matter of reform, of faster and slower in the rate of progress. It is quite possible that a newspaper, without deserting any really fundamental principle, might so support a Conservative administration as to urge it to greater speed than it is naturally willing to adopt, while supporting a Liberal administration by endeavoring to impose upon it checks and restraints in the way of a too rapid advance. This is the theory upon which the Times has been conducted. It is a theory which is defensible, and one to which in the main it has been true in practice, although every now and then its revolutions of opinion have been pushed to the extreme of self-contradiction, and even of an apostasy which has shocked the national conscience. The inconsistencies of the Times have, however, always been perfectly compatible with the personal honor and consistency of its writers. When the line of policy adopted upon a particular subject is changed, the subject is committed to a writer who approves of the change.

One of the most remarkable features in the Times is a certain literary monotony, which is in singular contrast with the diversity and fluctuation of opinion which have been spoken of. There is scarcely any flavor of individuality about it. Any one contributor might seem to have written any one of the articles. The different writers might apparently change minds without any difference being discovered; or, rather, it sometimes seems as if they had all one mind in common which they lent about to each other, as the Graiæ lent their one eye and their one tooth. It seems, too, sometimes as if a roller had been passed over the face of the journal, smoothing everything down to one uniform level. The fact is the more remarkable because the individual ability of the writers thus reduced to one common expression is conspicuous enough when they appear on other intellectual fields than those of the newspaper itself. There is still a certain affectation of mystery observed as to the contributors to the Times, and it might not be proper to attempt in minute detail to disclose them. It is notorious, however, that among the writers of leading articles for the paper Mr. Leonard Courtney, the member for Liskeard; Mr. E. D. J. Wilson, whose contributions to magazine literature are well known; and Mr. Thursfield, who has rather an university than a political reputation, are included. The death of Mr. James Macdonell, whose fragmentary work on contemporary French politics revealed a fine mind and character, withdrew from the Times newspaper one of its most graceful and well-informed contributors. In Mr. Tom Taylor the Times has lost its critic on fine arts. Its dramatic critic is Mr. Morris, the son of the former manager of the paper. Its musical critic is Mr. Francis Hueffer, a German whose English is better than that of many English writers, a disciple of Schopenhauer in philosophy and of Wagner in music. Mr. Abraham Hayward, whose writings on questions of society and of literary gossip are well known, discharges, in conjunction with Mr. Chenery, a large part of that work of social intercourse and of mediation between statesmen and the public which was performed with so much efficiency by Mr. Delane, and before his time, as the extract we have quoted from Carlyle bears witness, by Captain Sterling. In Paris the same task is discharged with discretion and assurance by M. Blowitz, the friend and confidant, or the confidant without being the friend, of politicians of all classes, and of successive governments from that of the Duc de Broglie to M. de Freycinet's.

This habit of social intercourse as the instrument of journalism was once bitterly denounced by Mr. Bright, who chose with his usual frank rudeness to connect the policy of the Times with the presence of Mr. Delane at Lord Palmerston's dinner-parties and at Lady Palmerston's receptions. Mr. Bright's imputations receive a certain confirmation from a passage in one of the volumes of Sir Theodore Martin's 'Life of the Prince Consort.' The strictures of the Times upon the German leanings which twenty years ago it attributed to the Queen and to her husband, and upon the conduct of the King of Prussia, created much soreness in the highest quarters. This irritation has been somewhat indiscreetly laid bare in the work in question, considering that it is published with the avowed sanction and under the revision, notorious though not openly acknowledged, of the Queen herself. It appears that in 1861 Lord Clarendon was allowed to suggest to Lord Palmerston that he should use his personal intimacy with the conductors of the Times to induce them to alter their tone on these subjects in a sense agreeable to the Court. Sir Theodore Martin adds: "Whether Lord Palmerston on being informed of what Lord Clarendon had written used what influence he was supposed to have with the directors of the leading journal to bring about a more temperate expression of their views, or whether their writers were moved by their own discretion, is a matter of little moment; but from this time an improved tone was perceptible in what they said of the German people and of their sovereigns." The alternative thrown out by Sir Theodore Martin is perhaps of more moment than he supposes, both as regards the character of the press and the prudence of any courtly tampering with it. Beneath the assumed doubt the clear certainty is implied as to the operations put into play by Lord Palmerston, and their result. It does not show an improvement in the morality of journalism in general, and of the Times in particular, to contrast Lord Palmerston's relations with it with those which existed at an earlier date between it and Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Carlyle publishes in his 'Life of Sterling' a letter from Peel to Captain Edward Sterling, then the editor of the Times, thanking him for the disinterested support which he had given to the administration of that day, but thanking him as "one whose person even is unknown to me, and who during my tenure of power studiously avoided every species of intercourse which could throw suspicion upon the motives by which he was actuated."

THE HISTORIANS OF THE FALL OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

PARIS, July 9, 1880.

THE revival of the Eastern Question has given a new interest to that part of history which relates to Constantinople. When the Russian armies were encamped at San Stefano it seemed that the time had come when the cross would replace the crescent in the famous city which lies on the Bosphorus. The taking of Constantinople in 1453 was one of those momentous events which mark an era in the history of mankind. For more than four hundred years the Turks have encamped in Europe as conquerors; they have many times threatened the Christian populations of the Austrian Empire and of Poland. To fight the Turks was at one time considered the proper business of a Christian soldier. Time has thrown a thick veil over the many battles which were fought between the invaders and the Christians, and the very fall of Byzantium is wrapped in a sort of dreadful mystery, like the fall of Ilium. In the Russian villages there is a legend, which tradition transmits from age to age, that the white Czar will some day enter Saint Sophia (now turned into a mosque) on horseback, and that the whitewash which covers the mosaics representing the scenes of the Old and the New Testaments will be washed away. Such a vision probably consoled many obscure heroes who died in the trenches of Plevna.

Gibbon and Von Hammer have given us the history of the first siege of Constantinople in 1453, and historians have generally adopted their account. M. Henri Vast has just written for the Revue Historique a critical analysis of the documents consulted by Gibbon and by Von Hammer. The English historian had chiefly read three Greek writers—Phranzes, Ducas, and Laonicos Chalcocondylos. The first was a witness of the events, and was allied to the family of the Paleologi, but his hatred of the Turks was intense, and he wrote his chronicle with the pusillanimity of an old man. The second chronicler was also an eye-witness of the events; he was a Greek of the islands and a partisan of the union with the Latins. The third was an Athenian, who wrote from documents with calmness and impartiality. A nobleman of Venice, Nicolò Barbaro, wrote a journal of the siege, day by day, and this valuable document is now preserved in manuscript in the Imperial Library at Vienna. It has only been published lately. Its exact title is as follows: "Giornale dell' assedio di Costantinopoli (1453) di Nicolò Barbaro." Barbaro calls himself the doctor of the galleys of Venice, and gives many valuable details on the part taken by the Venetians in the defence. On the Turkish side there is no document; the conquerors were satisfied with their victory and gave it at once a legendary character. But among the Greeks who remained in Constantinople and rallied to the new rule there were a few who wrote accounts of the siege. The chronicle of Critobules is one of these documents; it has been recently discovered, and is of great importance. We must mention also the reports which were sent to the Pope by Cardinal Isidore of Kiev, by Bessarion, by Leonard of Chios (Archbishop of Mytilene), and a few others. With the help of these documents it has become easier to reconstitute the history of the fall of Constantinople—of a city which held among the Christians of the East the place which Rome still holds with the Christians of the West.

The event seemed all the more terrible in that it was unforeseen. The Greek Empire seemed still able to resist the efforts of the Turks. Nevertheless, the conquests of the Turks were alarming, and the Emperor felt inclined to strengthen himself by an alliance with the Latins. Constantinople, in the words of the poet, "this old woman, appeared like a girl adorned with gold and precious stones"; it was the school of rhetoric, of letters, of philosophy, of theology. The Pope would not hear of union with Constantinople if his doctrinal supremacy was not recognized. There was not much difference in dogma between the Latins and the Greeks, but this question of the Papal supremacy and deep-seated popular instincts rendered reconciliation impossible. The Christian world was severed in twain. When the last emperor, Constantine XIII., ascended the throne he found the Turks already established in Thrace, in a part of Thessaly, in Bulgaria, and on the western side of the Bosphorus; Adrianople was their capital. Twice had Amurath II. besieged Constantinople, but without success and without energy. Mahomet II. was not like his feeble father. He ascended the throne at the age of twenty-one. He was ardent, ambitious, violent; he was not quite a barbarian, since he admired the pictures of Bellini and was fond of chivalric poetry, but he murdered all his brothers on the day of his accession to power. He hated the Christians with all the ardor of Islam; he prepared himself at once for war. When he heard of the death of his father he mounted a horse at Magnesia and rode in two days to Constantinople. He promised the Janissaries conquests and plunder, and he kept his word with them, taking scores of cities by storm and conquering kingdom after kingdom. He first constructed near Galata a fortress, which is still called by the name of Rumeli-Hissar, and which is thus described by Théophile Gautier in his book on Constantinople: "This castle of Europe, Rumeli-Hissar—also called Boghaz Kecen (cut-throat)—has a good appearance on the side of the hill, with white towers of unequal height and its crenellated walls. The three big towers and the little tower near the sea make four letters, M H M D, which form the name of Mahmud II."

Constantine asked help from the Venetians, but they were determined to do nothing for him. The deliberations of the Senate on the subject are preserved in the archives of Venice and show that in 1452 the Emperor Constantine had no doubt that the Turks would soon besiege him. We learn also that the Hungarians were ready to form an alliance with the Italians against the Turks. Gibbon was mistaken on this point: he says that the ambassador of John Hunyady resided with the Turks and directed the operations of the siege, as there was an old superstition in Hungary which marked the conquest of Constantinople as the end of the progress of the Turks. Unfortunately the Christians of the West did not form any effective alliance. Constantine finally applied to the Pope, and went so far as to offer to proclaim solemnly the union of the two churches in the basilica of Saint Sophia. Pope Nicholas V. sent a legate to Constantinople—Isidore of Kiev; the reconciliation with the Holy See of Rome was solemnly declared and solemnized in Saint Sophia on the 15th of December, 1452. But the people of Constantinople had not the same spirit of tolerance as the Emperor. There was an open revolt. The populace rushed to the convent where Gennadius lived, and asked his opinion; he gave it in writing. In the ceremony at Saint Sophia some of the forms of the Church of Rome had been observed; Gennadius wrote: "Miserable Romans! stop, reflect, and repent; at the very moment when you renounce the religion of your fathers and league yourselves with impiety you will be subjected to the foreign yoke." The Greeks rushed to the Imperial palace: "No, we will not be Latins, we will have no Latin help; down with the abominable Azymites!" (In the church of Saint Sophia during the holy service the host used was of unleavened [azyme] bread.) Mahomet must have looked with contempt on these follies; he saw the Christian world divided, and seized his opportunity. The siege of Constantinople began.

The city was more than eleven miles in circumference. On the side of the sea it was defended by a simple wall; the other sides were covered by regular fortifications, towers, and bastions. The Turkish army was immense, numbering probably 200,000 or 250,000 men; the imagination of the Greek historians extended this number to 300,000 and even 400,000. The regular army was probably under 200,000. The Greeks had lost entirely the use of arms and depended upon their mercenaries. The Emperor would not arm more than 15,000 men; his chief lieutenant was an Italian, Giustiniani, who had with him many Venetians and Genoese. The legate Isidore did his duty bravely as a soldier. The city had one hundred guns, and among the number was one gigantic for the time, which could only fire six or seven times a day and had to be cooled each time after it had been fired. The art of siege was still in its infancy. Mahomet used all the old machines which were made for approaches and assaults. He had guns also. Arrows, molten lead, boiling oil were used against the assailants, as well as the famous Greek fire, the secret of which was still preserved in the Greek Empire. The investment of Constantinople began on the 5th of April, 1453. The siege went on methodically, and various assaults were repulsed by the Greeks. Mahomet was surprised to find so much resistance. The Turkish ships succeeded in forcing the entrance of the Golden Horn, and the city from that moment began to show all the terrible symptoms of discontent and of discord which are noticed in all sieges of populous capitals. While the soldiers were on the ramparts the city was convulsed with theological discussions. Even on the eve of the ruin of their cause the fanatical Greeks showed more abhorrence for the dogmas and rites of the Latin Church than for the enemies who were before the gates. Constantinople was like Jerusalem when it was besieged by the Romans. The monks inflamed the multitude, but did not turn their wrath against the real enemy. "I would prefer a hundred times," said one, "to see in Constantinople the turban of the Turks rather than the tiara of the Pope." The crowd rushed to the shrines where miracle-working virgins were kept, but did not rush to the ramparts. All sorts of prophecies were made; the Greeks became the pitiable victims of what was called during the last siege of Paris "obsidional" madness.

Constantinople did not surrender because it was starved; it was regularly taken by storm. While the mob accused the Emperor of treason Mahomet kept firing his 130 guns against the walls and making a breach. He promised his followers the plunder of a city which was then, after Rome, the richest in the world. The last attack was preceded by a solemn fasting and by prayers. It began on the 28th of May, in the middle of the day, to the sound of "La ilah illah Allah." The resistance of the Greeks and Italians, who were fighting one against twenty, was truly heroic. Constantine was among his troops and showed the greatest bravery. Giustiniani was mortally wounded. In the evening the Italians, having lost their chief, took to their ships and abandoned the unfortunate Emperor. The battle began again the next day; the Emperor fought like a common soldier, "like a new Samson." The fight was hand-to-hand. Constantine fell in the carnage, and the confusion was such that his loss was not noticed at first. His body was found afterwards in a mass of corpses. The Turks were at last within the city. They had been promised three days of plunder; they sacked the magnificent capital unmercifully. The pen of a Victor Hugo could hardly describe the scenes of horror of which Byzantium became the theatre. Blood ran in torrents in the streets. An Italian witness says that "corpses were floating on the Dardanelles like spoiled melons on the canals of Venice." Some historians speak of 40,000, some of 60,000 victims. The most noble ladies were given up to a barbarous soldiery; 50,000 prisoners were made, only of the richest class, in the hope of ransom. Gold, silver, bronze, precious stones, ornaments were seized everywhere. What could not be taken was destroyed. The convents and churches were especially marked for plunder. Saint Sophia became the scene of a horrible orgy. Mahomet made his entry among the corpses, and went on horseback to Saint Sophia. This church from that moment became a mosque, and the crescent took the place of the cross. It is better to throw a veil over the excesses of Mahomet and of his lieutenants. The Turks showed no mercy, no generosity; they trampled upon their unhappy victims like so many wild beasts.

Europe learned with horror the details of the fall of Constantinople. There was a call from many sides for a new crusade. In the year 1880 the crusade has not yet begun; and when lately the Russians, encamped before Constantinople, saw in the distance the dome of Saint Sophia, they had the singular courage to remain within their lines, and recrossed the Danube without having avenged the Emperor Constantine.

A SUGGESTION FOR THE HARVARD-YALE RACE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It may not be too late to offer a suggestion in response to a very pertinent criticism lately made by you on the University boat-race at New London.

You justly say that the "event" is too brief to reward adequately general interest for the twenty-four hours that must be spent by a Bostonian or New-Yorker to witness it. Strengthening this is the other fact that the latter portion of the brief "event" has generally (I believe uniformly) been entirely without interest. During its first mile the last race was quite exciting; for the other three miles it was simply a tame question of how much the difference should be, and on which side it would lie. Roughly speaking, the same, I believe, has been true of all the eight-oar races between Harvard and Yale. Four miles seem to settle nothing of consequence which is not settled in one mile.

Why, then, should not the race be restricted to one mile? This would leave out its uninteresting part. Why, too, should there not be four races of one mile each? In other words, why should not the four-mile race be rowed in "heats," as horse-races are run? This would lengthen out the event, so as to make it better worth going to. It would distribute the chances so as to make them much more interesting; and it would put the whole course in view from single points, and so abolish the inconveniences and dangers of the observation-train.

This latter consideration alone may be one on which the future of racing at New London depends. H.

THE BOSTON MONDAY LECTURESHIP.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the name of the fairness and candor by which the Nation is characterized, you will doubtless be willing to admit to your paper a correction of several important errors of fact contained in a letter published by you May 13, on the Boston Monday Lectureship.

1. A pamphlet by the medical candidate Leeser is ridiculed by your correspondent as having been read to a small company of students in a beer-house; but it is gravely noticed and commended in Ulrici's Zeitschrift für Philosophie for 1880 (vol. i. p. 122). The Monday Lectureship referred to it only as a hint of the effort made by the younger school of materialists to explain certain psychical phenomena, and gave to it barely three lines where the foremost philosophical magazine in the world gives a page.

2. The Monday Lectureship has not defended Zöllner, but has cited his testimony only so far as it is confirmed by the published authority of his associates. It is atrocious to suggest that a professor whom the University of Leipzig keeps in his chair as an accredited instructor in exact science is insane. In this style of attack on a man whose published works are discussed at great length in the best philosophical magazine of Germany, and whose position in Leipzig society needs no defence, there is a certain meanness and infernality not to be lightly excused. Nevertheless, this is the style of attack employed by your correspondent.

3. This critic blames the Monday Lectureship for not having done the work of a pulpit, in attempts to edify, console, and encourage men, and to teach peacefulness, humility, and self-sacrifice. Mr. Cook is an occupant of the platform and not of a pulpit. He is a lecturer, and not a pastor or preacher, so that this criticism is wholly inapposite. Besides, the field which the Lectureship has selected for itself has not yet been occupied to the full; and many of the topics of comparative theology and of church reform have been reserved for discussion in addresses already in course of preparation.

4. Your correspondent's opening sentence contains a number of important errors as to matters of fact. He says: "Twenty lectures per year for five years reprinted in fifteen newspapers and filling eight books, one of which has reached a sixteenth edition, is the record upon which Mr. Cook retires as the oracle of Protestantism in New England." Mr. Cook has given 150 lectures in five years—that is, thirty a year as an average. The lectures of the last four years make ten volumes, one of which is in its sixteenth, and another in its thirteenth, and another in its eleventh edition. But it would pain Mr. Cook exceedingly to be seriously regarded by any friend of his as an "oracle of Protestantism" in New England, while the coarse phrase of "boss" which your correspondent applies to him is of all words the most misleading and undeserved epithet which could be employed in the case.

5. President McCosh says that Mr. Cook's critics have been unable to detect him in a misstatement of fact. The Bibliotheca Sacra, in reviewing the Boston Monday Lectures on Biology, says they do not contain a single important error. That Mr. Cook has not noticed many of the demands made upon him for correction of statements of facts is explicable by the circumstance that such demands have themselves often been palpable blunders caused by a use of unauthorized reports of the Monday Lectures. Your correspondent's citation of Mr. Cook's language is from an unauthorized and mischievously inaccurate newspaper report.

6. It is idle for opponents of the religious and philosophical tenets defended by the Monday Lectureship to pretend that Mr. Cook has "lost whatever hold he had upon the most thoughtful and cultivated part of the community." The symposia at Mr. Cook's rooms the last season in Boston were led by some of the most brilliant people of that city. It might be said of them that they were the one place where the pulse of advanced thought as to the reforms of the day might be felt, and ministers attended them to ascertain the true currents of cultured opinion. Much the same might be said of the Monday lectures, which were never attended by so large a proportion of ministers as in the courses delivered in the historic Old South after the burning of Tremont Temple. It is wholly inaccurate for your correspondent to say that a careful exhibition has been made of every visitor of distinction on Mr. Cook's platform, for exactly the contrary is the truth.

7. The writer of this communication is a total disbeliever in the positions of Zöllner, Crookes, Wallace, Scheibner, Weber, Ludwig, Fichte, and Ulrici as to spiritualism. He does not grant even the little that Ulrici claims, that spiritualism is or can become a scientific question and deserves investigation; but the writer, having read the authorized reports of Mr. Cook's lectures on spiritualism, finds your correspondent atrociously inaccurate when he represents Mr. Cook as standing in the edge of the shadow of spiritualism. Mr. Cook really grants less on this subject than does Ulrici. He everywhere describes the alleged spiritualistic facts with an if. Even the testimony as to the famous Leipzig experiments he does not credit as it stands, and insists that only repeated experiment can determine whether there is or is not a new force to be discovered in the realm of psychical phenomena. Mr. Cook is a vehement anti-spiritualist. Your correspondent's most mischievous error is in hinting that the opposite is the truth.—The writer, having been for five years one of the committee in charge of the Boston Monday Lectureship, and having heard at least one hundred of Mr. Cook's lectures, has a personal knowledge of the above facts, except the few German details, which are authenticated by the reference given to the Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

VERITAS.

BOSTON, June 27, 1880.

MR. GARFIELD'S DEFENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read carefully your articles in defence of Garfield, and must say that they have, to my mind, more than one very weak point.

You slip lightly over the ugly fact of the memorandum said to be in Garfield's handwriting. Was the authenticity of this memorandum disputed? If not, why not? The true time to question it would have been by cross-examination of Ames when before the Committee. I have seen a statement, purporting to have been made at the time by the Cincinnati Commercial, to the effect that an appointment was made for Garfield to be before the Committee simultaneously with Ames, but that he failed to appear.

Then you say that "the smallness of the amount at Ames's disposal shows that the object was rather to associate influential names with the enterprise, in order to give it respectability, than to secure any favorable legislation." Now, it seems to me that the words underscored attribute to Ames an object which he obviously never entertained, because he did not associate these names with the enterprise, but, on the contrary, he studiously kept them concealed. Doubtless he knew well enough that the association of these "influential names" would not "give respectability" to his enterprise, but would be taken by a sceptical public as implying a suspicious alliance between the "influential names" in Congress and a financial company the "queerness" of which was recognized from the start, and the chief peril of which was known to be the risk that Congress would interfere with its doings. As for "the smallness of the amount at Ames's disposal," it is true that there was but a small number of shares; but how much was each share worth in the market?

The usual plan of interesting legislators in a railway is to give them what is known as "a call" on the stock at a low price. The holder of the "call" has a right to take the stock, and is entitled to the dividends accruing while he holds the call, but he need never take up the stock or the dividends, and can either abandon the bargain or resell his right. He is, therefore, in position to say that he "never held a share." This is now the usual plan, and seems to have been in substance, though not in name, the plan which Ames tried with the Congressmen.

According to you, the finding of facts by the Committee "has no such judicial authority" as to do more than to make it uncomfortable for Garfield's friends and useful to his enemies; and you add that "the evidence is before the world," implying that the world can form now as good an opinion as the Committee could at the time. To this it seems obvious to answer that, whatever be the lack of judicial authority, it can hardly be set up on Garfield's behalf, because, to whatever extent the Committee were not judges, they were his associates, friends, or partisans, and hence an adverse verdict carries more weight against him than an adverse decision from an impartial judicial tribunal would have possessed. Further, the committee had to some extent the character of a "jury of the vicinage"; they knew the people and were familiar with various collateral matters that influenced their minds in judging the evidence, they heard the witnesses verbally and marked their manner in giving testimony. Hence it appears to be by no means true that the world has now as good means of forming an opinion as the Committee had at the time.

To my mind, there is no disputing the fact that the stock given by Ames to the Congressmen was intended as a bribe. Whether or not Garfield accepted the offer of the stock and drew a part of the profits, there is no question that he long held the offer under consideration and dallied with the proposition. The question is, Did he know or suspect that it was a bribe? The answer is that the stock was to be a gift—he was to pay nothing for it, it was to pay for itself out of the dividends; and again, the very nature of the enterprise was such that its interests antagonized the interests which the Government had in the cheap construction of the Union Pacific Railroad. To suppose that Garfield saw nothing "crooked" in the proposal to make him a present of an interest in an enterprise of such a character, is to suppose what is in the highest degree improbable; and, in fact, his own story is, that he hesitated long and finally rejected the offer, after availing himself of a loan from the man who made the proposition. The Committee find, however, as matter of fact, that he accepted the proposition, though he never fully carried it into execution. In fact, the whole transaction was (no doubt purposely) left in a vague and merely inchoate shape. But while the Committee thus found itself constrained to render a verdict adverse to their friend and associate on the question of fact, their strong personal bias in his favor is shown by their inconsequent acquitting him of any moral wrong, after his denial under oath of the facts which they found as proved in his case.

Upon all the evidence it is plain to me that if Garfield had been a man with a high sense of public duty, he would promptly have refused a present of any stock (for the pretence of letting the stock pay for itself from dividends could hardly have deceived a boy of fifteen), and would certainly have refused with indignation the present of a stock which in its very nature had interests adverse to those of the United States.

In the above I have not referred to the De Golyer transaction, though it seems to me much less defensible than this affair of the "Crédit Mobilier" stock. I shall recur to it in another letter if you will permit me.

CRITIC.

[We "slipped lightly" over the "memorandum" because we considered it a very light thing. Nothing has shaken our confidence in Mr. Ames's testimony so much as his production of this paper as serious evidence. To give it importance we have to believe that General Garfield walked down to Ames's room while the investigation was pending, and made not only a full confession of his connection with the Crédit Mobilier, but drew up a list of the securities held for him by Ames, and with so much nonchalance that he left the document lying on the table. We have to believe, too, that Ames, so far from being surprised, or pleased, or shocked by this confession of Garfield's and this confirmation of his own testimony (the memorandum, he said, was made "after the investigation had commenced"), did not even pick up the memorandum, or apparently pay any attention to it. He said, "he did not pay attention to it at the time"; that "he found it on his table two or three days afterwards." General Garfield's account of the memorandum—that in talking with Ames he took up a piece of paper and jotted down on it the amounts Ames said he held for him, viz.:

MADDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY

we consider probable. Such a scrap of paper he would naturally leave lying on the table, and such a scrap Ames would naturally not notice at the time.

As to the condition of Ames's mind, or, in other words, his object in distributing Crédit-Mobilier stock, it is and must for ever remain mere matter of speculation, and it is therefore hardly worth discussing now.

We are compelled to weigh the "judicial authority" of the Committee by means of their report. In finding that General Garfield did take and hold Crédit-Mobilier stock, and receive dividends thereon, they found that his evidence was untrue. Now, if they believed it was made untrue by deliberate lying, their conclusion, that they "found nothing in his conduct or motives in taking the stock to call for any recommendation" by them, would show that their standard of morality was entirely different from both "Critic's" and ours. They ought in such case to have recommended his expulsion along with Brooks and Ames. If, on the other hand, as two of them—Messrs. McCrary and Poland—have since explained, they thought the contradictions in the testimony were due to the imperfection of the witnesses' memory about a distant and ill-defined transaction, they acquit General Garfield of the only serious charge arising out of the Crédit-Mobilier affair; for his offence, if any, lay not in his taking the stock, but in denying that he took it. We are driven to the conclusion, therefore, either that the Committee thought his denial honest or did not think the worse of him for a dishonest denial. In fact, the Committee do not seem to have reached any definite conclusion whatever on the point in which the public is now most interested, and any one who wishes to make up his mind about it has to read and weigh the evidence. Garfield did not deny that he held the offer of stock "under consideration and dallied with the proposition"; so this is not in issue. The question and the only one is, Was his conduct during the period after his last communication with Ames, in 1868 or 1869, that of a man who had finally rejected the offer, or that of a man who had accepted it or had it still under advisement? What was passing in Ames's mind during this period is of no sort of consequence. Even if it could be ascertained it would throw no light on the question of Garfield's truthfulness. It is the latter's acts and words, and not Ames's intentions or ideas, which fix the extent of his moral responsibility. We may add that we think we have discussed this matter sufficiently.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

MACMILLAN & CO., New York, will issue next month a new catalogue embracing their own educational publications and those of the Oxford (Clarendon) and Cambridge University Presses. It will merit the attention of teachers and students everywhere.——The Boston Evening Transcript of last Saturday commemorated its semi-centennial or "golden anniversary" by a review of its varied history of half a century, and the account is republished in a tiny pamphlet which its readers will find contains the record in some degree of an eventful period as well as of what all its esteemed contemporaries will be glad to learn is a prosperous enterprise.——Charles Scribner's Sons have issued in pamphlet form Mr. R. H. Stoddard's article on Hawthorne contributed to the 'Encyclopædia Brittanica.'——G. P. Putnam's Sons announce for publication in the early fall a number of new books, among which we may mention a new translation of the Japanese story of 'The Loyal Ronins' (generally called 'The Forty Ronins' or 'The Loyal League'); a series of papers entitled 'Hints for Home Reading,' by Edward Everett Hale, H. W. Beecher, Frederic Beecher Perkins, Charles Dudley Warner, Joseph Cook, and others, edited by Lyman Abbott; and 'The Worst Boy in Town,' by John Habberton. The fifth and sixth volumes of the "New Plutarch," issued by the same firm, will be respectively Prof. E. H. Palmer's 'Haroun Alraschid and Civilization' and Edward Dicey's 'Victor Emmanuel and the Attainment of Italian Unity.'——We have received the first number of the Newport Historical Magazine, a new quarterly of whose plan we gave some account a few weeks ago. A short "Introductory" by the editor, Dr. Henry E. Turner, explains this in detail; Dr. H. G. Barrows, of Boston, contributes a few pages upon "The Importance of Historical Publications," noting a fact which should be remembered by persons in possession of records, however seemingly useless, that almost every town has an antiquary to whom they may prove of value; genealogies of the Redwood and Barker families are given; there is an ultra-Tory contemporary account from the journal of Mrs. Mary Gould Almy of the siege of Newport in 1778, which is the most generally interesting paper of the number; and a reprint of the town records and a department of notes and queries are begun.——The house of Ernest Leroux will undertake the publication of a 'Bibliothèque Slave,' consisting of translations of Slavic historical works, beginning with Pypin's 'History of Slavic Literatures,' and Jireczek's 'History of the Bulgarians.'——The second or German-French part of Sachs's great dictionary is now finished. The work is probably unsurpassed by any bilingual dictionary yet published in respect of compactness, completeness, convenient arrangement of material, and ingenious typographic devices.——The new English literary journal, The Pen, after seven issues as a weekly, is to appear hereafter as a monthly, with an increase in the number of pages devoted to literary matters.——M. Ernest Legouvé, whose 'Art de la Lecture' is in its twenty-sixth edition, has just published a forty-eight-page pamphlet on Malibran, apparently the first section of a future volume of 'Études et Souvenirs de Théâtre.' It is full of personal reminiscence and anecdote; an account of a musical duel between Thalberg and Malibran in the evening of the day of her marriage to De Beriot may be specially mentioned.——The 'Hand-book of the Dyce and Forster Collections in the South Kensington Museum' has steel portraits of both donors and biographical sketches of each, that of Dyce being by Forster and that of Forster by Professor Morley, his successor as the editor of the Examiner. There are also a view of Forster's library and reproductions of sketches by Maclise and Rowlandson, besides over two score fac-similes of autographs contained in one collection or the other. Among the Forster MSS. are nearly all of Dickens's, and also a letter of Bulwer's to Macready giving the first outline of "Richelieu." Among the unclassified objects in the Dyce collection is a plaster bust of Mrs. Siddons by herself.

—Frances Power Cobbe contributes to a recent number of the Modern Review (a new English quarterly of Unitarian principles, of which George H. Ellis, of Boston, is the American agent) a number of anecdotes about the late Mary Carpenter, all of which are interesting and some of which present a side of Miss Carpenter's character perhaps not generally appreciated. Miss Cobbe was not only associated with her in her philanthropic projects, but for a year resided under the same roof, and the affectionate tone of these recollections does not prevent them from disclosing the acuteness of observation on which they are founded. There was evidently a good deal of monotony about the life at Red Lodge, but it was thoroughly congenial to the mistress. Breakfast, after prayers, was over before daylight in winter, Miss Carpenter always remarking as she sat down "how cheerful" was the gas; the rest of the day was distinctly mapped out, little time being left for dinner and tea, and at nine or ten o'clock she was often so exhausted as to fall asleep "with the spoon half-way between her mouth and the cup of gruel which she ate for supper." She was "essentially a stoic," Miss Cobbe observes, but without any sympathy with "asceticism." To all the minor comforts of life she was simply indifferent. She once remarked gravely of some people at a country-house where she had been visiting that they "came down all dressed for dinner, and evidently thought the meal rather a pleasant part of the day." On another occasion, after Miss Cobbe's gout had wrung from her an appeal for a variation of the salt-beef diet, Miss Carpenter greeted her with a smile and "You see I have not forgotten your wish for a dish of vegetables!" pointing to "six little radishes." Seeing Miss Cobbe's dog lying on her back before the fire one day, she inspected it gravely and observed in a tone of solemn disapprobation, "Self-indulgent dog!" and once being rallied for sybaritism, on account of her use of "a small, square cushion as hard as a board," replied simply that since her illness she had "been obliged to have recourse to these indulgences." She had, nevertheless, an abundance of humor, as various instances which Miss Cobbe gives testify. But in the main she was too devoted to her work, too much "wrapt up" in it, to have anything else in mind. When she was in India the governor of a Residency remarked after her visit: "It is very astonishing; I listened to all Miss Carpenter had to tell me, but when I began to tell her what I knew of this country she dropped asleep." Equally indicative is her own remark—the last for which we have space—made in reply to Miss Cobbe's observation that Biblical criticism had made great strides of recent years: "Oh! but my father settled all that—he harmonized the Gospels!"

—A long and learned paper in the American Catholic Quarterly for July on "The Character of Sanctity in the Catholic Church" incidentally throws new light upon the great question of the comparative moral excellence of the English and French peoples—a moot point familiar to a certain order of private discussion, and not wholly unknown to rural lyceums. The writer's general thesis is that sanctity, together with unity, Catholicity, and apostolicity, is a characteristic peculiar to the true Church, and in the course of his demonstration he takes occasion to dispose of the "pure sophism" that

"Protestant nations are invariably more virtuous than those that are Catholic," which "preposterous claim" he says Protestants are in the habit of making. He takes the two countries that are thus "generally contrasted," and boldly announces that "though no general conclusion can be deduced from one or two facts, we will not refuse to accept this unfair condition of the problem to be discussed." In the first place, people usually contrast England with a portion only of the French people, and that the "radically infidel and godless." This, he observes with a serenity that at once begets confidence, "does not touch the question." Take, instead, "those noble leaders of the Catholic party, as it is called," and it will be found that their virtues "far outshine those of British peers and politicians." There are, besides, many subtler points to be considered. "Protestant England has preserved many Catholic principles which give it a great moral superiority . . . over a considerable number of the French people." But though "Calvinism has not altogether pervaded the nation," the general run of the morality is nevertheless of a Pharisaical sort, "so that the appearance of a saint among them is totally unknown." "Can it be supposed without eliciting a smile," the writer maliciously continues, that an Archbishop of Canterbury would willingly die for his flock, as Mgr. Affre did in '48? The Ritualists, he thinks, are making some "vain efforts in the path of holiness," but they meet with general derision. "This is because Protestantism is naturally opposed to sanctity." Then compare the English and French rabble. The former are "given over, body and soul, to the cruel mercies of the poor-laws"; whereas in France, "as soon as it is heard that there is destitution anywhere, troops of Daughters of Charity, of Brethren of St. Vincent de Paul, of individual Christians, men and women, often of the highest rank, are always at hand." In short, "what they [the English] possess of virtue comes from their previous Catholicism; the many deficiencies of their moral code is the outcome of their Protestantism." The writer is the Rev. Aug. J. Thébaud, S.J., a frequent and, as we always find, entertaining contributor to the Quarterly; and the Quarterly is called by the Tablet "the leading Catholic magazine in the English language," which, so far as our knowledge extends, is not exaggeration.

—Sterne is likely to remain in the pillory where the lectures on the English Humorists, and particularly their addendum, that on "Charity and Humor," set him twenty years ago, and most of the warmest admirers of Uncle Toby will probably agree with Mr. Leslie Stephen when he says, in the twenty-second of his 'Hours in a Library,' contributed to the current Cornhill, "The judgment pronounced upon Sterne by Thackeray seems to me substantially unimpeachable." And though Mr. Stephen proceeds to discuss Sterne for over twenty pages, so far as we can see he is content, for the most part, with elaborating Thackeray's criticism, and seems to have been animated chiefly by a desire to free his mind—a desire in every way natural to a man who hates humbug and hypocrisy as cordially as Mr. Stephen. He does indeed lay less stress upon Sterne's hypocrisy than Thackeray, and more upon the immorality and grossness which Sterne shared with better men; and, on the other hand, though he admits Sterne's feelings were "genuine for the moment," he finds only a topsy-turvy fancifulness in Uncle Toby, says the famous sentiment about the wind and the shorn lamb is "surely on the extreme verge at which the pathetic melts into the ludicrous," finds the recording angel "a little suspicious," and nowhere displays anything like the heartiness of Thackeray's "A critic who refuses to see in this charming description [of the donkey in 'Tristram Shandy'] wit, humor, pathos, a kind nature speaking, and a real sentiment, must be hard indeed to move and to please." It is, however, for certain general remarks which the thought of Sterne suggests to Mr. Stephen that we are tempted to call attention to his essay, the more so because they illustrate what we were saying last week concerning his 'Pope.' These sentences might almost be called "Confessions," coming as they do from so strict a scientist:

"I, at any rate, love a book pretty much in proportion as it makes me love the author; . . . the ultimate source of pleasure is the personal affinity. . . . I may, by an intellectual effort, perceive the greatness of a writer whose character is essentially antagonistic to my own; but I cannot feel it as it must be felt for a genuine enjoyment. . . . You can hardly love the 'Tale of a Tub' or 'Gulliver' unless you have a sympathy with the genuine Swift which overpowers your occasional disgust at his misanthropy. . . . If we for a moment yield to the enchantment [Sterne's], we feel ashamed, at the next moment, of our weakness. . . . There is a good deal to be said for the thesis that all fiction is really a kind of lying, and that art in general is a luxurious indulgence, to which we have no right whilst crime and disease are rampant in the outer world."

—It is scarcely unfair to infer from this that what we mean when we speak of intellectual sympathy Mr. Stephen abjures almost in so many words. He does, to be sure, say that to "the general rule" laid down in the first four or five sentences "there is one marked exception in our literature"—Sterne, namely, whom no one "with the remotest taste for literary excellence" can fail to admire for his art; but to make this exception unique is almost the same thing as not to make it at all, and, to be frank, it does not seem to us that Mr. Stephen attempts much in the way of making even it appear a substantial exception. It seems, on the other hand, needless to point out that to perceive the greatness of a writer without intellectual effort; to find the ultimate source of pleasure not in the personal affinity with him, but in what he says; and if we yield to the enchantment of even "a drivelling quack"—as Thackeray called Sterne—not to be ashamed of it provided it is good magic, are elementary principles of literary criticism. They certainly are of literary criticism pursued as an art rather than as a means of freeing one's mind. And they are as applicable to "imaginative works" as to "those which one reads for the sake of the information or of the logical teaching," which Mr. Stephen, of course, excepts. For the thesis which has for a corollary that John Howard did more service to humanity than Michael Angelo there is nothing at all to be said, except that it is idle to discuss such propositions; and from the strictly utilitarian point of view, when Mr. Stephen disapproves of a man who "saves up his good feelings merely to use them as the raw material of poems," and so wastes "a force which ought to be applied to the improvement of the world," one is disposed to ask him, since he is speaking of sacred feelings particularly, if he thinks the force expended upon 'Lycidas,' for example, or 'In Memoriam' wasted? Insistence upon intellectual sympathy, moreover, as distinct from "personal affinity," is no disparagement to heartiness as a prime element of criticism. That is a mistake made so often, we suspect, because the critic conceives that he may fail in admiration of what is good and honest if his reprobation of their contraries be not cordial to the last degree; but an English critic surely may assume that to be understood, and there is always the risk of the appearance of Pharisaism. A heartiness careful to preserve the just relations of things is none the less cordial, in proof of which Thackeray on Sterne may be instanced again. The Academy, by the way, eulogizes Mr. Stephen's paper for its "masculine strength"; nothing, it seems to us, could be more felicitously exact.

—In view of the epidemic which recently prevailed at North Adams, Mass., and which is now generally ascribed to the presence of certain impurities in the common drinking-water, it would be well to consider, from a more strictly scientific point of view than has heretofore guided similar enquiries, the conditions under which the presence of organic matter may affect the pollution of water. The subject is receiving considerable attention at present in England, and it appears that some "startling" facts, unknown to the general public, and equally so to the London water board known as the Rivers Pollution Commission, to which, we believe, Dr. Frankland is acting chemist, were revealed by no less an authority than Prof. Huxley. This naturalist insists upon the insufficiency of the present method of water-analysis, which, while it may yield results entirely satisfactory from a purely chemical standpoint, affords no criteria, either absolute or approximate, as to the point in question. "Water," says Prof. Huxley, "may be as pure as can be as regards chemical analysis, and yet, as regards the human body, be as deadly as prussic acid; and, on the other hand, may be chemically gross and yet do no harm to any one." The force of this utterance will be readily appreciated when it is recollected that the noxious influences of organic matter are not so much dependent upon the quantity as upon the quality of this matter, to which chemical analysis affords us but little clue. It must also be borne in mind that dangerous organic matter is, in all probability, in most cases not directly poisonous as such, but indirectly as affording a pabulum for the favorable development of bacteria-like organisms, the agents so extensively engaged in effecting decomposition and producing putrefactive changes in the blood-system of the higher organisms. Prof. Huxley further states that he is aware that chemists may consider his a "terrible conclusion, but it is true, and if the public are guided by percentages alone they may often be led astray. The real value of a determination of the quantity of organic impurity in a water is that by it a very shrewd notion can be obtained as to what has had access to that water." An able critic in Nature (July 8), commenting on these remarks, states that it is to the biologist, and not to the chemist, that we must look for further elucidation of this important subject, and it is certainly a curious phase in scientific development to note under what new aspects some hitherto well-recognized lines of investigation must now be regarded.

—Some readers of the Nation will be glad to have their attention called to Prof. Knight's little study (though it was published some time ago, under the title 'The English Lake District as interpreted in the Poems of Wordsworth') of a striking aspect of Wordsworth's poetry—its accuracy in depicting the fields, hills, towns, streams, cottages among which it arose. The Lake District, though much travelled and inhabited since Wordsworth left it, has still on the whole been treated with respect. The men who gave it fame, remote, unpopular, and austere, were not such as to have their footsteps much troubled by the wanton tourist. Perhaps the impressive scenery may have been in some degree its own protector, and it is alleged also that the Englishman has a nicer repugnance to rural profanity than we Americans, is less inclined to smart hotels, announcements of patent medicines, and arrangements for views. At any rate, in spite of some new and excellent roads, enlarged and better-built villages, and the inevitable changes of time, nine-tenths of Wordsworth's local allusions may, with the aid of the Fenwick notes, still be identified. That this will be possible for many years cannot be anticipated. The recent attack upon Thirlmere reminds us that even a poet's strength cannot for long ward off improvements. Prof. Knight has therefore done a timely as well as pious work in determining before it is too late the character of Wordsworth's delineative accuracy. That character, many will learn with surprise, did not consist in a verbal transcript of what was present to the eye. The marks of duty, truthfulness, freedom from caprice, stamped upon the work of Wordsworth easily lead to the belief that he accepted that arrangement of landscape which nature gave, and was only careful that his own wilfulness might bring no disturbance. How minutely faithful he could be when it suited his purpose may be seen in cases like that mentioned by Prof. Knight on p. 97. But Wordsworth's truthfulness goes deeper than allegiance to an outward pattern. Helvellyn cannot be observed and Mr. Wordsworth neglected. Human feelings are normal constituents of natural scenes, and that too not in the sense of Bacon's aphorism, that art is homo additus naturæ; for Wordsworth's imagination admits no separation, and has room, therefore, for no addition. Nature expresses man, and he who would faithfully interpret her must do so by a precise marking of that human soul that through her runs. Accordingly, where human feeling can be most adequately depicted by intermingling features of detached scenes, Wordsworth does not hesitate. Prof. Knight deserves the thanks of every student of Wordsworth for the patience with which he has traced many tangled cases of this audacious and masterful transposition. Through pages of pleasing quotation the reader is made to feel anew how fundamentally Wordsworth was the poet of man, and of Nature only because he felt man not to be alien to her.

STONEWALL JACKSON'S SHENANDOAH VALLEY CAMPAIGN.*

THIS history is a fit successor and companion to 'Chancellorsville,' by the same authorities, of which we spoke in terms of high praise in No. 99 of the Nation (May 23, 1867). It is an admirable piece of work, interesting and enjoyable from beginning to end. It may not be highly entertaining for the general reader, for it is extremely simple and business-like, and only to a very limited extent dramatic or pictorial. But it is perfectly clear, accurate, and straightforward, and perfectly impartial. It is not only as temperate as if written by a man of another race, it is not only absolutely free from that "tall talk" which we have learned to consider a Southern characteristic, but it is a model of manly fairness. There seems to be no difference in the author's readiness to bestow praise on Northern gallantry or tenacity, or censure upon Southern indiscipline or feebleness, as the occasion for either presents itself. We see little reason for qualifying the statement that there is no fault to be found with either the matter or the manner of his book, unless by saying that he uses the historical present rather too freely. Indeed, this composition is a credit to American literature, and it is a cause for true thankfulness and encouragement that so passionless and generous a book should be written by a soldier who served on Stonewall Jackson's staff.

More time, of course, must pass before it can be other than unpleasant reading for Northern men, unless they can divest themselves of all personal and (in a certain sense) national feeling in reading it. Jackson's Valley campaign of 1862 was glorious for him, but most discreditable for the North. It was a powerful and painful illustration of the folly of putting men in high military positions simply because they had held high political positions. We had plenty of men in and near the Valley, and Colonel Allan cordially recognizes the soldierly merit of many of them, but our generals were such that Jackson succeeded almost invariably not only in being the strongest at the point of contact, no matter how great his numerical inferiority might be, but in absolutely dislocating our military plans for the Virginia campaign of 1862, and he did much by his operations in the Valley to determine the failure of the Peninsula campaign. The South was wiser than we; it put its trained soldiers in high places at the first, and kept them there, if they proved competent, till their death or till the end of the war. The mills of God grind slowly, and it may be that great purposes were subserved and great ultimate good attained by the prolongation of the war; but to those who look simply and directly at the facts, it seems as if incalculable wretchedness might have been spared if soldiers and not politicians had been opposed to Jackson in the Valley in 1862.

The interest of the first of the five chapters of this book is rather biographical than otherwise. It gives a little sketch of Jackson's history up to the time when he was assigned to the command of the Valley district, in October, 1861, and an account of what he did and failed to do in the following three or four months. We may pass it by with little comment. The season was unfavorable to military operations, Jackson's army was new and pretty poor, and he himself was probably learning rapidly while he taught his men. Moreover, he had opposed to him a man of very considerable energy and daring—General Lander—who would probably have made a name for himself had his life not been cut short. The second chapter continues the story till near the end of April, 1862. It contains an account—the only complete one of which we have any knowledge—of the battle of Kernstown, an engagement of no great magnitude or importance, in which Jackson, with a force inferior, and apparently largely inferior, attacked Shields and got beaten, with some loss in prisoners and two guns. The principal interest which attaches to this battle arises from the fact that it was the only one which Jackson ever distinctly and unmistakably lost. The rest of the book, in three chapters, entitled respectively, "McDowell," "Winchester," and "Cross Keys and Port Republic," tells the story of that series of successes which is commonly known as Jackson's Valley Campaign. It covers the period from April 28 to June 17, 1862, and of it Colonel Allan says: "Brilliant as were the achievements of General Jackson during the succeeding months of his too brief career, it was his Valley campaign which first lifted him into great fame, nor do any of his subsequent deeds show more strikingly the characteristics of his genius."

Towards the end of April, 1862, Jackson had about six thousand men at Swift Run Gap, eight thousand men under Ewell a day's march in his rear, and three thousand under Edward Johnson at West View, forty miles or more away to the southwest. Banks was at Harrisonburg, twelve or fifteen miles to the west and north of Jackson, with nineteen thousand men; while Milroy and Schenck, with the advance, numbering six thousand, of Fremont's army of fifteen thousand, were further to the west, at and east of a line drawn from Franklin to McDowell, but so near as to make Jackson apprehend a junction of their forces with Banks, and their occupation of Staunton, which would have placed them between him and Edward Johnson, and opposed their twenty-five thousand men (which the arrival of Fremont would increase to thirty-four thousand), to his maximum, then available, of fourteen thousand. Under these circumstances he determined to attempt to form a junction with Edward Johnson, to strike at Milroy, and then to concentrate his own, Edward Johnson's, and Ewell's forces against Banks. Using every precaution to ensure secrecy, and overcoming with untiring effort the difficulties of the country, which heavy rains made excessive, he effected his concentration, but by the time he reached Milroy's position his approach was known, and that officer was reinforced by Schenck, who arrived with something less than two thousand men of his own and took command. The Federal officers soon became aware that Jackson's movements were making their position at McDowell untenable, and they moved their forces forward to attack. The engagement lasted four hours. Jackson spoke of it as "intense" at one time. We seem to have actually taken into action about twenty-five hundred men, and the Confederates about forty-five hundred. Our attack was repulsed, and after dark our forces retired. The reported Confederate loss was four hundred and sixty-one and the Federal loss two hundred and fifty-six.

Schenck commenced his retreat in the direction of Franklin as soon as his troops were withdrawn from the battle-field. He seems to have conducted the movement wisely, and though Jackson followed him up for three or four days, and to the vicinity of Franklin, he effected nothing except that he took efficient precautions, by blockading such roads as were in his power, to prevent an easy junction between the Federal forces opposed to him and those of Banks. Time was all-important to him. Ewell had been left behind to watch Banks. He determined, therefore, to unite his forces with Ewell, and to strike at Banks, from whom he had pushed away Fremont's advance. On the 14th of May Jackson reached McDowell, and the same day Fremont joined Schenck at Franklin some twenty-five miles to the north. As Jackson had anticipated, Fremont made no attempt to interfere with his operations. He had some excuse in the desperately bad character of a large part of his army. He had Blenker's division, which was more than half his nominal force. By the 17th, Jackson was near and a little to the southwest of Harrisonburg, and here Ewell came to confer with him. We do not propose in this paper to speak otherwise than generally of the effect on the main campaign in Virginia of Jackson's movements. It is sufficient to say here that by this time Shields had been detached from Banks with more than half the latter's army. By the day when Ewell and Jackson met, Banks had evacuated Harrisonburg, and gradually withdrawn through Newmarket to Strasburg. Here he commanded about eight thousand men, of which the main body was posted at Strasburg, while Colonel Kenly, with about a thousand men, was at Front Royal, twelve miles or more to the southeast, to protect the railroad and the bridges which there cross the forks of the Shenandoah.

A few words upon the topography of the country may be useful here. From Harper's Ferry, situated at the junction of the Potomac and the Shenandoah, excellent macadamized roads lead to Winchester, thirty miles away, and something to the south of west. From Winchester, the valley turnpike runs up the valley in a generally southwesterly direction to Staunton, passing through Strasburg, Mount Jackson, Newmarket, and Harrisonburg. The distances may be roughly given as follows: Winchester to Strasburg, eighteen miles; Strasburg to Mount Jackson, twenty-three miles; Mount Jackson to Newmarket, twelve miles; Newmarket to Harrisonburg, nineteen miles; Harrisonburg to Staunton, twenty-five miles. The conference of Jackson and Ewell resulted in a decision to make a vigorous advance on Banks. By the 21st their forces were united, near Luray, and Jackson found himself in command of sixteen or seventeen thousand men, with forty-eight guns. Luray is about twenty-five miles to the southwest of Front Royal.

* 'History of the Campaign of Gen. T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, from November 4, 1861, to June 17, 1862. By William Allan, formerly Lieutenant-Colonel and Chief Ordnance Officer, Second Corps, A. N. V. With full Maps of the Region and of the Battle-fields, by Jed. Hotchkiss, formerly Captain and Topographical Engineer, Second Corps, A. N. V.' Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880.

With Jackson in front of Banks, commanding two men to his one, disaster to Banks was sure and near, especially as there was no military head at Washington. On the 23d, Jackson pounced upon Kenly, and killed, wounded, and captured nearly all his force, though Colonel Allan gives Kenly credit for making gallant and obstinate resistance. The destruction of an outpost so strong and so posted as Kenly's was would have taught a soldier that the enemy in considerable force was upon his flank, and that his rear was in danger; but General Banks was slow to interpret the signs of the time, and it was not till towards noon of the 24th, when news reached him that his train had been attacked beyond Middletown, some six miles in his rear, that he gave orders for the movement of all his forces toward Winchester. The retreat, once commenced, was rapid, and seems to have been well conducted, though it was attended with considerable loss. Colonel Allan praises the "skill and determination" of General Gordon in checking the Confederate advance, and declares that Colonel Andrews "skilfully impeded" Jackson's march, and that "the ability and courage" with which he managed his regiment, the Second Massachusetts Infantry, "were admirable." Jackson's pursuit does him little credit. With his immense preponderance of force, with the advantage of complete surprise, he ought to have destroyed or captured Banks's army. He attributes his failure to do more to the misconduct of Ashby's command, both cavalry and infantry. The needy Confederates (as afterwards, under Early, on almost the same ground) could not resist the temptation which Banks's abandoned wagons offered, and dispersed to pillage instead of pressing on to victory. Another cause of failure was Ewell's delay; but this seems to have been rather Jackson's fault than Ewell's. Jackson sent him his orders by only one courier; that courier lost his way and so Ewell was delayed several hours. All of the main Federal army except the rearguard reached Winchester by or before midnight. There, Banks says, information from every source, friendly and unfriendly alike, agreed "that the enemy's force at or near Winchester was overwhelming, ranging from twenty-five to thirty thousand." He had sixty-four hundred men, or less. "I determined to test the substance and strength of the enemy by actual collision." Was this pluck, or was it folly? Was it the sublime of daring, or the recklessness of a gambler? In the early period of the war our commanders were so apt to see lions in the path that one is tempted to praise a commander who did not let great odds scare him; but when we remember Cedar Mountain and Red River, and who was in command there, we feel that this case cannot be judged as if it stood alone. Wisely or rashly, Banks resolved to fight, and he must have left to Providence the care of his rear, when Jackson with overwhelming forces was assailing his front, where, besides some cavalry, he had only some forty-five hundred infantry and sixteen guns to put in line. The battle began early and ended at about nine A.M. The Federals fought well, but of course the Confederates were successful. Banks retreated through Winchester, and north to the Potomac by Martinsburg. He reached the river at sundown, and crossed at Williamsport during that night and the following morning. He marched thirty-four miles, after fighting a battle, in one day. Jackson tried to pursue, but his cavalry failed him again and he accomplished little.

Colonel Allan does not seem to see, and this is the only unfavorable criticism to which his book seems to us to be open, that Jackson's conduct of this operation was far from being creditable to him. Everything was in his favor. He was on his own ground, with every advantage which knowledge of the country and the zealous co-operation of every man, woman, and child in it could give him. He had more than two men to Banks's one. He had the good fortune to have a political general in command of the opposing forces. He placed himself on his flank, and almost on his line of retreat, before his approach was suspected. Yet, with all this in his favor, he not only failed to destroy or capture Banks's army, but only took from him two guns, those lost by Kenly at Front Royal, and some two thousand unwounded prisoners, and he seems to have had as many of his own men killed and wounded as he killed and wounded of the Federals. In fine, this movement of his was not, looked at by itself, a brilliant success for Jackson.

But whatever strictures may be justly applicable to the actual execution of Jackson's plan, it is true, as Colonel Allan says, that these operations "not only occupied all the troops in and around Washington, together with Fremont's forces, but for the time completely neutralized the forty thousand men under McDowell, and disconcerted McClellan's plans." In pursuance of the decision of the Confederate Government, and of the plan of making "the most energetic diversion possible to draw a portion of the forces of McDowell and McClellan from Richmond," Jackson, on the 28th, sent some troops forward to Charlestown, and on the 29th the main body of the Confederate army took position near Halltown, a village some three miles from Harper's Ferry. This was the farthest point which Jackson reached. He had already carried his instructions, our author says, to the extreme point consistent with safety. With even tolerable management on the Federal side the point reached ought to have proved inconsistent with safety. It is humiliating for Northern men to read of Jackson's successful retreat, as it is humiliating for them to read of the flank march, alike rash and successful, by which he turned and crushed our right flank at Chancellorsville. It is impossible to escape the conviction that in each case he counted largely upon the incompetency of the generals opposed to him.

On the 24th of May Fremont was ordered to move from Franklin to the Valley Turnpike, and McDowell was ordered to move twenty thousand men for the Shenandoah, on the line, or in advance of the line, of the Manassas Gap Railroad. Fremont, in the exercise of the discretion allowed him by Secretary Stanton, chose to go from Franklin to Petersburg, and thence to Wardensville, which place he reached at night of the 30th. McDowell's advance division was, by the evening of the 29th, within striking distance of Front Royal. McDowell himself, directing the march of the other divisions towards the same point, was at Rectortown on the 30th. Here the reader will do well to consult the map and enable himself to take in perfectly the situation of affairs. Jackson, on the 30th, was near Harper's Ferry with perhaps sixteen thousand men. The Federal general Saxton was at and near Harper's Ferry, with seven thousand men and eighteen guns. Banks was at Williamsport, less than twenty miles away in an air-line, with seven thousand or more men and sixteen guns; and these forces were, or should have been, ready to close in on the rear of the retreating Confederates. Fremont was approaching Wardensville, and McDowell was approaching Front Royal.

By the evening of the 30th the toils seemed to be closing upon Jackson. The head of his column had reached Winchester, eighteen miles from Strasburg, while the head of McDowell's column was only twelve miles from the same point and Fremont twenty miles away. He ought not to have escaped, and though he did, it is not easy to avoid the conviction that he is as chargeable with dangerous and culpable rashness in placing himself in such a position as are his opponents with slowness and want of energy in letting him slip between them. But in war more than in other affairs the end crowns the work, and it is sufficient to say that he adopted the simple plan of marching straight on with the utmost rapidity, and carried it out successfully. Our notice of this interesting book has already grown to such a length that we must abstain from describing the movement in detail, and we must also leave untouched the affairs of Cross Keys and Port Republic, except so far as to say that the Federal troops were defeated in each, but that the latter action was highly creditable to them.

The historian who shall have patience, leisure, and training adequate for the examination of Jackson's military capacity will have an interesting question to discuss. There is no doubt about the successes he gained, no doubt about his energy; but he took immense risks and he was lucky—especially lucky in being habitually pitted against inferior opponents. His fame is great, but whether he deserves it all is a question that does not seem to us to have been as yet thoughtfully passed upon. If he knew the calibre of his opponents, especially in the Valley, he is entitled to the greatest credit for the justice of his estimate of them. If he did not, he had no right to expect the success that attended his audacious enterprises.

RECENT NOVELS.*

IT is not often that a dull novel inspires the reader with a respect for the author, but 'Across the Zodiac' contains so many proofs of Mr. Greg's industry and ingenuity that we cannot dismiss it without expressing surprise that such excellent qualities should be so wasted. The story appears—its plot is altogether too elaborate and intricate, however, to permit us to say this with any confidence—to be a satire on certain philosophic and scientific tendencies of modern speculation. The "record" is the story of a voyage to Mars, and contains an account of the laws, language, and customs prevailing in that planet. This involves the introduction of a great deal of pseudo-scientific machinery, and the invention of a new world and its inhabitants. The work is not done in the reckless manner of Jules Verne, but with all the appearance of accuracy and respect for truth that should characterize a scientific report. Added to all this there is a love-story of which a Martial beauty is the heroine. Society in Mars, it appears, is in a very advanced state. In the thirty-fifth century of the planetary era universal communism was established, and this in the course of the next five centuries reduced the greater part of Mars to a howling wilderness. An anti-communistic society, however, was evolved from Communism, and in turn swallowed it up, after a long internecine struggle, so that in the thirty-ninth century order and civilization were re-established throughout the planet. Religion had by this time completely disappeared. Equality between the sexes had dissolved the family tie, and parental affection was a thing of the past. The enjoyment of life became the sole object of desire, and the practice of handing all children over to the guardianship of the state was before long regarded as a duty. In Mars "inheritance by mere descent" is not looked upon with much favor. Maternal affection is discountenanced as a purely animal instinct, though young planetary mothers sometimes, before parting with their children, mark them, so as to make recognition afterwards possible. Such are some of the peculiarities of life in Mars. If our readers wish to pursue the subject they will find Mr. Percy Greg's two volumes full of the most detailed information.

'Homo Sum' is a novel written on a theory. The author, in the course of his Oriental studies, came upon a narrative of early Christian ascetic life, which offered to him "a soul's problem of the most exceptional type." The story was that of an anchorite, falsely accused, who takes his terrible punishment of expulsion without any attempt to exculpate himself, and whose innocence only becomes known through the confession of the real culprit. There was to him "a peculiar fascination" in imagining what the emotions of a soul might be which could lead to such an annihilation of self, and in this way the character of the ascetic martyr became so vivid as to impel Prof. Ebers to give it expression in a narrative. It was hardly to be expected that such a narrative as this would be a novel in the modern sense of the term. Romancers may carry us back a few generations, just as poets may, but when we go back to a period so remote that it requires archæological researches to bring it before us, the novelist is at a disadvantage, even when he has a moral problem as interesting as that involved in the story of Paulus to deal with. To say that Prof. Ebers performs his task well is all that can be said. His learning is a guarantee for the accuracy of his external descriptions. Of moral analysis, notwithstanding the preface, there is little in the book. We do not feel at the end that we understand the character of the anchorite any better than we did at the outset. Indeed, Prof. Ebers draws women better than men. Miriam and Sirona have very attractive touches of nature about them.

'The Sisters,' also by Prof. Ebers, is, like 'Uarda,' which we noticed some months ago, an Egyptian novel, but it deals with a period which may be called modern in comparison with the time of Rameses II., who figured in that book, and with the general characteristics of which most well-read people must be more or less familiar. The scene is laid in Memphis under Ptolemy Philometor, B.C. 164, when the growing Roman power was beginning to be felt in Egypt. Freed from the necessity of frequent explanations the story flows with great smoothness, but the sense of freedom in this particular has perhaps betrayed the author, in such explanations as he deemed necessary, into an awkwardness of exposition which was conspicuously absent from 'Uarda,' at least after the story got well started. For example, Cleopatra, speaking of her brother Philometor, explains to her lady-in-waiting that he is also her husband, "as is the custom of the families of Pharaohs and the usage of our race"; it is doubtful if the reader needs this, and, of course, certain that the person addressed could not have needed it. Except for these and kindred blemishes there is only praise to be accorded to the story, whose vivid descriptions and rapid narrative easily atone for them. The sisters are daughters of a noble family, living in the temple of Serapis under the guardianship of a recluse, Serapion; their parents, through the plots of the king's favorite, Eulæus, have been banished to the mines and their property confiscated. The action of the story is divided between the plots of Eulæus; the ambitious efforts of Philometor's brother, Euergetes, to gain possession of Upper and Lower Egypt; the coquetry of Cleopatra, and the love of the Roman Scipio and his Greek friend for the two sisters, who are restored to their property by the aid of their lovers. Prof. Ebers says he has given history her due, but that his book is nevertheless "really a dramatic romance."

The materials out of which 'Theodora' has been constructed, including most of the characters, are the common property of all writers of fiction. Theodora is the high-spirited and noble young woman who from her very childhood is marked out for a life of self-abnegation and Christian endeavor. Alfred Fanshawe is the middle-aged roué who marries her, and makes her young life a wreck. Oldham is the wise, true, and thoughtful man who ought to have married Theodora, but now never will, and who consequently hovers through the novel as the devoted friend of the heroine, and is set down by the reader as a prig of the first water. There is a storm and shipwreck in which Fanshawe loses his worthless life, but from which his mistress, Edith, escapes. Edith tells Theodora the story of her life, and is induced by her to "go West," where, with her children, she lives a quiet, not unhappy, life, "the sins and sorrows of her early life buried in oblivion." As a contrast with the career of Theodora we have that of Cynthia Howard, a shallow, sympathetic flirt, who goes from bad to worse, until she rouges, is seen at afternoon concerts without her husband, and generally so conducts herself as to be a scandal and a reproach in the eyes of respectable women. She and Fanshawe are perhaps the most natural characters in the book. In deference to established usage two American girls are introduced. The younger is quite national. She says: "When we are at home—in Baltimore I mean—sister and I never think of going twice to the same church. For my part, I am indifferent as to what the denomination may be; I like all the little religions." Besides all this there is the love-story of Lord Atherling and Beatrice Sutherland, which is much too complicated for analysis here. Altogether there is a great deal between the covers of 'Theodora.' The author is presumably a woman, and therefore privileged to take views of life and place her characters in situations which male readers can only partly sympathize with. She has not much humor, or pathos, or descriptive power. She is duly impressed with the great truth that virtue consists in self-sacrifice, but she does not make the truth interesting. Nevertheless, any novel which contains plenty of love and misery is sure of readers, and we see no reason why 'Theodora' should not seem a revelation of life to many young persons of both sexes.

From the earliest times mankind has taken pleasure in endowing not only the lower animals but inanimate objects with speech. Scientific researches seem to show that this is one of the fundamental tendencies of human nature, and upon literature, from the fables of Æsop to those of Andersen, it has left a permanent impression. In early literature the practice of attributing speech to animals and inanimate objects is entirely unconscious. It is no more the result of a wilful poetic fancy than is the primitive habit of peopling the woods and streams with gods and goddesses. In the nineteenth century, however, it involves an effort of the imagination to make ugly ducklings or little tin soldiers talk, and the same thing may be said of Violins, which are made by "Rita" the narrators of the story of "Daphne." One is a Stradivarius, the other an Amati, and the thread of the story is taken up by one whenever it is dropped by the other. The story itself is a musical love tale. Baptista, a young Italian of great musical genius, is befriended by the successful musician Delli, and promises to become one of the great violinists of the world. He has grown up with Daphne, a young girl abandoned by her parents and cared for by an old man called Orgagna. When they cease to be children Daphne and Tista fall in love with each other and are betrothed, while Delli, becoming enamored of Daphne, at the same time forms a devilish plot to separate her from her lover and marry her himself. Delli is a soured and disappointed man, and is capable of great baseness. He makes Daphne believe that Tista has deserted her, and finally persuades her to marry him. By devotion he gradually wins his way to her heart, his character meanwhile undergoing one of those marked changes which fate so often provides for the strong, much-tempted man in novels, and which in the end make him a thoroughly excellent person. Just as he is on the eve of success in making himself master of Daphne's affections, however, poor Tista reappears, broken down by poverty and suffering (all the result of Delli's deception), invited to play at a concert in the presence of Delli and Daphne. He meets Daphne; all is cleared up, the treachery of Delli made plain; Tista plays for the company, and falls dead at the end. Then in some way Daphne and Delli become reconciled and live on together, though the lover of poetical justice resents this. The author's philosophy of life seems, however, to be one of cross-purposes. The bad succeed, and get what the good ought to have. The good die young. The constant lover is rewarded by inconstancy; the inconstant by fidelity. The two violins have a good deal to say about all this, and their reflections are not encouraging to those who like to think well of human nature. The story of 'Daphne' is pleasantly told, and the violin machinery as well managed as could be expected. It requires genius to make the conversations of violins interesting, and the author of 'Daphne,' with many amiable qualities, hardly has genius.

There is very little in 'From Madge to Margaret' to call for comment, and yet it is one of the class of books which tempt the critic to point out a certain perniciousness in them because it is likely to be pointed out nowhere else. If, in a book apparently designed for young girls, the dangers to which a young wife exposes herself who goes into society alone because her husband is too busy to accompany her, chooses her own friends among men against his advice, and finally leads one of them with whose name her own has been bandied about to express himself clearly enough to startle her into a comprehension of whither she is drifting—if such a theme is to be handled in a book called 'From Madge to Margaret,' it should be handled, one may affirm, with some comprehension of its seriousness, and the reader should not be left to suppose that the matter can be settled without explanations, with embraces, and a confession on the husband's part—of all people—that "you and I have both something to forgive." There are but two positions tenable with [illegible] to books dealing with such subjects: that none of them ought [illegible] inexperienced youth, or that only those which treat their theme [illegible] of the original existing in life should be.

Mr. Robert Grant as the author of that clever college skit, 'T[illegible]

Gods on Wheels,' which in maturity of humor and invention sufficiently apologized for its title, has already attracted attention, and his 'Confessions of a Frivolous Girl' may be said to fulfil in some degree the evident promise of the former performance. It is a trifle, and as "A Story of Fashionable Life" has small title to profound regard; and it seems to us a mistake of the author to have thus termed it and so misled many excellent people—among others, that pedant of accuracy, the Saturday Review's writer upon American society, we believe—into inferring its verisimilitude. It may be laid down of a satire that only those who know the subject more or less intimately can accept it as portraiture, and this is rather a farce than a satire. At least, we are led to believe that young ladies of New York society are in general more careful to avoid the dialect and demeanor of unmistakable "fastness" than Miss Alice Palmer and her friends show themselves on occasion; that they do not speak of going "straight to heaven without change of cars" or drink too much champagne as a rule, and that if they do they infallibly betray a consciousness of unusual daring, to give the thing piquancy, if from no other motive. Mr. Grant makes the mistake of giving thus a part for the whole sometimes. The reason is to be found, we suspect, in his own literary diffidence, and it is not to be denied that it forms an agreeable contrast to the general pretentiousness of young writers, whose treatment so often overweights its theme with a bumptiousness nothing short of owlish. At the same time it should be borne in mind that, after graduation at least, what is worth doing is worth doing well, and that in a literary sense nothing has more dignity and demands to be more seriously conceived and attentively considered than a "trifle." If he had kept this in view he would probably have made a story of real worth instead of another "skit," and his entire book would have been as good as the first chapter of it. This is very good indeed, and the disappointment involved in reading further, where at the moment of getting into deeper water he seems to abandon himself to careless floundering, ought not to be allowed to obscure the merits of it. It describes "My First Ball" (the "Confessions" are, of course, autobiographical) with great cleverness and vivacity, and no reader will fail to notice how happily the author has measured in it the frivolity which in a New York girl may be more than skin-deep, but does not penetrate beyond a strict rectitude and real dignity of character that disclose themselves—to others and to the unsuspecting young woman herself, it may be—as soon as there is any real occasion. Miss Palmer is hilariously frivolous, so to speak; but she is always conscious of it, and at least half-conscious that it is temporary. This is what foreign observers of this engaging product of American society cannot understand; and the difficulty of setting it forth in a story is great enough to make Mr. Grant's accomplishment an unusual one.

The Week.

THE letters of acceptance of both the Democratic candidates have appeared. General Hancock declares his intention, if elected, to enforce the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth Constitutional Amendments; explains the nature of the Federal Union as consisting of "the General and State Governments, each acting in its own sphere without trenching upon the lawful jurisdiction of the other"; pronounces this Union a "polity," and eulogizes it warmly; admits, however, that it has no value whatever for the protection of popular rights if the Administration is unfaithful and inefficient; and declares that it is only "by a full vote, a free ballot, and fair count" that "the people can rule in fact"; pronounces public office a trust and not a bounty, and opposes the appointment of incompetent and dishonest persons, and in case any such persons should be appointed recommends that they should be "promptly ejected." He would reform the civil service by first establishing "a basis" for such reform, consisting in the election by the people of persons possessing a high standard of qualification, and the "stern rejection of the corrupt and incompetent." This done, he thinks "the result would be decisive," but does not explain what this means. The war, he says, came to an end fifteen years ago, and peace now reigns, and our material interests demand "our constant and united efforts." He therefore recommends "a sedulous and scrupulous care of the public credit and an economical management of our Government expenditures"; also "harmony and generous rivalry among our own industries"; and concludes by promising to execute the laws faithfully. The best summing up of the letter we can make lies in saying that no one but a scoundrel or a person of defective understanding would dispute a single proposition contained in it.

Mr. English's style is less chastened than General Hancock's, and his temper much less pleasant. He opens by an elaborate eulogy on the Presidential candidate, and then points out that the Republican party has been in power twenty years, and maintains that to allow it to remain in power four years more "would not be beneficial to the people or in accordance with the spirit of our republican institutions"; that laws of entail and long tenure of office by one set of men have never been encouraged in this country, and "the great and good men" of the early period showed in many ways "their disapproval of long leases of power." He then lays bare the corruption and disorder which have been caused by long tenure of office by the Republicans, and ascribes our present prosperity to the industry and economy of the people and "God's bounteous harvests"; accuses the Republican party of centralization and encroachment on the rights of the States and other offences of a similar nature, and mentions the willingness recently manifested by "a large number of the party to elect a President for an unlimited number of terms" "as likely to satisfy thinking people that the time has come when it will be best and safest for that party to be retired." At the same time he would not on any account hinder the exercise of such powers of the General Government as rightfully belong to it, and guarantees the enforcement of the Constitutional Amendments in case the Democrats should come into power; the maintenance of a "sound currency," of the value both of gold and silver; the encouragement in every legitimate way of all the material interests of the country, and the protection of "the toiling millions" from the competition of the Chinese; the maintenance of the public credit, and the protection of liberty and property. Owing to his confidence in "the discriminating justice of the people, and their capacity for intelligent self-government," he does not doubt the success of the Democratic ticket, and draws a glowing picture of the happiness which would thus be diffused through the community.

Mr. English's contribution to the literature of the campaign may be said to consist solely in his doctrine that twenty years is the utmost period of office which any party, good or bad, ought to enjoy. This is absolutely novel, and entitles him to the rank of a "thinker." The rest of the letter consists of the usual campaign castigation of the enemy, and prediction of a "glorious victory in November." The evasion by all four candidates of the silver question is probably as discreditable an incident as has ever occurred in American politics.

There are no campaign stories worth mention this week except some trifling testimony as to the almost superhuman goodness of General Garfield's childhood and early manhood. General Meyer says that "his poor words" are wholly inadequate to describe what "a grand, good man" he is; but this suggests the enquiry, Why should General Meyer enter on a task to which his natural powers are unequal? The venerable Simon Cameron has cruelly repudiated the sentiments about the Administration recently put in his mouth by a Herald interviewer. Mr. English has been exposed as an appropriator of moneys and securities belonging to an Indiana street railroad, to the amount of $10,000, to which he held on with disgusting pertinacity until compelled to "disgorge" by a suit at law. He also only gave one dollar towards the relief of the sufferers by the Chicago fire. Other particulars of a similar character will doubtless be soon forthcoming.

General Hancock's letter to General Sherman about his duty as a soldier during the Presidential crisis of 1876 has been published. The campaign account of it before it appeared was, naturally enough, that it contained a promise to obey Mr. Tilden's orders, and to seize Mr. Hayes and confine him in a dungeon, or in one of the rooms of the Capitol known as "the American Bastile." It turns out to be a sober and very sensible discussion of the situation from the point of view of a soldier writing to his military superior and friend. He distinctly announces that he should consider General Grant as at the end of his authority on the 3d of March, and should after that date treat the decision of Congress as binding, in case it should appear that no election by the people had taken place under the conditions prescribed by the Constitution. But he falls into the error of supposing that under the Constitution a disputed election is the equivalent of a failure to elect, and gives the election of the President to the House and of the Vice-President to the Senate. The Constitution prescribes this only in case neither candidate has a majority of the electoral votes; so that the duty of the Army was not at all so clear in 1876 as General Hancock thought it was. But for the Electoral Commission he might have been forced to choose whether he would obey the orders of Mr. Tilden or of Mr. Hayes. He treats the Secretary of War and General Sherman as his possible superiors, from whom he would have to receive orders in any interval which might occur between the outgoing of General Grant and the inauguration of his successor. The letter is on the whole very creditable to General Hancock, both in his view of the nature of the crisis and of the relations of the Army to the civil authorities. He refers to two letters of General Sherman's, to both of which his own was an answer, and there is a natural desire to see them. We trust General Sherman will gratify this reasonable curiosity.

The Democratic ratification meeting last week was one of the largest of the kind ever held in New York, and for midsummer enthusiasm the fervor displayed was highly creditable to the managers. But it furnished compensation to the Republicans, who might otherwise have experienced some jealousy, and especially to the party press, in restoring Mr. Tilden to his former position of a leading topic in the canvass. He was induced to preside at the meeting and to "set the keynote" for it, we are told, and it seems to be admitted that his appearance, which the World described as ridiculous, and his speech, which was certainly in wretched taste, provoked an enthusiasm that the mention of the Cincinnati candidates failed to awaken. It was therefore possible to assume that he is the Warwick of the party and "as strong as ever," and to infer that, as the Times says, "the average Democrat does not care for a Union general, however brave he may have been twenty years ago." The importance of this unexpected opportunity is not easily overestimated from the popular point of view of the proper way of conducting a campaign. Nothing could be more cruel than the necessity of regarding as practically useless a large stock of ammunition in the handling of which practice has given you great expertness; and the Cincinnati nomination was as clearly a bitter disappointment in this sense as that made at Chicago. It has been very hard to acknowledge this, and heroic efforts have been made to disguise the fact, but "the reappearance of Tilden" would help matters wonderfully if it could only be regarded as an accomplished fact. There is still, it appears, some doubt about this, and some Democrats are complaining, we believe, that the "Tilden triumph" last week was the result of anti-Tammany machinations.

There was a sort of political debate attempted last week in Cincinnati between Judge Hoadly and Mr. Stanley Matthews. That is to say, the former spoke by invitation of a number of citizens, and on the next evening Mr. Matthews appeared in the same hall upon a like invitation. This is not the same thing as dividing an evening before the same audience, but as far as it goes it is profitable. Judge Hoadly was not so well treated by the reporters as his successor, but the burden of his discourse was the corrupt action of the Southern returning-boards in 1876, Gen. Garfield's complicity with them as a Visiting Statesman and otherwise, and his vote as a member of the Electoral Commission—in one word, the great "fraud" of 1876. To rebut the presumption drawn from their previous training, that Garfield and not Hancock would prove a statesmanlike President, Judge Hoadly curiously contrasted Fillmore's administration with what Zachary Taylor's might have been! We hope the precedent is not ominous of what would befall the country if English should replace Hancock. Incidentally some good points were made, as where the speaker referred to the fear that Hancock, like Grant, would become the creature of others—"the victim, therefore, of that class of persons to whom, if I understand General Garfield's letter of acceptance, he has pledged himself; to whom, if I understand the last clause of his letter of acceptance, relating to civil-service reform, he has pledged himself to be the obsequious servant." So, also, it was rhetorically clever and not altogether unfair to say:

"These men have both visited the South; they have both been connected with the government of Louisiana at different periods in the history of that State, and my purpose is to consider the relations which these two gentlemen have borne to the government of that State, in order that, if we can, we may be able to infer what prospect there is in the future that the same judgment exercised hereafter by the one or the other will be fruitful of beneficent results."

Mr. Matthews's rejoinder was apparently the more flexible and easy performance. He showed up the other side of the great fraud of 1876, including Oregon and the cipher despatches, and rehearsed the Democratic party's commission and patronage of frauds at the North as well as at the South, drawing some of his illustrations from the State of Ohio, and even from the immediate vicinage. He whitewashed the Louisiana Returning-Board, and said the Nicholls government "was a usurpation and is to-day"—"it was simply a case where the [Federal] Executive arm was powerless, because the facts and circumstances of the situation did not bring it within the constitutional category authorizing armed interference by the General Government." This must be considered well phrased. An awkward question for Judge Hoadly, apropos of the Democratic desire for a free ballot, was: "What safeguard has ever been proposed that has not met with the united and determined and persevering opposition of the Democratic party?"—which in Ohio regularly repeals the registration-law passed by the Republicans when in power. An unfortunate question for the speaker was: "Do you hear of any Republican meetings in those States [viz., Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina]?" On the very same day there was a large and orderly meeting in Columbia, S. C.; on the Tuesday previous, one in Blackville, Barnwell County. Perhaps Mr. Matthews has not heard of the Democratic managers' mot d'ordre that there be "no killing" during the canvass at the South—a prudential measure which, we observe, exasperates some of our Republican contemporaries.

By the end of this week the important question whether Dr. Tanner can live forty days without food will have been settled, at least so far as the belief of those who have confidence in the "watchers" is concerned. It appears from the reports in the papers that the "record" kept by the watch is, as we suspected from the first, of doubtful value. Grave inaccuracies have been discovered, or at any rate are suspected, in the record of weight, and doubts have been thrown on the competency of some at least of those in attendance to keep any record of scientific value at all. Besides all this, no regular physician of any standing has expressed the opinion that the experiment has any scientific value whatever. There is no difficulty in making physiological experiments as to the effects of starvation on animals, if they can be of any use. Under these circumstances the part which the press is playing in giving Dr. Tanner a wide notoriety is a very offensive instance of its willingness to pander to the most depraved public appetite for sensation. The details of the condition of the fasting man, published from day to day, are such that we venture to say no one who has not himself a very strong stomach can read them without being sickened, while the effect of these publications is to stimulate a morbid curiosity to see a revolting process of self-torture put into operation by a half-educated fanatic, who starves himself just as another might have himself stretched to the rack or deny himself sleep or water. There seems to be no law at present under which such an exhibition can be stopped, but there ought to be one; and that the Legislature has the right to put a stop to such a debasing form of show there can be no doubt. Dr. Tanner cannot be prevented from starving himself, but he can be prevented from doing it in public for money. As long, however, as the press gives such "experiments" its support and encouragement they will go on.

Probably New York is the only city in the world in which it would be possible to have a bull-fight under the supervision of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals. Yet this is what took place in this city last Saturday in the presence of some three thousand spectators. It is hardly necessary to say that the attempt was a miserable failure. A bull-fight is, as every one knows, a survival in civilized times of a primitive sport based, if not upon a cruel popular disposition, at least upon a positive popular liking for spectacles involving a bloody and doubtful struggle. It is necessarily a cruel and savage sport, and if attempted here in the manner in which it is practised in Spain or Cuba would be immediately suppressed by the police. That Mr. Bergh should have allowed his society to be used for the purpose of giving countenance to the absurd exhibition which came off on Saturday, is a curious illustration of that reformer's want of humor. Mr. Bergh does an enormous amount of good in the way of preventing inhumanity to animals, and it is probably on this account that his absolute incapacity to detect absurdity or incongruity does not bring the society of which he is the head into disrepute. On Saturday, of course, many of the bulls would not fight, and when they would the sport, when it threatened to become dangerous, was restrained by Mr. Bergh's efforts, who had any over-excited bull humanely led away from the ring. The rosettes, instead of being fixed into the flesh of the animals, were merely pasted upon their epidermis; and the crowd, instead of having their worst passions aroused by the spectacle, greeted the combatants with derisive cries adapted to the occasion. Nothing could well be more silly than the whole affair, which was finally wound up with a sheriff's seizure of the cash taken in from the spectators.

The very great number of accidents this summer on railroads and steamboats has not led to any suggestion with regard to legal remedies for such occurrences—probably because it is generally supposed that those already provided are amply sufficient. In cases of death by the negligence of transportation companies, however, the statutory limit of five thousand dollars damages, which prevails throughout the United States, seems very low, and it is difficult to give a reason why there should be any at all. Historically, to be sure, the matter is simple enough. Before the passage of the first English act on the subject, the law of England and the United States did not recognize any right to recover damages for the death of a human being, and, as the legislation was to be an innovation, it was probably thought well not to ask Parliament for too much. The act, too, did not provide for any more than compensation for the pecuniary loss caused by the death to the family of the deceased. There is really no reason for an arbitrary limit, and the present condition of the law makes it more advantageous for a railroad or steamboat company to kill a man outright than to injure him. While the $5,000 limit in cases of death has been rigidly maintained in this country, verdicts of juries in cases of accident without fatal result have steadily increased, both here and in England. In England a verdict of £16,000 has recently been obtained, and on appeal allowed to stand. The disproportion between such sums as this and the limit of $5,000 in cases of death is very glaring, even when it is taken into the account that the latter sum only represents the loss to the family. This is a matter which might bear legislative investigation.

During the week a further sum of $950,000 gold was bought in London for shipment to New York, although the rates for sterling exchange here are not yet quite low enough to make gold imports profitable if insurance is paid upon the coin. The Treasury has resumed weekly bond purchases, and now that the heavy half-yearly warrants have been paid (amounting during July to nearly $20,500,000), it is expected that the weekly purchases will be kept up. Notwithstanding the heavy payments last month the public debt was reduced $5,576,053, or to $1,722,698,000, exclusive of demand debt, accrued interest, etc. The surplus reserve of the New York banks was reduced to $15,842,375; some currency was shipped to the West, a good deal of coin went into the Treasury, while the money for the bonds bought did not come out of the Treasury until late in the week, and the payment of the $6,000,000 August interest did not begin until the close of the bank week. At the Stock Exchange buoyancy was the rule until Monday, when a reaction set in. The United States 4 per cent. bonds advanced to 109¾, which is much the highest price ever paid for them. Railroad bonds and dividend-paying shares also advanced largely, the most conspicuous rise having been in the stock of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, which was recently doubled and which sold on Saturday at 115¾, equivalent to 231½ for the old stock which one year ago sold at 137¾. General trade continues active, and the evidence forthcoming during the week tended to confirm the estimates that the harvests this year will exceed all others on record in amount and will equal any in quality.

The London Spectator of July 17 came very near forecasting the disaster to General Burrows's force. After rejecting the supposition that the troops of Shir Ali, the Wali, would mutiny, which is what happened, it said: "Suppose the Heratees accept Shir Ali on condition of his commanding them against the infidel." The general result is very nearly the same as if this had come to pass. That is, Shir Ali has not agreed to lead his own troops and the Heratees against the infidel, but his troops and the Heratees have found some one else who will in the person of Ayub Khan. The supposition of the Spectator expresses the suspicion which has probably been passing in the mind of most Anglo-Indians ever since Burrows marched out with Shir Ali to fight Ayub: that no Afghan troops would serve with the British against men of their own faith. It now appears that Burrows, with his small force of 2,400 men, only one battalion of infantry and the battery of artillery being European, had the extreme imprudence to attack Ayub, after he had been reinforced by Shir Ali's mutineers, and mustered 12,000 strong, with 20 guns, fifty miles from Kandahar. Burrows was crushed after four hours' fighting, losing apparently half of his force and three guns, the remnant flying in disorder into Kandahar, which is now preparing for a siege. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the disaster seems likely to illustrate Sir Garnet Wolseley's already proverbial good luck, for the London Times correspondent telegraphs that "all men's eyes in India are turned to him," Generals Roberts and Stewart being needed in the Kabul region.

The disaster, embarrassing as it is to the Ministry, who have to provide the means of retrieving it, will not damage but rather strengthen them with the country, so clearly does the responsibility of it rest on their predecessors who began the war. But, what with the Irish question, the Turkish question, and the constant tendency of the Whig wing of the party to mutiny, the situation is one which calls for all the capacity the Cabinet contains, and more. Mr. Gladstone's illness therefore, which, if not dangerous, is serious for a man of his years, and inevitably puts him into retirement for the rest of the session, is a real calamity, the full extent of which is perhaps not yet visible. There is little doubt that the Afghan reverse will encourage the Turks in their resistance, and perhaps make their despatches a little saucier. The reports of dissensions between the Powers as to the proposed coercion of Turkey are denied positively, and the "naval demonstration," whatever that may mean, is to take place, unless the Turks settle promptly with Montenegro, in which case it will, it is said, be abandoned. In the meantime, the Greeks, under advice from the Powers, have stopped the mobilization of their army, which looks as if hopes were still entertained that Turkey would yield the new frontier line. She will, if the Sultan thinks he can brave Mussulman opinion by surrendering territory without fighting. Thus far, we believe, no Sultan has ventured to cede any portion of the soil of Islam except as the direct result of defeat in the field, which is the only thing that in the eyes of the faithful can justify it. It was undoubtedly this which led to the utterly hopeless resistance in Bosnia to the Austrian troops.

The Irish Land Compensation Bill has been rejected in the House of Lords. The signs of the agitation against this House among the Radicals of which we spoke last week as likely to result from its defeat, are already apparent. The latest mails bring talk of the formation of a committee to organize a movement looking to the conversion of the House into an elected Senate. This may not amount to much at present, but if any such plan should work its way into the Radical programme as one of its permanent features it would infuse a great deal of increased bitterness into party strife, and make the alliance of Whigs and Radicals more difficult than ever. The Economist makes the objection to the bill which probably has most weight with the moderate Liberals—that inasmuch as it only singles out a portion of the landlord class for its operation, and is only to last eighteen months, it really takes property from a few individuals for public reasons, and is, therefore, bound to compensate them out of the Treasury. But this the Government does not propose to do.

The debate in the House of Commons on the resolution reprobating the erection of a monument to the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey brought out from Mr. Gladstone a denial that the Queen had initiated the scheme, or approved of it without reluctance, which makes the Dean's responsibility seem all the greater. The French press generally expresses a good deal of gratification over the debate and the result of it, as a sign of delicate friendship for the Republic, but Paul de Cassagnac, who is now the Bonapartist organ, is furious. He says the resolution was a sop designed to forward the Commercial Treaty, for which England offers a "corpse pierced with eighteen bullets," and he advises the ex-Empress to gather up the bones of the family and leave a country capable of such infamy. Mr. Briggs, the mover of the resolution, called attention once more to the fact, which yearly grows more discreditable, that the Abbey contains no memorial of one of the greatest Englishmen, Oliver Cromwell.

Professor Robertson Smith, of Edinburgh, who was tried and acquitted some time ago by the Church tribunals for unsound views about the Scriptures, has got into hot water again by the appearance of his article on the "Hebrew Language and Literature" in the latest volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica. He doubts whether Moses wrote anything but the Commandments; thinks the Jewish history down to the time of David mere "oral tradition"; and, besides some slighting remarks on the "'Song of Solomon,' alleges that in Deuteronomy the ancient ordinances of Israel were rewritten in the prophetic spirit." The Edinburgh Presbytery has accordingly resolved to ask the General Assembly to take measures to "meet the disturbance and anxiety and vindicate Scriptural principle." Dr. Begg, a leading minister, said he considered the professor's repetition of his offence a "marvellous providence," because it gave a chance to try him again, his former acquittal having been a mistake, and thinks the struggle now beginning "the most serious that has taken place in the Church since the Reformation."

THE DEMOCRATIC LETTERS.

IT would, of course, be difficult for a man with no experience of politics, or indeed of civil life, to satisfy anybody who knew nothing of him, as to his fitness for a high administrative or legislative office, and still more for an office both administrative and legislative, by writing a letter of any reasonable length. It was, therefore, not expected either by General Hancock's supporters or opponents that he would fully justify his nomination by his letter of acceptance. No matter how much he put into it he would not thereby satisfy anybody that he was the man for the place to which he aspires. But in the absence of a political career from an examination of which voters might ascertain his opinions on the leading questions of the day, it was not only desirable but, one may say, necessary that his letter should furnish with a certain fulness and detail some account of his way of looking at the subjects which are likely to engage the attention of the President and Congress during the coming four years. The country is fairly entitled to some guiding information as to the recommendations he would be likely to make to Congress, and as to the use to which he would be likely to put his vetoes, about the currency, about taxation, about appointments to and removals from office, about corporations, about railroads, public improvements, the public credit, the regulation of elections, the Chinese question, the National banks, the relations of the general Government to the States as settled (or rather resettled) by the war. Ordinarily, we admit, a candidate for the Presidency is not called on for any such exposition, because, as a politician, he usually has speeches or votes or some sort of official history to refer to. If, for instance, General Garfield had confined his letter to simple acceptance of the nomination, and for his opinions and policy had turned voters over to his speeches and votes in Congress, he would have furnished them with ample means of foretelling the policy of his administration upon every important matter now before the country or likely to come before it during the next five years. But General Hancock has nothing political to produce except his General Order in Louisiana and his letter to the Governor of Texas a dozen years ago, and in these he confines himself to the single point of the relations of the army to civil government. They would, therefore, be interesting and instructive just now if the South were still divided into military districts governed or governable by major-generals, and were unrepresented in Congress. As matters stand, they are not much more useful to the present generation than the opinions of the minority of the judges in the Dred Scott case, or Mr. Sumner's speech on the Reverdy Johnson Treaty with England. It is true he expresses his concurrence with the Cincinnati platform, but then the platform is itself extremely vague, and in any case a man's saying in general terms that he agreed with it would indicate little more, as to his political sense, than his saying that he fully accepted all Euclid's propositions would indicate as to his knowledge of mathematics. The gentleman who always "said ditto to Mr. Burke" was doubtless an estimable and modest man, but he has made no mark in history.

We are thus, after waiting a good while, left by General Hancock's letter in the difficulty in which his nomination found us—that is, the difficulty of knowing nothing about him as a politician. We see that he has a high opinion of the Constitution of the United States, and agrees with the ancient proposition "that ours is a government of divided powers," and has a strong admiration for peace and concord. But almost everybody one meets in the street has this amount of equipment for the Presidency, and would, with a little time and the help of a literary friend, produce his views on these points in as good a dress as General Hancock's letter. Unfortunately, too, Mr. English's letter does not furnish that strengthening supplement to his chief's which Mr. Arthur's furnished to General Garfield's. Mr. English's avoidance of the topics of the day is even more complete than General Hancock's, while his tone is much less dignified. Indeed, he has almost played the part of the enfant terrible which was played by Flanagan, of Texas, at the Chicago Convention. He has thrown aside all the drapery of general propositions about peace and wisdom, and addressed himself in the most unblushing manner to the single task of proving that it is not good for any party to hold the offices too long; that the Republicans have held them too long, and the Democrats ought now to have a chance at them. He feels like the hackman who said the other day in a country town that he wanted "a change of government," and was going to vote for Hancock "to see if it wouldn't make those girls in the post-office give civil answers." About the currency, nothing; about civil-service reform, nothing; about the tariff or taxation or the public credit, nothing. What he is interested in, apparently to the exclusion of everything else, is what the statesmen of the City Hall call "a new deal."

We do not think, however, that there is anything very surprising in all this. If the Democrats had a body of political doctrine which they wished to carry out in practice, or a new method of administration which they wished to try, they would, of course, have put in the field a candidate who was in some way identified with it, either as author or promoter. Having no principles or policy whatever, or at least none which, so far as we know, have been anywhere defined, any man would do for their candidate who was not likely to alarm the North about the settlement effected by the war. His having no politics to speak of would be no objection to him, seeing that the party has none itself. General Hancock, in fact, could not have made his letter a political programme with any certainty as to any considerable portion of his party agreeing with a single word of it. Of what line the party will take in legislation, if it gets into power, he has not and cannot have any trustworthy idea. It would, therefore, have been injudicious, if not presumptuous in him, to have attempted to speak for the party. No individual, and no manageable assembly, can speak for it. There is no source whatever of authoritative information about it.

On one thing in the position of the party General Hancock's letter, as elucidated by Mr. English's, does seem to throw some light, and that is the designs of the party with regard to the civil service. General Hancock studiously avoids any promise, or even expression of opinion, with regard to the mode in which this immense machine should be administered, beyond the recommending, somewhat fatuously, that men of lofty character should be elected to high office by the people. Mr. English is almost outspoken in his belief that there ought to be "a change" throughout the whole service. Now, it may be that a change is needed. A real reform party might not unreasonably hold that position. They might say that persons who have long held office under "the spoils" system are so demoralized by it that no other could be substituted without bringing in a new set of men. This would doubtless be an injudicious view, and would probably work badly in practice; but it would be a respectable one. A demand for "change" based on it would be listened to with attention, if not acquiescence. But there is really something almost impudent at this time of day, and in the present condition of the United States Government, in a demand for change, like Mr. English's, which is based on the idea that the offices are really perquisites, that one set of "the boys" has had them long enough, and that a new set should now have their turn. We care not whether a man is a civil-service reformer in our sense of the term or not, he must, if he has any notion whatever of the magnitude and importance of the public business to-day, be almost appalled at the prospect of seeing the Democrats come into power with this unblushing confession of their desire to get a share of such abuses as are going and as the Republicans have not had the courage to abolish. That General Hancock's soldierly training in order and honesty would enable him to make head against the attempt to redistribute sixty thousand salaried offices among a broken-down class of men, it is idle, after our experience of General Grant, to expect. His political advisers would have no more difficulty in convincing him than the Republicans had in convincing General Grant that, whatever the faults of his party might be, his first duty to the country was to keep it in power; that in heaven, perhaps, parties are kept in power by their virtues, but that here on earth they have to be sustained by coarser instruments; that, in short, the Democratic party must be supported as the Republican party was supported, by the use of the offices. "Qui veut la fin," they would say, "veut les moyens. If you want to prevent the country going back to the horde of corruptionists who misruled it so long you must stop 'sipping cold tea' and playing push-pin with the Sunday-school teachers, and give the offices to the men who elected you." And he would assuredly give in, and then we should have tremendous confusion, fraud, and jobbery; appointments that would disgrace the nation at home and abroad, and give the lie to every sermon in every church in the land, and after that the usual apology—"that General Hancock came to Washington with a sincere desire to purify the civil service and resist evil influences, but he was inexperienced in 'the ways of politicians'; that he was subjected to fearful 'pressure'; that he found he could get nothing done in Congress unless he gave way to it; that he got no support from his Cabinet in resisting them; that he could not possibly know the character of everybody who applied for an office; that reform of the civil service must begin with the reform of the individual man, and that when the people of the United States have purified their own hearts they will probably have pure Government officials."

THE ENGLISH DISASTER IN AFGHANISTAN.

THE merely material results of the British reverse near Kandahar have doubtless been exaggerated. Burrows's brigade has been defeated and broken up, probably with heavy loss in men and in guns, but the greater part of it has, perhaps, found its way back to Kandahar, and probably the last thing Ayub Khan thinks of is an attack on the citadel, to which the remainder of General Primrose's division has retired; nor is it at all likely that the Afghan army will wait for and give battle to the British reinforcements which are now hurrying up from every direction. Ayub Khan has struck his blow, and, whether content or not, will keep out of the way of any avenging force which he thinks is more than a match for him. This is the usual Afghan strategy. It is not very effective, but is very exhausting and puzzling for an invader. It is the strategy which was pursued in 1839 and 1841, and which has been pursued during the past year. It makes Afghanistan a very difficult country either to conquer or hold, for it prevents the invader from ever delivering a crushing blow. The attack on the Shirpur cantonments last winter, under Mohammed Jan, was a good illustration of it. It was at first reported that General Roberts had issued out of his intrenchments during the fray and had delivered a terrible counter-attack in which he cut the enemy to pieces. But the later news showed that by the time the counter-attack was delivered the Afghan force had dispersed, and the victory was a simple pursuit by cavalry of flying parties. Afghan warfare consists, in fact, simply in collecting a considerable force in great secrecy and using it for a quick dash at a careless or ill-informed enemy, and then, if the affair is not decisive, retiring to parts unknown, to turn up again on the first favorable opportunity. The men are simply peasants used to arms, and skilful enough in the loose sharp-shooting advance which all armies now practice. They have no commissariat, and rely for supplies on what the men can carry or pick up on the way, and they operate in one of the most difficult countries in the world, and are capable of splendid rushes. General Sir Donald Stewart had, in fact, in his late advance to Ghazni, a very narrow escape from the very fate which has overtaken Burrows. He fell in with a superior force and engaged it, but a furious charge of the Gazi swordsmen broke his line, enveloped his flanks, and almost reached him and his staff. His troops, which, we believe, were mainly Ghourkas, the best military material in India, happened to be extraordinarily steady, and kept their breech-loaders playing until they had swept the enemy away. But if even one company had begun to run, the force would have been "annihilated." In short, the Burrows affair is an old story in Afghan warfare. It will not cheer the Afghans up very much or seriously change the military situation.

Its significance is mainly political. What the advance of Ayub's force and the defection of the Afghan troops sent against him prove almost to demonstration is, that the thing which the Indian Government have been trying to do in this last war, and which they tried to do in 1839—set up an Amir or ruler friendly to it, or dependent on it, or patronized by it—cannot be done. It has been supposed by the supporters of Lord Beaconsfield's policy that as long as the English did not march into the country with an emperor in their hands, like Shah Soojah, to be put on the throne by force and kept there by the aid of foreign bayonets, some arrangement might be made by which the Amir, without being of foreign choosing, might be made subservient to British interests through threats or the employment of force, and by which he could be supervised by a British resident at his court. The late Shir Ali assured the Indian Government that this was impossible, that he could not protect such an envoy, and that any such open sign of his dependence as the presence of such an envoy in his capital would constitute, would so discredit him as to weaken or destroy his authority. The Beaconsfield Government, egged on by Sir Henry Rawlinson, would not believe it and acted on their own theory, we know with what results. Yakub Khan, having succeeded to the throne on his father's death, would probably have reigned in peace if the British Government had made no treaty with him and had taken no notice of him. The minute they brought him to their camp and took him under their protection, and fastened on him the position of a sovereign reigning by their sufferance, he seems to have lost all power whatever. The mob murdered the English envoy; the army proceeded to act without regard to him, and he had to take refuge in the British camp.

After waiting six months for somebody to take the vacant throne, Abdurrahman Khan, a nephew of Shir Ali, has turned up. He is a man of ability, and appears to have as strong a hold as anybody on Afghan allegiance. If the British had marched out of the country without taking any notice of him, he would probably have succeeded in making good his position without much trouble. But they have treated with him, acknowledged him, and presented him to the chiefs in solemn durbar as their man. There is hardly a doubt that this has at once made his future doubtful, and encouraged and strengthened the new pretender Ayub Khan, Shir Ali's son, who has come on from Herat, gathering strength on his way, and is now before Kandahar. At Kandahar he came in contact with the Wali set up there by the British Government, and at the very first encounter the Wali's troops deserted in a body to the enemy, drawing General Burrows into the trap which has proved fatal to his brigade. That the popular support and allegiance will now be transferred to Ayub, both in the Kandahar region and in Kabul, as the man who not only owes nothing to the foreigner but is able to fight him, all experience of Afghan politics justifies us in expecting. The British troops can easily save Kandahar from him, but they cannot catch him. He will remain in arms, threatening Abdurrahman, and if Abdurrahman fights him with British assistance, or under British superintendence, he will become so hateful to the people that the treaty with him will be of no more value than the treaty with Yakub Khan. Dost Mohammed warned a British officer in 1841 that the Afghans could bear anarchy, famine, pestilence, any calamity, in short, that heaven or man could send, without a murmur, but a master they could not stand. What he said is as true now as then. Its truth was recognized by the British Government in 1842 by simply withdrawing from the country, and letting Dost Mohammed go home from his confinement in India without conditions, and he had subsequently a long and peaceful reign. Had he been brought or sent back as a British protégé he never would have reigned at all.

The probabilities are now that the settlement with Abdurrahman Khan will, as a result of Ayub's appearance on the scene, turn out no more of a settlement than the one with Yakub Khan. The only sure way out of the difficulty, if history teaches anything on this matter, is to get out of the country bag and baggage, after chastising either Ayub Khan or somebody who will serve the same purpose, so as to restore English military prestige, and then let the various claimants of the throne fight it out among themselves, and make friends with the winning man. The British military experience of the past year shows clearly that the Afghans themselves constitute one of the best frontiers the Empire can have, far better than any mountains or passes, and that the notion that Russia is going to march through them to attack India is a deplorable delusion. If the Gladstone Ministry were bold as well as wise, they would probably solve the difficulty in this way, by dropping "the scientific frontier" and all its accompaniments and going back in a sober and rational way to the status quo. This was what was done in 1842. When Pollock had avenged the Kabul disaster and the prisoners had been given up, the troops retired without conditions and the Afghans were left to their own devices. The state of things then established has ever since worked reasonably well. It would have been still undisturbed if a dreamy romancer had not, by an extraordinary stroke of fortune, become master of British India. The result has been the loss of thousands of lives, the desolation of wide tracts of country, the expenditure of nearly $100,000,000, and the plunging of Indian finances in a disorder which is exciting veritable alarm in London. The Indian problem has now, through bad financial management, become so serious that it is threatening the repose of the whole Empire. What is to be feared is that the Jingo fever has so far affected the imagination of the present Cabinet that they will shrink from applying the only radical remedy for Indian troubles, lest they should give support to the accusation so much used against them before the election, of indifference to English honor abroad.

COUNTY NAMES.

"FIRES are raging in Franklin County, Maine." In what part of the State is Franklin County? The answer is easily found in a gazetteer, if we possess one, or, after some search, in an atlas, if the children have not taken it to school: it is a western county, bordering on Canada. "Franklin County, Missouri, has suffered heavily by the late floods." Where is that county situated? It is an eastern county, bounded partly by the Missouri River. "Franklin County, Kentucky, promises abundant crops." Is that situated west, or east? No, it is a northern county, intersected by the Kentucky River. Franklin County, Tennessee, which "is infested by locusts," is a southern county. Franklin County, Ohio, which "has been completely cleared of tramps," is in the centre of the State; and Franklin County, Iowa, where "the inhabitants are preparing to celebrate a grand anniversary," is north-central. Some people all over Maine, Missouri, Kentucky, etc., when reading a piece of news concerning their own Franklin County, may know where that division of their State is situated; outside the respective State not one in a thousand inhabitants of the United States has the faintest idea of the location of the county referred to in the report. How could it be otherwise? Were the State divisions named Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, etc., and were a certain order or symmetry preserved in the geographical application of the names of our immortals, there would perhaps be a possibility of learning how to locate in each State its Washington County or Franklin County. But this is not the case. Geographically, as we have seen, the greatest disorder prevails, and the number of our immortals is endless. In Southern Illinois, for instance, the names are thus placed in tiers: Madison, Bond, Fayette, Effingham, Jasper, Crawford, St. Clair, Clinton, Marion, Clay; and in South Indiana thus: Daviess, Martin, Orange, Washington, Clark, Gibson, Pike, Dubois, Crawford, Harrison, Floyd. No amount of reading will familiarize one with a twentieth part of the counties of the United States, as to their location, outside of one's own State.

Nor will any amount of travelling. Any Westerner who has travelled repeatedly, and by various roads, between Chicago and the Atlantic seaboard will remember a considerable number of towns, rivers, natural sites, and even unimportant stations. He will never forget Toledo, Cleveland, or Buffalo; Pittsburg, Altoona, or Harrisburg; Trenton, New Brunswick, or Newark; Syracuse, Utica, or Albany; the Juniata, the Susquehanna, or the Delaware; the sight of the Alleghanies, the Highlands, or the Catskills. He will remember places where he noticed a picturesque hill or cascade, a beautiful sunrise or sunset, or particular signs of prosperity; places where he drank abominable coffee after a sleepless night, where he was cheated by the waiter, or stopped for hours on account of an accident. His recollections will be checkered and variously instructive. But he may in ten lengthy journeys never have learned the name of a single county. No sign, no mark of a boundary, no call of a conductor ever indicated such a name. He never learned that it was on the border of Cambria and Blair Counties that he crossed the ridges of the Alleghanies; that it was the hills of Mifflin County which charmed him so much on the banks of the Juniata; that it was in Dauphin that the train was delayed on the Susquehanna; that the Delaware, where he crossed it, flowed between Bucks and Mercer; that the beautiful surroundings of West Point formed a part of Orange; or that the peaks of the Catskills towered above each other in Greene. Nor does he, while reading of things and events in Cambria, Blair, Mifflin, Dauphin, and so forth, suspect that he has traversed or skirted those counties; and he thus never connects the subjects read about with what he has seen with his own eyes. Only a few names form exceptions: Juniata County he will naturally connect with the river of the same name, and Albany County with the capital of New York. In the same way we involuntarily connect, in reading, Appomattox County with Appomattox Court-House, where Lee surrendered to Grant, and Spottsylvania County with Spottsylvania Court-House, where the armies of those generals so desperately grappled with each other a year earlier; and we locate in our mind—following our historical associations—the former county somewhere beyond Richmond, and the latter beyond the Rappahannock. But how many of us have learned to associate Henrico County with the siege of Richmond, or Dinwiddie County with the siege of Petersburg?

The exceptions stated above—Juniata, Albany—show two rational ways of naming territorial divisions, and, in fact, we doubt whether there are any other. The French adopted the one when, shortly after the outbreak of the Revolution, they replaced the historical divisions of their country—Burgundy, Languedoc, Touraine, Berry, etc., which had become obsolete or inadequate—by new ones, known as departments. These they named after their main geographical features, in a manner equally systematic and instructive. Some received their names from mountains: Ardennes, Vosges, Puy-de-Dôme, Jura, Hautes-Pyrénées, Basses-Pyrénées, etc.; most others—like our Juniata County—from rivers: Somme, Seine, Oise, Seine-et-Oise, Marne, Rhône, Loire, Loire-Inférieure, Gironde, Haute-Garonne, Bouches-du-Rhône, etc. Had the naming-committee followed our patriotic plan, their departmental nomenclature would probably have consisted of such names as Montaigne, Corneille, Racine, Molière, Pascal, Voltaire, and possibly Condé and Turenne, or even Mirabeau and Lafayette—these two to be changed by subsequent revolutions into Guillotin and Marat, Lætitia and Josephine, Saint-Louis and Jeanne d'Arc, and, after new changes, into Victor-Noir and Rochefort, and so forth. And had our State-dividers, from Kentucky downward, followed the example of the French, Franklin County, Maine, would be called Mount Blue; Franklin County, Missouri, Lower Maramec; Franklin County, Kentucky, Kentucky-and-Elkhorn; Franklin County, Tennessee, Upper Elk; Franklin County, Ohio, Scioto; and Franklin County, Iowa, Iowa-and-Otter. On this plan the names of the northeastern divisions of the State of New York would be—instead of Clinton, Essex, Warren, Franklin, Hamilton—Saranac, Adirondack, Upper Hudson, Mount Seward, Long Lake. There would be meaning, instruction, and pleasant variety in the names—all of which we miss in our twenty-eight (or more) Washingtons, twenty-three Jeffersons, twenty-two Franklins, etc. The naming, however, would have required geographical knowledge, discrimination, and an inclination to agree—more of all these qualifications than our State committees generally give evidence of.

Easier of execution is the other rational way of naming territorial divisions—the way alluded to above in the mention of Albany County. The practice of calling a division after its chief town prevails, with some exceptions—of which France is the principal—all over Europe. Of course we do not refer to the historical main divisions, nearly corresponding to our States, such as Aragon, Catalonia, Brabant, Flanders, Brandenburg, Silesia, Lombardy, Venetia, Tyrol, Styria, Croatia, Transylvania, Lithuania, South-Russia, etc. The administrative divisions of Spain, Italy, Prussia, and Russia, for instance—variously designated as provinces, administrative districts, and governments—are named after their capitals, thus: Madrid, Toledo, Guadalajara, Cuenca; Alessandria, Coni, Novara, Turin; Königsberg, Gumbinnen, Dantzic, Marienwerder; St. Petersburg, Novgorod, Tver, Moscow. Only a few of the Russian governments, such as happen to coincide with historical divisions—like Bessarabia, Courland, and Esthonia—form exceptions. Nor are the exceptions numerous in Scotland or Ireland, while in England a mixed nomenclature prevails—the counties of the centre bearing mostly names of towns, like Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Stafford, Leicester, Warwick, Worcester; and those of the southeast, southwest, and extreme north historical names, like Essex, Kent, Sussex, Devon, Cornwall, Northumberland, Cumberland. The general European plan has been in the main adopted by California, and the seafarer who sails along her shores from Oregon to the border of Mexico, and is shown the coast towns of Klamath, Humboldt, Mendocino, San Francisco, Santa Cruz, Monterey, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, and San Diego, will also have learned where the counties of the same names are situated. These sonorous names, it is true, immortalize none of our Revolutionary or post-Revolutionary heroes; but California, if led by hero-worship, might also have inscribed on her soil the name of an earlier Kalloch, De Young, or Kearney. Our youngest State, Colorado, has in its counties a mixture, without system, of all kinds of words, Indian, Spanish, and English—from Arapahoe, through La Plata and Las Animas, to Summit and Weld. May the States to be admitted be wiser in their county nomenclatures, and while hallowing no more ground with patristic appellations, save us also from such names of dubious sound as are Indiana's Dubois and Floyd! It is too much to hope that there is any possibility of transforming the thousands of names we have—more meaningless than would be A, B, C, or X, Y, Z—into others indicative of natural features or administrative connections, and thus easily learned and better remembered.

JULES SIMON.

PARIS, July 16, 1880.

AT last the amnesty question is settled: the pardon of the condemned French communards has been voted. It is needless to dwell again on the motives which made it desirable as a pacific measure, and, above all, as the only means of ridding our political world of a brand of discord, and of an equivocal question which perverted all the elections in large towns. Misled by false generosity, the working classes voted for the communards, and thus, by infringing the law, they in a manner pledged themselves to the revolutionary party, who did not fail to take advantage of the situation. Henceforth they will no longer be able to profit by these errors, and it will be more easy to resist them successfully. I shall not revert to the incidents of the second deliberation on the amnesty, either in the Chamber of Deputies on the 7th of July or in the Senate on the 9th, as they are known to you. I think it will be more interesting to give a political sketch of the eminent leader of the party who rejected and raised the most serious obstacles to the amnesty. I refer to M. Jules Simon, and in tracing his portrait I shall endeavor now and always to be just, and to remember that man is not invariably consistent, that his nature is changeable, and that he is swayed by divers motives, which we must know how to distinguish one from another. Let us first speak of his exterior and then of the orator.

At the most decisive moment of an important debate in the Senate a weak though shrill voice is heard asking leave to address the House, and a man slightly bent is seen advancing towards the tribune with slow steps as if about to give up the ghost. He invariably begins in a dolorous tone by stating he is so ill there is scarcely a breath of life in him; so he first speaks in a very low tone amid utter silence. It is well known that this dying man has, in reserve, greater strength than the most athletic orator, and that he will soon give rein to all his accustomed eloquence. He is not the first who has acted the invalid. His master, M. Victor Cousin, famous as a philosopher, and still more renowned as an unrivalled talker, did not cease during his youth to announce his approaching death, and at the funeral of a disciple only opened his mouth to repeat that he should soon rejoin him. "I knew, however, I should not die so soon," he confessed to one of his friends (Sainte-Beuve), from whom I had the anecdote. M. Jules Simon knows full well his case is not mortal; he proves it by all the power he displays in the tribune. He is, indeed, one of our best orators. His style differs entirely from M. Gambetta's; he has none of that impetuosity, of those grand gestures, that communicative fire, or Mirabeau-like eloquence, which combines cleverness with ardor. M. Jules Simon particularly seeks to please his auditors, is lavish of amiable words and charming smiles. He lacerates his opponents in the choicest language, and his speech is full of almost feline caresses. He weaves a golden net to catch his adversary, and the meshes are so fine from the solidity of his argument (one of his great talents) that the network is difficult to break. His very cleverness sometimes turns against him, for it not unfrequently renders his audience mistrustful. He is none the less recognized as one of the most finished orators of the French tribune.

If we seek to know how he has attained such a position, confirmed a few years ago by his election to the Académie Française, it will be found he has risen chiefly through his talents and personal efforts. Born of poor parents in the heart of Brittany, it was with the greatest difficulty that he pursued his preliminary studies. He is the authentic representative of that laborious democracy who, as one of our poets says, have not been nursed in the lap of luxury; from the very outset he has had to struggle against all the hardships of life. Early remarked for his talent, he was chosen by Victor Cousin as his substitute to fill the post of Professor of Philosophy at the Sorbonne. It was then he wrote his history, 'L'École d'Alexandrie,' the only really scientific book which can be attributed to him. His other philosophical writings, 'La Religion Naturelle,' 'Le Devoir,' are rather the works of a moralist than of a metaphysician. He was especially known as a rhetorician, and taught a young and enthusiastic audience how to manage the faculty of speech, particularly how to render it flexible. He already belonged to the Republican party when the Revolution of 1848 made him a deputy. During the first years of the Empire he retired into private life; by refusing to take the oath of allegiance he debarred himself from every public career. At this period he published his works, 'L'Ouvrière' and 'L'École,' on the instruction of the people, which procured him well-merited popularity. Chosen a deputy in 1863, he became one of the most influential members of the Opposition, whose recognized leader was Thiers. At the time of the war he formed part of the Government of National Defence. During the subsequent elections for the National Assembly he vigorously opposed M. Gambetta, who wished to prevent the former servants of the Second Empire from being elected members of the Republican Government. M. Jules Simon, in the name of the majority of the Government, maintained the perfect liberty of election, but from this moment may be dated the rivalry and animosity existing between these two statesmen, in which many of the difficulties in our political world have their origin.

The Minister of Public Instruction during M. Thiers's presidency, M. Jules Simon was one of his ablest supporters in the National Assembly, then principally composed of Monarchists. He is accused of having shown too much deference to the Ultramontane clergy, giving them the lion's share of the bishoprics at his disposal. His fall on the 25th of May, 1873, was consequently much lamented by the Papal legate, who said, "What a misfortune! Monseigneur Dupanloup's influence will now be paramount." You know that Pius IX. never forgave the Bishop of Orléans for having been Gallican. Mgr. Dupanloup jestingly said of M. Jules Simon: "You will see him cardinal before me." It was not until Marshal MacMahon's presidency that he became prime minister, but he was abruptly dismissed from office on the 16th of May, 1877, in spite of the efforts that he made to allay the strife against clericalism raised by M. Gambetta. The Left would certainly have overthrown M. Jules Simon had not the immoral coalition of May 16 anticipated them. He has never forgotten this fact, and it inspires his open opposition to the policy of the Left, whether it concerns the Jesuits, or, what is more incomprehensible, the Amnesty Bill. I do not pretend to say he is not guided by sincere motives when thwarting the Kulturkampf policy, but with regard to the amnesty everything in his past life ought to make the author of 'L'Ouvrière' advocate it. It is certain now that without ceasing to be Republican, which would be impossible for him, he is the true leader, or at least the mainstay, of the Right Coalition, who lavish upon him as much praise as formerly they overwhelmed him with insult when they called him Simon Magus. Without wishing to set one's self up as judge of his conscience, it is impossible to deny that it is a serious thing for a statesman to meet with no sympathy save in the ranks of enemies bitterly opposed to the cause he has defended all his life.

The stormy question of the amnesty being now got rid of, the National Fête of the 14th of July was celebrated amidst public rejoicings. The ceremony of the distribution of the banners of the Republic was very impressive and touching. Nearly the whole population participated in the fête by decking their houses with flags and illuminating them in the evening. The sombre predictions of the enemies of our form of government have been belied by the peaceful issue of the fête. É.

CONTEMPORARY PHILOSOPHY IN ITALY.

Domo d'Ossola, June, 1880.

IF we were to found a judgment upon what is contained in almost any of the recent histories of philosophy, we should be justified in coming to the conclusion that, since about the days of Giordano Bruno, Italy had contributed nothing to the advance of human thought. Even Germans, with their proverbial aptitude for the cataloguing of facts and phenomena, seem to have neglected the recent philosophy of their neighbors, the Italians, as much as that of our own country, which is separated from them by the ocean. So true is this that when Ueberweg's 'Handbuch' came to be translated by an American, it was found necessary to add a chapter on American and one on Italian philosophy. The latter, written by an Italian, is, with the exception of Professor Ferri's 'Essai sur l'Histoire de la Philosophie en Italie au XIXième Siècle' (Paris: 1869), almost the only means, accessible to students generally, of becoming acquainted with recent Italian thought. The circumstances that have contributed to this general neglect and ignorance are various: 1st, The difficulty of obtaining Italian books in foreign countries; 2d, the inability of most philosophers to read the language with ease; 3d, a prejudice against Catholicism, and a belief that it is inconsistent with an honest philosophy; and, 4th, a notion that Italy is a thing of the past, or, at best, only just waking up from a long intellectual lethargy, and lazily ranking her priest-ridden forces in the rear of those nations which, under the banner of Rationalism, have for some time been carrying everything before them. Italy, in consequence, plays hardly any part in the intellectual life of the present.

In spite of this she has, during the last fifty years, produced thinkers for genius and learning worthy to stand beside, or perhaps above, any that have appeared elsewhere. Indeed, they are so various, and have so little sympathy with or belief in each other, that unless one is very closely on his guard he is liable to see the whole movement from the standpoint of one school hostile to all the rest. This has happened to several writers who have recently written articles on Italian philosophy for English and American periodicals. They have given very one-sided accounts; and this is hardly to be wondered at, seeing that in Italy intellectual differences, always sufficiently alienating in themselves, coincide, in great measure, with religious or political differences, which, separate or united, are very blinding to the judgment, and lead even philosophers into very unseemly ways of expressing themselves about each other.

Though there is hardly any important system of philosophy, ancient or modern, that does not claim adherents in Italy, the main tendencies of thought are two: 1. That which claims supreme authority for human reason; 2. That which, in addition to and above reason, admits the principle of faith. These respectively coincide, in large measure, with liberalism and conservatism in politics, and help to emphasize the difference between them. In both tendencies there are various sub-divisions. The rationalist movement is represented mainly by Platonists, Kantians, Hegelians, and Positivists of various stripes; that which would give a place to faith, by various forms, more or less altered, curtailed, or disguised of Aristotelianism—empiricism, ontologism, and Thomism. Platonism finds its most ardent support in the aged patriot Count Mamiani, who, in spite of his eighty years and his no light duties as senator, finds time to edit a philosophical journal, La Filosofia delle Scuole Italiane, and in the early months of the year published two well-reasoned works 'La Filosofia della Realtà' and 'La Religione dell' Avvenire,' the latter of which had the honor of being placed upon the Index. Mamiani's system is the result of a long development, of which he has given an account in his 'Confessioni di un Metafisico,' a book which many persons, particularly ladies, buy, thinking it must be a companion to the 'Confessions' of Rousseau and De Musset. In his early life, when an exile living in Paris, he engaged in a philosophical controversy with Antonio Rosmini, and, though the latter's artillery was too heavy for him, it did not make him a convert to Rosminianism. It did, however, convince him of the falseness of sensism, and turn his thoughts in a direction which finally led him to a kind of Platonism. This system, which has received its fullest and most concise statement in his recent 'Filosofia della Realtà,' has many attractive sides, not the least of which is the perfect classicism of the style in which it is expressed; still, being too dogmatic for the critical spirit of the present day, it is not likely to find many adherents. Mamiani is a thoroughly accomplished man of the world, a fact which often gives his opinions a value altogether independent of his philosophical system. Having been twice prime minister under Pius IX., he has much knowledge of the inner aspects of official Catholicism, and this invests his recent work, 'La Religione dell' Avvenire,' with a special significance. It is a work which, if translated, would certainly find many readers among Unitarians and "advanced" thinkers. Kantism has had a very deep and pervasive influence in Italy, as well as elsewhere. I have not found a single thinker, even among those who in words most bitterly impugn it, who is not more or less influenced by it. Kant's cardinal distinction between the matter and form of thought reappears in a dozen different disguises, and threatens Italian—nay, even Catholic—thought with a whole avalanche of subjectivism. At the same time, it cannot be said that there is any Kantian school in Italy. Kant is, in fact, the philosophic Luther, who will deeply influence Italians, but will never find adherents among them.

Hegelism, on the contrary, has a well-defined school, headed by Prof. Vera, of Naples, who takes pride in being called Hegel's apostolus gentium. If blind faith and boundless enthusiasm were sufficient to ensure the success of a system, certainly Prof. Vera and this little band of devoted followers ought to look forward to a future all their own. On the other hand, a system which merges the matter of thought in its form will never command much acceptance among any people having the mental balance and keen sense of reality that belongs to the Italians. The bald, blighting formalism of the philosophy of the idea may suit people who have no plastic imagination; but, transplanted to the artistic soil of Italy, it must always remain a hyperborean exotic. The polemical works of the Hegelians, Vera, Spaventa, Fiorentino, are not edifying. Less fault is to be found with those of Raphael Mariano, who is the intimate friend of Gregorovius, and seems really to have dis-Italianized himself. His works, if not displaying great originality, are at least useful contributions to Italian thought.

But the most important of the rationalistic schools of Italy is unquestionably the Positivist. Though its followers are much at variance, even about first principles, they are still in a certain sense a coherent body with a common aim, that of contributing sound material for the edifice of science. What enthusiasm appears among them is strictly in proportion to the prominence lent by different minds to the negative and destructive implications of the system, and as strictly in inverse ratio to good sense and fairness. The most liberal-minded Positivists of Italy are Prof. Villari, the friend of Mill, and Prof. Ferri, whose work on recent Italian philosophy has already been alluded to. Villari's specialty is history, and in it he has done some excellent work. Prof. Ferri's productions are more strictly philosophical. Of those recently published the most important are 'La Psicologia di Pietro Pomponazzi secondo un manoscritto della Biblioteca Angelica di Roma (Comento inedito al De Anima di Aristotele,)' 1877, and 'Sulla Dottrina Psicologica dell' Associazione, Saggio storico e critico,' 1878. Both are included among the treatises of the Reale Accademia dei Lincei, of which the author is a very active member. The former, to which are appended 124 pages of extracts from the curious Angelica MS., apparently a fully written-out Collegienheft of one of Pomponazzi's students, sets forth in a very careful and concise way the psychological doctrines of one of the most original and influential thinkers of the age immediately preceding the Reformation. In these we can trace clearly the germs which, on the one side, developed into the doctrines of the Protestant reformers, and, on the other, produced that narrowing but purifying reaction which we may call the reformation within the Church. Many of Pomponazzi's views are instructive, and not a few of them valuable even at the present day. Indeed Prof. Ferri deserved well, not only of the history of philosophy, but also of philosophy itself, when he made accessible the doctrines of a man who combined, in an unusual degree, the logical training of the scholastics and the critical spirit of modern rationalists. The absence of the former of these elements in the majority of subsequent thinkers accounts for many a sad and wide-spread error. Before leaving this important work I must take occasion to correct an error of Prof. Ferri's, which would be astounding in a man so learned were it not shared by many others equally learned. "Aristotelianism," he says, "as is well known, admits nothing innate in the mind." This is absolutely untrue. Aristotle was no sensist. Let any one who believes so read the third chapter of the third (Γ) book of the 'Metaphysics,' with Thomas Aquinas's commentary, and he will find irrefutable proof of the contrary. The importance of this correction will be seen presently. The second work mentioned of Prof. Ferri's is a most careful account and criticism of the whole doctrine of association in thought, showing what it has contributed in the shape of valuable facts, and how, why, and where it fails in its attempt to be a complete explanation of the data of consciousness. This work, had it been written in English, French, or German, would have attracted a great deal of notice, and doubtless called forth numerous replies; Prof. Ferri, deeply versed as he is in the systems of Kant and Rosmini, would no doubt have held his own against all the sensists.

Inasmuch as the non-rationalistic or faith-admitting forms of philosophy are in Italy held solely by professed Catholics, the term Catholic may, for brevity's sake, be used to designate them. Now, it is well known that the recognized philosophy of the Catholic Church is Thomism, and this fact has recently been emphasized by a Papal encyclical. It might seem that, since the Church recognizes one philosophy, her thinkers would be in full accord, at least upon all essential points. Unfortunately, however, Thomism, like the two sources from which its elements were derived, Aristotelianism and the Bible, is susceptible of various interpretations, according to the mental bias of those studying it. Though the Dominicans, to whose order St. Thomas Aquinas belonged, are usually recognized as the orthodox interpreters of St. Thomas, still their authority was not great enough to prevent the Jesuits, after their order was restored and became dominant in the Church, from interpreting Thomism in their own way. Caring, as a body, comparatively little for speculative truth, and eager to limit the natural powers of human reason, so as to have all the more room for authority and obedience, they adopted the sensistic system of Condillac and insisted that it was the true Thomism. With this view they wrote numerous philosophical manuals, and succeeded in imposing them even upon the Dominicans, who received them, literally, with weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. For full half a century Catholic thought, practically legislated for by the Society of Jesus, had been tending to rank materialism, when there appeared a man who, gifted with remarkable intellect, possessed of great learning, endued with firmness of purpose, supported by the purest of motives, and encouraged by successive pontiffs, undertook to reform the thought of the Church. This man was the Abbé Antonio Rosmini, a native of Roveredo, in Tyrol, a saint, perhaps a martyr, and, if I may express my opinion, by far the profoundest and most comprehensive thinker of this century. Rosmini was thirty-three years old when his first great work, 'Nuovo Saggio sull' Origine delle Idee' (3 vols. 8vo), appeared at Rome. This was in 1830, and from that date till his death, in 1855, he poured forth a stream of remarkable treatises on all branches of human knowledge and thought. Those published occupy about forty octavo volumes, and there are several works still in manuscript. A uniform edition is now in process of publication by Speirani & Co., of Turin. When completed, it will, as a monument of the theoretic activity of a single mind, have but one peer in the whole world of human thought—the works of Aristotle.

This may seem an extravagant estimate of a man who, though he has been dead for a quarter of a century, is hardly known or named outside a small circle of devoted followers, or of a larger circle, whose members, if they utter his name, do so only with hate, and in order that it may be the more surely suppressed. The reasons for the almost universal ignorance that prevails respecting the works of Rosmini are easily discovered. As a sincere and devoted Catholic, Rosmini earned the prejudice of the whole Protestant and free-thinking world; as the opponent of sensism in philosophy, and of un-Christian hate and uncharitableness in religion, he drew upon himself the whole weight of the jealousy, bitterness, and opposition of the strong party in the Church, which has for fifty years strained every nerve to counteract his influence and dishonor his name. Having, in 1854, been most signally defeated in an attempt to have his works placed upon the Index, this party has ever since used every underhand means in its power to discredit or suppress them. But in spite of all this, the works of Rosmini live on, and are making their way, silently indeed but surely, among thoughtful Catholics. Rosmini not only worked out a philosophy, but he also left a body of disciples to take care of it. The heir of a noble and wealthy family, he devoted his fortune to the founding of an order, whose watchword was to be Charity, and whose members were to devote themselves to thought and good works. The order was approved by Gregory XVI. in 1839, and has now a considerable number of members, especially in Italy and England. A more high-minded and devoted body of men it would not be easy to find.

It is difficult in a few words to give even a notion of Rosmini's system. Technically speaking, it is objective realism; only, in calling it so, we must not forget his acceptation of objective. It may be said to be a compromise between the systems of Plato, Aristotle, St. Thomas, and what is true in Kant, and has, even on that ground, a profound interest. But there is much in it that none of these great thinkers ever dreamt of. Rosmini may not have solved the problem of consciousness; but he has cleared up many a dark point, made many a valuable distinction, refuted and ticketed many an error and erroneous system, and shown the way in which the problem may be solved. Perhaps the most important of all his works is his 'Psychology,' which, were it generally known, would undoubtedly create a revolution in that science. None of his works, so far as I can discover, has ever appeared in any foreign language, with the exception of a brief résumé of his system contained in the volume entitled 'Introduction to Philosophy.' Of this an excellent German translation appeared last year at Ratisbon. In his preface the translator says: "It does, indeed, seem strange that Rosmini, who unquestionably holds the first place among modern Italian philosophers, and whose views are every day obtaining a wider currency in Italy, should in Germany have remained almost unnoticed." This would have caused him less surprise had he known that two years ago there was not a single volume of Rosmini's works even in the library of the British Museum. Mr. Panizzi, it seems, was not very thoughtful of his great countryman.

Rosmini's system, like all Catholic systems, professes to be, at bottom, Thomism, and it certainly approaches that body of doctrine much more closely than the sensistic system it strove to replace. Still it is not Thomism pure and simple, but rather Thomism corrected, developed, and improved. This has given its numerous and bitter opponents a chance to raise against it the cry of pantheism, perhaps the most condemnatory term a Catholic of the present day can use when speaking of a philosophy. The head of the Church, meanwhile, seeing his spiritual subjects divided into two hostile camps, each claiming the whole Thomistic domain, has most wisely ordered that in all colleges and seminaries under the control of Catholic bishops Thomism, and nothing but Thomism, shall be taught. In order, too, that there may no longer be any doubt as to what Thomism is, academies for the study and exposition of the works of the Angelic Doctor have been established in several Italian cities, and one was recently inaugurated at Rome, under the immediate direction of the Pope. The purposes of the Academy are declared to be:

1. To use all efforts, in common with other academies having the same aim, everywhere to restore Christian philosophy as promulgated by St. Thomas Aquinas.

2. To keep thoroughly acquainted with all important treatises and periodicals, especially those dealing with philosophical matters, so as to obtain knowledge of the condition of the sciences in all parts of the world.

3. To publish essays, and, when necessary, treatises, in order to refute dangerous errors, or to clear up and develop points of philosophy.

4. To give careful attention to the instruction of teachers, in order that they may be especially fitted to impart scholastic philosophy.

That students may fall into no errors on account of incorrect texts, the Pope has devoted the sum of 300,000 francs to the preparation of a new edition of the works of St. Thomas. The chief editor is Cardinal Zigliara, a Dominican, who informs me that the new text will differ very widely from any of the previous ones, not excepting that of the Editio Piana. The Pope's great hobby, and it is certainly a most excusable one, is scholastic, and especially Thomistic, philosophy, the result being that there is at this moment a philosophical activity in the Church such as she has not known for hundreds of years. This activity, applied to the works of so great a thinker as St. Thomas, cannot fail to produce good fruit, especially as it is decreed that none of his doctrines which conflict with the truths of modern science shall be maintained or taught. The fight between the Rosminians and the sensists goes on unslackened, and both are targets for nearly all the schools of rationalism, whose arrows in many cases produce a profound impression. It is to be hoped that out of all this turmoil Italy will arise philosophically regenerated.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Civil-service reform is much preached and little practised. Why do not ideas so simple and practical make more progress? That a stream can rise no higher than its source has been shown incessantly in our politics. It is idle to attempt to graft such a reform on a political trunk that is alien to it. In other words, when the people are ready for it the thing will come of itself.

By way of preparing the people, are not its advocates attempting too little? Why should simple fitness be a standard of appointment and tenure in the case of national offices when the daily life of citizens habituates them to a merely political test for all others? The germ-cell of the nation is the commune; and here is the point of attack for reformers. The folly of identifying communal with national politics can be made obvious to the meanest comprehension. What matters it whether a pound-master or a fence-viewer be Democrat or Republican? In communal affairs, at least, there should be as many new parties as there are new measures proposed; and there should be too much effervescence to allow political crystallization. When party "bosses" cannot bestow local office as rewards for adherence to their fortunes, one important source of their power will be dried up. And, further, people will largely lose the habit of acting in masses at elections. This latter effect will tend to independence in all politics. Local office, it should be remembered, is a vastly greater element of political cohesion than the comparatively small number of national offices. Then let the reform be aimed to inoculate the people with independence in local affairs, and when that is accomplished the rest will follow.

HARRY P. JUDSON.

TROY, N. Y., July 7, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the article entitled "The Civil-Service Issue in the Canvass," in your number of July 22, you say, "To Mr. Hayes himself it seemed as if he stood alone, as if the country was not yet ready for civil-service reform." That sentence would make an excellent text for a sermon to be preached to the Independents. Not only has Mr. Hayes found by sad experience that the country is unprepared for the reform, but every thinking man who calmly views the present state of parties must come to the same conclusion.

I submit to you the opinion that this great reform is not to be accomplished by a Presidential election or by any President. This is fortunate; for if the executive branch of our Government could by an edict and its authority change our whole civil-service system we might as well have absolutism and the Czar of Russia himself. Our reform is to be accomplished as the English reform was accomplished—by agitation and a bill in Congress. We must begin with the agitation, and the charge I make against the Independents and civil-service reformers is that they have neglected this agitation. By agitation I do not mean admirable articles in the North American Review and clever speeches in select reform clubs, but a thorough stirring up of the mass of the people in language they can understand; the reformers must come in actual contact with the masses and show up the abuses of our present system in the clearest light. We must imitate the Loyal Publication Society of eighteen years ago, and among high and low, rich and poor, become earnest propagandists. To reform an abuse it must be shown that it is too outrageous to be borne. The abolition of slavery and every great reform were carried in this way, but our reformers seem to have forgotten it. As a consequence the country is not ripe for the reform. The majority have no definite and accurate idea of it; many know it only by name, many suspect it of being visionary. It will never be carried until the people make such a clamor for it that the venal press will have to support it, and some party be obliged to promise to put it into effect.

HARTFORD, July 30.

GENERAL GARFIELD AND MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation of July 29, No. 787, says: "It is singular to reflect that while it was through General Hancock that Mrs. Surratt was hung, it was partly through the efforts of General Garfield that the practice of hanging Democrats by means of military commissions was brought to an end." This in reference to the able argument of General Garfield in the Milligan case in 1866, reported in 4 Wallace.

The military commission which hung Mrs. Surratt was convened by an order of the President. Its findings and sentence were approved by him, and their execution ordered by him. The official papers passed through General Hancock's headquarters, as commander of the military district in which it sat, and he had no more to do with them than his adjutant-general who transmitted them to the officer next in rank below him, or the headquarters clerk who wrote the endorsement on them, or the orderly who carried them. It was through, but not by means of, or authority of, General Hancock. The President and his advisers are solely responsible for that execution.

General Garfield's argument in the Milligan case is an able and luminous résumé of the struggle of Anglo-Saxon liberty against despotism, of the resistance of English freemen to all attempts to deprive them of life, liberty, or property except by trial by jury. It proves that he has studied and appreciated the history of the passions of parties, and the frenzy of factions, who time and again in England have attempted to deprive their conquered opponents of the rights guaranteed by Magna Charta. With this knowledge fresh in his mind, from his argument as counsel, in December, 1866, General Garfield in March, 1867, supported with voice and vote the reconstruction measures which established military commissions in ten American States long after the war had terminated, as has been judicially decided by the Supreme Court.

Under operation of these reconstruction laws, in November, 1867, one McCardle was held for trial before a military commission "for opposing reconstruction." He appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Circuit Court of Mississippi refusing to release him on habeas corpus. His appeal was argued on the 2d, 3d, 5th, and 9th of March, 1868 (6 Wallace 318), and held by the court under advisement. Before his right to appeal was passed upon, on March 14, an amendment to a Senate bill was slipped through the House by a trick, depriving the Supreme Court of jurisdiction "in all appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken in habeas corpus." It was generally understood that the Supreme Court in deciding McCardle's case would decide the whole scheme of reconstruction to be unconstitutional, and the Democrats two days afterwards in the House made great outcry at the advantage that had been taken of them. Whereupon Schenck, of Ohio, avowed in the debate that the object of the law was "to clip the wings of the Supreme Court" (Cong. Record, March 21, 1868).

The act was vetoed by the President, and passed the House March 27 over his veto. General Garfield is not recorded as voting, but the discussion in the House and a very bitter attack in the press had directed the attention of the country to the matter; therefore his silence must be construed to be consent. The Supreme Court, in obedience to this act of Congress, dismissed McCardle's appeal (7 Wallace 515). Yerger's case (8 Wallace 85) was another case where a party was held for trial by military commission for murder. He was released under the constitutional jurisdiction of the court.

Hence I respectfully submit that the Nation has not spoken with its usual accuracy in saying "it was through"—i.e., by means or authority of—General Hancock that Mrs. Surratt was hung, and that General Garfield assisted in putting a stop to the practice of hanging Democrats by military commission. It seems to me that General Garfield helped to inaugurate a very general practice of hanging Democrats by military commission when he first aided in subjecting millions of them to trial by those tribunals, thus depriving them of trial by jury; and, second, allowed them to be deprived of the right of habeas corpus to the Supreme Court. B. T. J.

Baltimore, July 31, 1880.

[Our jocularity shall not cost us so dear but that we will remark on the above letter that the Milligan case arose in a State not under military subjection, and which had never been at war with the Federal Government; and that it was quite possible to condemn without inconsistency the proceedings which General Garfield condemned as counsel, and to approve by voice and vote the general method of reconstructing the South. Moreover, the privilege of appeal denied McCardle by special statute was only a year old, having been instituted in a reconstruction measure framed with a view to the better protection of the freedmen and white Unionists.—Ed. Nation.]

THE NEW-LONDON MANAGERS DEFENDED.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In reply to a Boston correspondent ("E. S. P.," in the Nation of July 22), who expresses regret both because the press in general has refrained from condemning the "observation train" by which two people were killed at the Harvard-Yale boat-race, and because you in particular have entirely acquitted from blame the management of that train, I wish to suggest (1) that the mere fact of the chief victim's being a prominent railroad president riding on his own special car, which was presumably released from the stringent regulations governing the cars to which the public were admitted, tended to restrain the censors of the daily press from indulging off-hand in their usual tirades of denunciation, based upon the first imperfect telegraphic reports; and (2) that the Nation of a week after the event pronounced a verdict of acquittal because its editor understood the real circumstances of the case a great deal better than "E. S. P." understands them.

As all the printed accounts which I have seen—and I do not believe any can have escaped my eye—are lacking either in accuracy or completeness, it may be well for me even now to tell the truth about the train to "E. S. P." and the people who read his letter, especially as, two days after the date of this, the Boston Advertiser printed a similar communication signed "Safety," which was so absurdly and ingeniously false as to make "E. S. P.'s" mistakes and misapprehensions seem almost respectable in comparison.

In 1878, when the race was first appointed for New London and announcement was made that a "moving grand stand" would be run along the railroad which skirts the shore, some doubts were publicly expressed and more were privately entertained as to the practicability and safety of this novel device for affording spectators a continuous side-view of the competing boats. After the event, however, a unanimous cry of applause was raised by the press in honor of the sagacity and courage which had conceived and persisted in this idea, and the carefulness and forethought shown in the actual demonstration of its advantages. The Nation's correspondent in particular was enthusiastic in praise of the train and its management, saying: "It is one of the traditions of our railroad system that the passenger should be kept in ignorance as to the intentions of the company with regard to their disposition of his person and effects; so that the pains taken in this case to give every one of them exact information as to the plans of the managers concerning him make the train remarkable in the history of transportation as well as of boat-racing." The allusion is to the fact that the conductor in charge of each car distributed among his passengers a printed bulletin of the race, announcing among other things that the train would be pushed and not pulled, —the southern engine first shoving the cars and the northern engine to the starting point, and the northern engine then shoving the cars and southern engine back again. These are the exact conditions under which the train was run in 1880 (in 1878 and 1879 the southern engine was detached and ran ahead as a pilot); and all "E. S. P.'s" and "Safety's" criticisms based upon the assumption that the southern engine was pulling the train at the time when the couplings broke are, therefore, aside from the point.

Fully realizing the vital importance of their regulations, the managers have on all three occasions been personally present to see to the enforcement of them—the general superintendent of the road, Mr. G. W. Bentley, riding in the northern engine, and the general freight agent, Mr. C. F. Spaulding, riding in the southern (in 1878 and 1879 in the southernmost car); and the positive testimony of the latter gentleman that his engineer at the time of the break was duly obeying orders and allowing his machine, with steam shut off, to receive its momentum from the rear, cannot be questioned by any one. But even under these conditions, "E. S. P." objects that "the great weight and consequent inertia of a locomotive is an unmanageable element, for it acts like a slung-shot, and can hardly be controlled at the end of a long line as it might be close at hand." This objection undoubtedly has force, but it may be said in reply to it that the train had been stopped by the rear engine at least three times in 1878, '79, and '80, without developing in the front engine enough "slung-shot" power to snap the couplings; and the presumption is that the second and third stoppages appointed for this year might have been made with equal success, had no additional strain been brought to bear.

Unfortunately, however, this additional strain was brought to bear when the directors of the Boston & Albany Railroad added to the engine their "special palace-car," weighing fully thirty tons. The engine and car combined made a "slung-shot" of such weight and inertia that when the rear engine shut off steam and brought the twenty-five platform-cars very gradually to a stand-still, this "slung-shot broke loose from the string," and the two persons who were standing up on the front end of their special flat-car (whose ends had not been provided with railings, like those protecting the cars to which the public were admitted) were shaken off by the recoil. None of the passengers, save those close to the front, suspected that anything unusual had happened. This shows the extreme slowness with which the cars were moving at the moment when the break took place, and that they were not torn asunder with the "suddenness" assumed by "E. S. P." As it took the boats twenty-four minutes to go the four miles, the train which kept opposite them never moved at a faster rate than that of ten miles an hour.

The coupling which broke proved to be a defective one, though the defect was so latent that it escaped the attention of the Boston & Albany officers who sent it, as well as that of the local examiners. The car was such a very heavy one, however, that this bad link might perhaps have been snapped by the strain of stopping, even had the weight of the engine not been added; whereas, had the link been sound the combined car and engine might very probably have failed to break it. Furthermore, the fact should not be lost sight of that even had there been no unexpected stoppage, by reason of the interruption of the race caused by the snapping of a rowlock in the Yale boat, the same break would probably have happened when the train came to its expected stop opposite the finish at Winthrop's Point; and there is no good cause for assuming that Mr. Lincoln and his companion would have been more on their guard then than in the former case. They knew that Yale had ceased rowing, and, though I believe Harvard's movements were temporarily hidden from them, they must have assumed from the "slowing" of the train that it was about to come to a stop also. If they failed to be on their guard then, they would presumably have been equally careless in preparing for the duly-advertised stop at Winthrop's Point. I draw attention to this to prove that the accident was at least not due to the train managers' losing their heads in the face of an emergency which had not been anticipated. There was no confusion or hesitation on their part. They acted exactly as every passenger who read the printed announcement placed in his hands might have expected them to act. They carried out their published programme to the letter; and it was a programme which for two seasons had met with universal public approval. The opinion of "E. S. P.," that "the shock came as a natural consequence of the way in which the train was arranged," though a true opinion, is based upon a misconception of the facts; for these, rightly understood, can cast no shadow of blame upon any one of the New London managers.

The two engines were "made to move back and forth as if they were one machine," because they had but one commander, instead of being, as "E. S. P." wrongly assumes, "impelled and controlled by two separate minds." The bell-rope, of a single unbroken piece, which connected the two locomotives, was cut by the master car-builder after the accident, when it became necessary to detach the special flat-car. This line ran along on top of the canvas coverings of the cars, and holes two feet square were cut in the coverings in order to make it readily accessible to the men in charge of the brakes of each car, who were required to have constant hold of it, so as instantly to detect any signal. Yet the Advertiser's correspondent slanderously asserts on hearsay evidence that the entire absence of any mode of communication on the train was one of several particulars in which "gross and criminal negligence was shown"! The twenty-four cars were selected for the train, with special reference to strength and safety, from a much larger number; many were new, and all were sound. The master-mechanic and master car-builder of the road, with a suitable force of mechanics, gave personal attention to every car chosen. The amphitheatre-like frames for seats were made of timber sufficiently strong to sustain four times the weight of the intended load. The parts were bolted together rather than nailed, and the seats also were firmly secured. Across the ends of each car a stout railing was firmly bolted, not only as a protection in the event of a sudden start or stop, but to prevent passing from one car to another, which would be dangerous when the train was in motion. Access was gained from the front centre of the car in every case.

Two years' experience had convinced the managers of the danger of their plan of having the front engine run ahead as a pilot, especially among the excited crowds at the finish, and, worst of all, when the race ended after dusk, as in 1879. Safety demanded that there should be a considerable interval between the detached engine and the following train; and in this interval the people or animals that had been warned or driven from the track by the whistle and bell of the pilot might step back on again and be crushed by the less noisy train. Again, if the detached engine should break a wheel or become derailed, the consequences to the train would necessarily be very disastrous. Hence, as no guaranty of a clear track and safe passage for the train would be possible without an engine at the head, it was decided to have it attached there, but with steam shut off. No one of the managers has yet seen any reason to doubt that this is the best possible plan, or to hesitate about adhering to it hereafter. One serious objection to having the cars pulled by a single engine in front is the discomfort and danger caused passengers by the showers of cinders that would fall on them, not to mention the results of a possible break in the centre of the train.

When "E. S. P." asserts that "people should not be invited to expose themselves as these two unfortunate people were exposed," he really says not a word against the observation train proper, or against the New London managers, for they never invited any one to expose themselves in such a way. He simply censures the three railroad presidents (one of them no longer living) who did invite their dearest friends to the fatal palace-car. Respect for the rule de mortuis, if no other consideration, prevents my expressing an opinion as to the justice or injustice of such censure. If the "errors in judgment," which he mentions, really were committed, the penalty therefor fell upon the shoulders of those, living and dead, by whom they were committed. To discuss such a point would be a needless cruelty, and the decision of it one way or the other could subserve no public purpose. It is enough for me if I have vindicated the New London management on its own positive merits, and have justified the observation train's right to exist. I have no desire to resort to the negative defence of detraction, or to pronounce a word in condemnation of any one connected with the case.

The real danger which threatens the visiting public at New London—or which would threaten it were the present managers to be superseded by others less careful and sagacious—is not connected with the observation train, but attaches rather to a theory of management hinted at by the writer who supplied to the Nation its report of the boat-race. His suggestion that perhaps the addition of subsidiary "events" might attract a larger crowd to the Harvard-Yale contest, would, if adopted by the managers, have a tendency to put more lives in peril annually than the running of a dozen observation trains. Easily as one may abuse the superlative degree, I am surely within the limits of moderation in saying that the unanimity and unreservedness of the praise bestowed by the newspaper press, for three successive seasons, on the New London managers, is something entirely singular and unique in American aquatic annals. That praise would never have been won, however, had not those managers accepted at the outset, as a vital rule for their guidance, the theory that in a college rowing contest on the Thames a single race between two crews is the most that may be safely attempted within the limits of a single day. The experience of three seasons has simply served to strengthen them in that theory. They believe, furthermore, that the people of New England who take pleasure in seeing a short, sharp, and decisive trial of strength between her two oldest and most famous colleges, will always be attracted to New London in numbers sufficiently great to make the profits of transporting them pay for the costs of good management; and they have no intention of ruining their own present prestige by attempting a complicated "regatta" which might attract a larger crowd than they could safely control.

Washington Square, N. Y., July 28, 1880.

Notes.

T. H. S. HAMERSLY, Washington, has published in a thin pamphlet an alphabetical 'Register of Cadets admitted into the U. S. Military Academy at West Point from its establishment till 1880,' compiled by Col. Robert H. Hall, U.S.A. The value of this list is increased by tables showing the results of examinations for admission, and the corps to which graduates have been promoted. Three-fourths of the cadets appointed have been admitted, and only since 1866 have grammar, geography, and history furnished grounds of rejection. The same publisher has in press a work of much greater magnitude and interest, viz., 'A Complete Regular Army Register of the United States from 1779 to 1879.' In addition to what the title promises it will contain an alphabetical register of all appointments by the President in the volunteer service during the rebellion, a list of battles in which the U. S. Army has been engaged, and much other statistical matter of importance.——James J. Chapman, Washington, will shortly have ready Major J. C. Tidball's 'Manual of Heavy Artillery Service' for the use of the army and militia of the United States. Mr. Chapman also announces McPherson's 'Hand-Book of Politics for 1880,' uniform with the series for 1872, 1874, 1876, and 1878, and, like them, invaluable.——A Life of the late Dr. William Rimmer, by Mr. T. H. Bartlett, a fellow-sculptor, is in preparation, and will be published by J. R. Osgood & Co.——The American News Co. publish immediately a 'Life of Gen. Winfield S. Hancock,' by Alvan S. Southworth, with an introduction by Senator Bayard, and "fresh contributions" by Senators David Davis and Wade Hampton, and Messrs. D. D. Field, A. S. Sullivan, C. F. Adams, R. A. Pryor, A. S. Hewitt, and—John Kelly.——The American Association for the Advancement of Science will hold its annual meeting at Boston, beginning August 25, in the halls of the Mass. Institute of Technology. There will be excursions to Cambridge, Salem, and "down the harbor."——Macmillan & Co. will issue a second revised and enlarged edition of Dr. Carter's excellent little work on 'Eyesight,' as also, 'Food for Invalids,' by Drs. J. Milner Fothergill, of London, and H. C. Wood, of Philadelphia. They have received the third part (Lit-Red) of Skeat's 'Etymological Dictionary of the English Language.' The fourth and last part, including a list of roots and various word-lists, is promised by November 1.——Progress in picnicking is marked by an actual 'Hand-book of the Yellowstone Valley, for Tourists and Settlers,' which comes to us from the St. Paul Book and Stationery Company. "Market Prices in the Yellowstone Valley" have been kindly furnished by a merchant of Miles City, a town situated on Tongue River, 325 miles from Bozeman, and reached at a cost of $42 in stage fares.——The current issue of the series of "Personal Narratives of Events in the War of the Rebellion" (Providence: N. Bangs Williams & Co.) tells of the fortunes of Battery F, 1st R. I. Light Artillery. It is not much enlivened by incident.——Mr. W. H. Bishop concludes his estimate of Mr. Vedder in the June number of the American Art Review (Boston: Estes & Lauriat). His "Sleeping Girl" and "Venetian Model" are very well represented by wood-cuts, the former by Mr. W. J. Linton, who in yet another paper on American wood-engraving gives a valuable analysis of the merits of the cuts (including his own) in Appleton's 'Picturesque America.' Among the illustrations are an etching by S. Colman ("Durham"), one by Unger after Schreyer ("The Wallachian Team"), and woodcuts accompanying Sig. Alessandro Castellani's enthusiastic description of some mural paintings and stuccos recently discovered near the Farnesina in Rome. A letter from Mr. John Sartain reveals what a tremendous monument to Washington is likely to be set up in Philadelphia by the Society of the Cincinnati of the State of Pennsylvania. ——We read in the Athens Ephemeris of June $\frac{13}{25}$: "The well-known Philhellene, Stillman, being in Ithaca a few days ago, found in the locality called Polis, in the northwest part of the island, a very old inscription engraved in seven lines boustrophedon. The ministry immediately telegraphed orders for its careful protection. Mr. Stillman starts to-day for Florence."——'Our French Allies, 1778–1782,' is the title of a work in preparation by the Rev. Edwin M. Stone, of Providence, R. I.——The July number of the Harvard Register is exclusively occupied with the exercises and rather staid oratory of Class-Day and Commencement.——The July number of Le Livre has for its chief article an account, with translations, of the unpublished 'Traité de la Patience par emblèmes' of George Hoefnaghel, a Belgian artist of the latter half of the sixteenth century. Some of the fac-similes are in full, others fragmentary, and all interesting; none more so than those of the "Cornard patient." On p. 59 the present law of colportage is given, and is a curious reminder of the restrictions upon the freedom of the press in France. Those who advocate at least the civil equality of the sexes will enjoy the review of Dr. Louis Fiaux's 'La Femme, le Mariage, et le Divorce,' a vigorous protest against the subordination of woman enforced by the Code Napoléon.——The sixth fascicule of Vapereau's 'Dictionnaire des Contemporains' (New York: F. W. Christern) concludes the first and begins (with I) the second volume. Victor Hugo and Ledru-Rollin receive by far the greatest attention. After these, Isabel II. and Juarez are most prominent.——In the July number of the Theatre Mr. Clement Scott, the editor, prints an account of the first performance this year of the passion-play at Ober-Ammergau, revised from the letters he wrote as special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, and illustrated with drawings of the principal actors and of the crucifixion. To the same number an interesting account, also illustrated, of the Dutch comedians recently in London is contributed by Mr. Henri Van Laun, a fellow-countryman.

—Last March, in No. 769 of the Nation, attention was called to the peculiar value of that part of the Annual Report of the Massachusetts State Board of Education which contained the results of Agent Walton's examinations of the public schools in Norfolk County. The Legislature, with creditable liberality, has permitted the county association of school committees to use the plates of this portion for a commercial edition, which has accordingly been brought out by Lee & Shepard, Boston. We will just remind our readers that the revelation of imperfect methods of teaching herein made was clinched by abundant lithographic fac-similes of the extremes and mean of the several written papers in each class. These actually fill more than half the pamphlet, and will, if debate flags in our summer educational conventions, be found an infallible means of arousing interest and restoring the flow of words. We might even recommend the pamphlet for seaside reading, seeing how irresistibly droll are some of the memorized versions of the story of Cyrus and the two boys with their misfitting coats. But illiteracy and dulness are always as pitiable as they are laughable, and they are serious enough when intrenched in our public schools. We shall do better, therefore, to urge every intelligent parent to study this report attentively, and to present a copy to the teacher of every school, whether public or private, in which he is interested. It will be sent post-paid by the publishers for fifty-five cents.

—The third instalment of Dr. Elliott Coues's 'Ornithological Bibliography' is still in the press, having been delayed by its unexpected extent. Meantime, extracted from the Proceedings of the United States National Museum, we have the fourth instalment, being a 'List of Faunal Publications relating to British Birds.' Such a list, of course, could not possibly be made complete out of England, and the compiler himself points out its inadequacy. Nevertheless, it embraces something like a thousand titles, only in a comparatively few cases taken at second-hand, and is so accurate and punctilious as far as it goes that to call it a "published proof-sheet" is almost an excess of modesty. The titles are given in full, and even, as in the first two (different editions of the same book), with the typographic errors and inconsistencies of the originals. Further, they are arranged chronologically, and copiously annotated, not seldom with the aid of Prof. Alfred Newton, of Magdalene College, Cambridge. We meet here, of course, with the editio princeps of White's 'Selborne' and of Bewick's 'British Birds,' and the manifold subsequent editions, so that this list possesses even a literary interest. Under Macgillivray, Dr. Coues expatiates somewhat warmly upon this naturalist, for whom he confesses a strong liking, and of whom he says:

"William Macgillivray has one very high claim upon the regard of American ornithologists: he was the source of Audubon's inspiration in all that pertains to the technic of the latter's great work. 'Not to put too fine a point on it,' he furnished nearly all the 'ornithology' of Audubon's work, as distinguished from the portraits that the Frenchman drew either with pen or pencil. . . . The anatomical matter . . . is probably all Macgillivray's; and the final classification and nomenclature are from the same source. . . . The full extent of his joint authorship is not generally known."

Mr. Newton contributes a list of nineteen distinct editions of Gilbert White. An index of authors follows the text. Some idea of the labor involved in Dr. Coues's task may be formed from the fact that the four instalments of his Bibliography will enumerate but a fifth of the total number of titles (30,000) which seem to lie within his reach—that is, if the leave of absence which the leading British naturalists have requested for him be granted.

—Palæontologists and naturalists generally will learn with satisfaction of the appearance in connected form of the results of a portion of Prof. Marsh's wonderful palæontological discoveries in the Western Territories. The series of explorations so successfully carried on by this distinguished naturalist in the Rocky Mountain region since 1868, undertaken at no inconsiderable personal risk and no less considerable outlay of private capital, has resulted in the acquisition by Yale College of the most extensive collection of fossil vertebrate remains in the world. Huxley's visit to this country in 1876 was largely, if not mainly, brought about by his desire to examine personally this collection. Some notion of its extent may be gleaned from the fact that of Pterodactyls (flying reptiles) alone it embraces fragments belonging to at least six hundred individuals, and of Mesozoic birds—a class of remains which, as far as number is concerned, has thus far yielded the most barren results in extra-American countries—fragments representing more than one hundred individuals. The work before us, which is intended to form vol. vii. of the geological reports of the Fortieth Parallel Survey, deals with the Odontornithes, or extinct toothed-birds of North America. These, belonging to the middle-cretaceous period, are the oldest ornithic remains as yet discovered on this continent, and, with the exception of the three specimens of the Archæopteryx unearthed from the Jurassic lithographic limestone of Solenhofen, Bavaria, represent the oldest known form of birds altogether, for the footprints in the Triassic sandstone of the Connecticut valley are now generally referred to Dinosaurian reptiles. Despite their strongly reptilian characters—among others, the presence of teeth in the beaks—which point to a position low down in the avian branch of the Sauropsida, Prof. Marsh argues, from the structural differences existing between such forms as Hesperornis and Ichthyornis, and between these and Archæopteryx, which appear greater than those presented by any two living birds, that they represent comparatively highly specialized types, and that we must look for the earliest appearance of birds in strata possibly as old as the Permian (Palæozoic). The magnificent engravings which accompany the work render it a livre de luxe, and place it in the category of recent American scientific works next to Leidy's 'Rhizopods,' to which we lately had occasion to call attention. We are informed that another important work on the extinct vertebrata of the West is shortly to appear, from the pen of Prof. Cope.

—Two college addresses delivered during the recent commencement season at Southern institutions are symptomatic of political progress in that section. Mr. John Hampden Chamberlayne, editor of the Richmond State, speaking to the Society of the Alumni of the University of Virginia, chose the negatively cheering subject, "Why Despair?" His aim was to show that the pessimism engendered by the Southern catastrophe had no reasonable foundation: that the civil war was, among its kind, notably humane; that the country is a great and happy one to be born into; that it has seen its worst days of political corruption; and that the duty of the hour is to attack and destroy the spoils system of party government, from which, as Mr. Chamberlayne justly remarks, "it arises that ten long years have not brought real peace between the sections." This is novel and refreshing talk from a Southern journalist, and passages like the following inspire respect for the orator:

"Compare the Iron Duke [in Spain] with Lee or Rosecrans, with Thomas or Sherman, or Hunter or Sheridan, and the marches of the armies in our civil war were parades, or pleasure excursions, or philanthropic adventures."

"Just now how can we be fearful when the month that ended yesterday has seen a struggle on the largest scale between evil forces and forces of good; has seen a corruption which was organized throughout our civil life, and spread its network over a continent, calling in vain upon the country to condone it, and to place its chief leader in the seat of power? This same June has seen a military idea, a bastard imperialism, a junkerism, a Bismarckism, a Cæsarism, strengthened by a vast conspiracy of political adventurers, arrogantly claim, but claim in vain, for itself that the country was powerless to resist it."

—Mr. Edward McCrady, jr., addressing the Euphemian Society of Erskine College, S. C., on the "Necessity of Education as the Basis of our Political System," would probably not do the Republican party the justice rendered it by Mr. Chamberlayne in the extract just quoted. His very proper theme connects itself with a plan of his to perpetuate the rule of the white minority in South Carolina neither by fraud nor by violence, but, namely, by imposing a reading and writing qualification for the suffrage, as in Connecticut and Massachusetts. He makes an ingenious argument for the power to do this under the general constitutional provision for the registration of voters: such as could not register themselves should be excluded. This, however, would disfranchise say 12,000 white voters who fought the battles of the Confederacy, and who can ill be spared at the polls. Mr. McCrady is puzzled how to make an exception of them without coming in collision with the constitutions of the State and of the United States. His remarks on the advantages of education are sound—sounder than some of his statistical comparisons; and he diligently rakes together the evidence of Southern eminence in science, arts, and letters in times past and present. The following sentence is all we have space to quote. After showing that last year in South Carolina the number of colored children at school was 64,095 against 58,368 white, he says:

"Given so much education to whites and blacks alike, and I am content that victory shall be to the strong. But I do tremble at the idea that the time should come when the negroes of the South, forced by outside pressure and sustained by outside aid, should, at least for the while, be better educated than the masses of the whites; and, when I contemplate such a possibility, there is no power of the Government I would not invoke to force, if need be, our people to avail themselves of the education the State affords."

—Mr. Tom Taylor, who died recently in London, was one of the most prolific and hardworking men of letters of his time. He was sixty-three years old, and had written since he was a child, when he composed little melodramas for his school-fellows. He went to Trinity College, Cambridge; was called to the bar; for two years was Professor of the English Language and Literature at the University College, London; was first Assistant-Secretary and then Secretary-in-Chief of the Board of Health; then Secretary of the Local Government Acts Office, and after long service retired upon a liberal pension; but his devotion to literature, in one form or another, was almost uninterrupted. He was at the time of his death the art critic of the Times and the editor of Punch, having succeeded Mr. Shirley Brooks in the latter position. In neither of these offices, however, did he betray anything beyond an entirely respectable aptitude, and it is as a dramatist that he was chiefly known and will be remembered. He wrote some of the most successful of modern pieces; among others, the well-known "Our American Cousin," whose success is rather to be attributed to Mr. Sothern; "Plot and Passion," "Masks and Faces," "The Fool's Revenge," "'Twixt Axe and Crown," "Still Waters Run Deep," in the most popular of which he had the collaboration of Mr. Charles Reade, or the aid of some story by a French dramatist. His skill as an adapter was thus more conspicuous than his powers of invention, and controversy was not lacking over the originality of his plays, but, as the Athenæum remarks, he "lived in a period when awkward questions were for the first time put, and was the scapegoat of a system he transmitted and perpetuated but did not invent." He had more or less to do with more than a hundred plays, at all events, and his original work, reckoned at the lowest limit, must have been very considerable. His successor in the editorship of Punch, we may add, has just been announced to be Mr. F. C. Burnand, some time a member of the staff, and known everywhere as the author of 'Happy Thoughts.'

—Mr. Matthew Arnold takes advantage of the return of the English Liberals to power to send to the July number of the Nineteenth Century an article on "The Future of Liberalism." The spirit of the English people, he says, is thoroughly in accord with the Liberal party; it now and again turns to the Tories in impatience and despair, but only for a time, because "unremittingly, however slowly, the human spirit struggles toward the light." Perhaps even recent fears about personal government may come true, "and the last scene in the wonderful career of Lord Beaconsfield may be that we shall see him in a field-marshal's uniform, entering the House of Commons, and pointing to the mace, and commanding Lord Rowton, in an octogenarian voice, to 'take away that bauble'"; but "still the rule of the Tories, even after such a master-stroke as that, will never last in our community; such strangers are the Tory statesmen to the secret of its life, the secret of the future." However, to the end of making Liberal rule speedily permanent, he points out that not much is at present being done, and counsels the Liberal leaders, "instead of losing themselves in the petty bustle and schemes of the moment," to remember that the secret of the community's life is general civilization, and that general civilization is retarded in two principal ways—by "following too submissively middle-class opinion," its "hot fits and cold fits," and by the tremendous social inequality that exists in England. The former of these he has already treated in his essay on "Irish Catholicism and British Liberalism," and the other in his lecture on "Equality"; but considering the importance and interest of the subjects, his iteration is not to be called damnable. Neither is its timeliness needed to excuse his return to the subjects of burial-services and marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Of the advocates for the legalization of the latter he says: "That they ought not to marry their brother's wife they can perceive, that they ought not to marry their wife's sister they cannot." But this is by the way; the real point is that, though it may be well to pass all these measures, they do not advance civilization, and by no means represent the goal of true Liberal policy.

—Outside of England it is difficult to look upon all this as it is viewed by the average British Liberal. Here in America, where liberty is as much prized and upheld as an abstract right, marriage with a deceased wife's sister is doubtless regarded as one of the natural privileges of freemen, but, perhaps owing to our equality, no one whom it did not personally touch would feel personally aggrieved at having a writer take the ground that it is much the same thing for a man to marry his sister-in-law and for a woman to marry her brother-in-law. The Spectator, however, is "impatient with its high-sniffing contempt for the work which, in default of better, Liberals find to do." But "in default of better" is begging the question, and sounds like the celebrated characterization, by one of our "practical" publicists, of civil-service reform as "a damned barren ideality." Restricting the freedom of bequest and entail in order to secure greater equality the Spectator likewise considers visionary and impracticable. "What is the use of a suggestion like that?" it asks in irritation. "What is the use of proposing a remedy which could not be carried without a revolution, which is utterly inconsistent with our manners, the power of bequest being the chief source of household authority, and for which not one elector in twenty would vote?" This strikes the disinterested observer as a treatment of social equality very like in temper to the treatment which that other agent of civilization, political liberty, received so long at the hands of the Spectator's opponents. But what is most conspicuous to a foreigner is the testiness displayed because a writer on social politics who points out general abuses and suggests general remedies is not ready with a bill for immediate introduction into the House of Commons. In his essay on "Equality" Mr. Arnold would seem to have forestalled this, surely. He imagines Lord Hartington inviting the attention of "his Scotch Liberals" at Glasgow to a reform in the law of bequest and entail, and adds, "One can hardly speak of such a thing without laughing," and that "The matter is at present one for the thoughts of those who think." Is not this the only way in which reforms are set on foot and carried out without the "revolutions" which the Spectator fears?

—Professor Kastorchis, of Athens, describes a newly-discovered temple-ruin. It is situated on a mountain in the Peloponnesus, close by the village Mazi, on the south side of the Alpheios, a few miles from the ruins of Olympia. The dimensions are 35x19 metres, of which four metres belong to the peristyle. Some of the stones of the cella are in position, surrounded by drums of fluted Doric columns. These are of the dark stone of the vicinity, but some architectural ornaments of white marble were found in digging a trench. The edifice has been plundered of stones by builders in the neighboring village, where it is called Xenophon's tomb. It has been conjectured that this is the temple, described in the fifth book of the Anabasis, which Xenophon erected from the tithe of the spoils won by the Ten Thousand. Kastorchis, however, thinks otherwise, because it is much too far from Olympia; Xenophon's was only twenty stadia. Besides, he observes a resemblance to the famous temple of Apollo Epikourios at Phigalia, not only in its mountain site, but in material, size, and style, and he infers that it was erected at the same date, and so before Xenophon's time.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CEREMONY.*

IN this part of Herbert Spencer's 'Principles' the author discusses the development of what may be called the rules of behavior in human society. Most of the book is taken up with a presentation of the evidence on the subject, drawn from the most various and diverse sources. For instance, with regard to obeisances we have citations from Lewis and Clarke, Livingstone, Laird, Cook, Isaiah, Guhl and Koner, and Ezekiel. Wherever it has been possible the authority for each statement is given in tables of reference at the end of the volume. The general results arrived at may be summed up as follows: Rules of behavior are not the result, as people tacitly assume, of conventions deliberately adopted. On the contrary, they are a natural product of social evolution. In primitive, "headless" groups of men customs regulating behavior are few and unimportant. With each increase in social complexity ceremony increases. From the same root grow up various kinds of forms. Descriptive names develop into numerous graduated titles. Weapons taken in war give rise to symbols of authority of all kinds. Besides the increasing heterogeneity in each society, there is the further heterogeneity between the "aggregate of products in one society and the allied aggregates in other societies." At the same time there is a progress in definiteness ending with fixed forms, and even written codes of laws, as in the East. Observances differentiate themselves as political, religious, and social, ceremonial government preceding in time the other forms of government, "into all of which it enters." The development of ceremony is likewise closely connected with militancy, and Mr. Spencer goes so far as to say that "from the beaten dog which, crawling on its belly, licks its master's hand we trace up the general truth that ceremonial forms are naturally initiated by the relation of conqueror and conquered." Ceremony, in other words, originates in fear; and this fact furnishes the key to the process by which the decay of ceremony is brought about. With the rise of a social type based on voluntary co-operation, fear, and with it the desire to propitiate superiors, and hence the importance of ceremony, decline. "The subordinate ruler or officer is no longer wholly at the mercy of his superior; the trader, not liable to be robbed or tortured by the noble, has a remedy against him for non-payment; the laborer in receipt of wages cannot be beaten like a slave. In proportion as the system of exchanging services under contract spreads, and the rendering of services under compulsion diminishes, men dread one another less, and consequently become less scrupulous in fulfilling propitiatory forms." War, of necessity, cultivates untruthfulness, skilful deception being an indispensable weapon in warfare. Slavery, the concomitant of primitive warfare, also breeds the desire to deceive on the part of the slave. The connection of these facts with ceremony is that all the ceremonial which pervades the régime of compulsory co-operation is insincere. As compulsory co-operation disappears before the modern industrial system, the temptations to insincerity become less and less, and sincerity is of course a deadly foe of ceremony. The love of independence joins the love of truthfulness in generating a repugnance to obeisances and phrases which express subordination where none is internally acknowledged. Again, the discipline of war is a discipline of callousness. War prevents sympathy between superiors and inferiors, and makes rigid subordination necessary. As war disappears sympathy increases, and hence a dislike grows up on the superior's part to forms which seem to imply abject submission.

* 'Ceremonial Institutions: Being Part IV. of the Principles of Sociology (the first portion of Vol. ii.) By Herbert Spencer.' New York D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

At the same time that the restraints of ceremony form a part of the coercive régime peculiar to the primitive social order, they also form part of a discipline by which men are adapted to a higher social life. Established observances have the function of educating the anti-social nature of primitive man into a form fitted for social life. It is a proof of this that among many people whose ceremonial is of the most rigid type manners have reached a high degree of suavity. Conversely, "our own people, long living under institutions which guard them against serious consequences from giving offence, greatly lack suavity and show a comparative inattention to minor civilities." This brings us to the general truth that "within each embodied set of restraining agencies—the ceremonial, as well as the political and ecclesiastical which grow out of it—there gradually evolves a special kind of disembodied control, which eventually becomes independent." In other words, the personal commands of a superior based on force gradually change into laws based on an intrinsic authority derived from their utility. At the same time, "out of the supposed wishes of the ancestral ghost" come divine injunctions, and from these are derived "the set of requirements known as religious," the rules which we distinguish as moral being evolved within these:

"In the meantime, from within that part of ceremonial rule which has evolved into a system of regulations for social intercourse, there grows a third class of restraints, and these in like manner become at length independent. From observances which in their primitive forms express partly subordination to a superior and partly attachment to him, and which, spreading downwards, become general forms of behavior, there finally come observances expressing a proper regard for the individualities of other persons and a true sympathy in their welfare; . . . so that as law differentiates from personal commands, and as morality differentiates from religious injunctions, so politeness differentiates from ceremonial observance; to which I may add, so does rational usage differentiate from fashion."

Such is Mr. Herbert Spencer's view of the place which ceremony occupies in the scheme of evolution. We have stated it as nearly as possible in his own language. With regard to the future, he declares that we "cannot doubt" what it will be. With the further development of the social type based on voluntary co-operation ceremony will further decline. In its place a true politeness based on sympathy will grow up. With what Mr. Spencer calls "higher emotions and higher intelligence," external restraints will be supplied by internal restraints, until in the end—though he does not say this—ceremony will pass away altogether, and become as much a relic of the past as hieroglyphics or the interpretation of omens.

Mr. Spencer's writings on sociology have recently derived a new importance in this country from the controversy over their use at Yale College. The chief objection to them there urged was their agnostic character. We must say, however, that an unbiassed examination of such a volume as this raises another doubt still more fatal as to its utility as an educational text-book. The value of Mr. Spencer's researches cannot be denied, and the theories which he founds upon them are entitled to all the weight his name as a philosopher brings to their support; but they are, after all, mere theories. In saying this we do not at all mean to question the general truth of evolution, but a belief in evolution does not involve an acceptance of Mr. Spencer's law of the relation existing between the worship of relics of the True Cross and a dog crawling on his belly to lick his master's hand. He may be perfectly correct in his surmises, but they are certainly mere surmises, and to present to the minds of the young such surmises as these as deductions from the "law of evolution" would be a mistake.

It is perfectly safe to say that much of the evidence that Mr. Spencer needs to make out his case is wholly wanting. The sort of evolution that he has in mind is evidently based on a belief that with the progress of society the restraints of self-government are substituted for those of external force. If this were true, ought it not to be as apparent in that branch of social development which relates to crimes and their punishment as in any other? But while it is true that many things regarded as criminal in primitive societies become indifferent in advanced societies, still the progress of civilization is marked by nothing more distinctly than the evolution of highly complex penal codes, in which nothing is left to be dealt with by an internal sanction. Again, what ground is there for saying that war is dying out, when half the most civilized portion of the world is engaged in converting its population into easily-mobilized reserves? Further than this, why are we told to consider the early type of man "non-social"? Is not the social character of man one of his most fundamental traits? Darwin in his 'Descent of Man' makes the moral sense inseparably allied to the social instincts. From man's social disposition he thinks that an inherited tendency to be faithful to his comrades, to aid and defend them, and even a capacity for self-command, and perhaps the habit of obedience, might be derived. It is no argument, he urges, against savage man being a social animal that tribes inhabiting adjacent districts are almost always at war with each other, for the social instincts never extend to all the individuals of the same species. But what Mr. Spencer appears to insist upon is that primitive man is a non-social animal. To any one who has reflected upon the peculiarities of human nature, the prophecy that "sympathy" is going in the future to take the place of those external restraints which at present make industrial and social co-operation possible, is somewhat startling. If it is going to have this tremendous effect on manners, why should it not have the same consequences in other branches of life? Why are not the external sanctions by which contracts are enforced relics of a primitive barbarism, and, therefore, likely in their turn to disappear before the advance of sympathy? It seems hard to believe that sympathy should be sufficiently strong to replace force in ceremonial, and yet give no trace whatever of asserting its effect in the far more important field of bargains. We do not by any means mean to say that Mr. Spencer is wrong. He may be perfectly right. But sociology is not a science which has made such rapid progress as the student would be led to infer from this volume; and interesting as Mr. Spencer's speculations are, they are still speculations.

Reminiscences of Rev. William Ellery Channing, D.D. By Elizabeth Palmer Peabody. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.)—In reading this book one is sometimes tempted to question the correctness of the running-title, as if what was really in hand were posthumous 'Reminiscences of Miss Peabody' by Dr. Channing. With rare frankness the author prints his private letters to her, which, besides affording invaluable glimpses of his own character, convey with perfect distinctness his judgment of hers. This judgment is such that it is plain to see that he would never have chosen Miss Peabody for his biographer, and it serves—if that were necessary—to impose caution on the reader in accepting Miss Peabody's report on matters which were within her own experience and observation. We hasten to add that such a distrust implies in her case no moral delinquency whatever, and we do not know that we can better criticise her book than by citing some of the passages in which her incapacity for historical reminiscence is made apparent.

Some time about 1826, Miss Peabody having submitted to Dr. Channing a series of essays on the Hebrew Scriptures, in which, as she told him, she first expressed thoughts of her own, he returned them with the remark, "I was interested in them because your mind takes so opposite a direction from mine to come to the same result." In March, 1831, he wrote her from St. Croix:

"You are apt to prejudice the truth by placing it in unhappy connections. For example, in your remarks on the first chapters of Genesis you threw a doubtfulness over some great truths by supposing them to be taught, or veiled, in the narrative, which has nothing to do with them. I saw then one of your intellectual dangers. You are led astray by slight connections and analogies, and are apt to see in past or present facts what other eyes cannot discover. I have thought, too, that your interpretations of life are not always to be trusted, and that you are in danger of substituting your own structures for reality."

In August, 1835, he writes: "Your chapter on 'General Principles' interested me much. It is full of fine thoughts, but the lights are somewhat too scattered. If your inspirations had more consecutiveness and connection they would do more good." And similarly, in advising about a business enterprise (June, 1840):

"My fear on this subject came from the impression, which was quite common in your school-keeping days, that you want order, method, arrangement. If I mistake not, you had a notion that in regard to order, as in everything else, what we need is the spirit rather than the letter; that rules and machinery are worth little; that the principle within us will meet intuitively the wants of the moment. . . . Were your business to be more independent, I should also fear from the ascendency of your imagination."

We should hesitate to quote what follows if Miss Peabody herself had not printed it. A report had been circulated that Dr. Channing had employed her to copy his sermons for him, and allowed her nothing, though in absolute want. He writes with unconcealed vexation (November, 1837):

"Such a report I do not contradict, and I have not the slightest disposition to hold you at all responsible for it; but is it not possible that you talked confusedly of your circumstances and of your copying for me, so that some one's stupidity misconstrued your language into an imputation on my honor? . . . But cannot you avoid talking about me? I wish simply to advise you to greater caution in your communications about your friends. . . . I wish that what you say may have more authority by being spoken more considerately and precisely."

Forty added years have not brought Miss Peabody an orderly mental habit, a common vision for common things, a bridled imagination, a sobered enthusiasm. There is a chronological progress in the present volume, but it can hardly be called a sequence. Thirty years and more ago our author's name was associated with a "Polish-American" system of mnemonics for fixing dates in history. That her energetic advocacy of it grew out of a personal need will not be doubted by any one who peruses her latest writing. Two instances, out of many, of her "talking confusedly" in consequence of this defect are to be found on pp. 357–8 and p. 360. Miss Peabody says

"When Mr. Garrison began to edit the Liberator in Boston, Dr. Channing was one of the first subscribers; and among the things which I read to him were the early numbers of this paper. The first impression made on me by its motto and the fierceness of its attacks upon the Colonization Society were shocking."

Now, the shocking motto of the first and of every subsequent volume was "Our Country is the World—Our Countrymen are Mankind," while the Scriptural shibboleth which Miss Peabody had in mind, and which she misquotes on p. 385, was not uttered in Dr. Channing's lifetime. Still more mixed is this second passage:

"Dr. Channing was much pained at the 'mob of gentlemen of standing' in State Street, Boston, in 1836, as he had been at the attacks upon the Ladies' Anti-slavery Society. He had made himself quite conspicuous at the time of the shooting of Lovejoy at Alton, Illinois, etc."

The mob referred to took place in 1835 instead of 1836, and was in itself an attack on the Ladies' Anti-slavery Society. Lovejoy was killed in 1837.

It remains to be said that this book has the qualities of its defects, and is a really interesting picture of the time which it covers. It contains a great many contemporaneous abstracts of Dr. Channing's sermons made by Miss Peabody, numerous letters from and to her, some autobiographical data which will be read with sympathy, pleasing views of Channing's home-life at Newport, suggestions of ineffable transcendental and mystical conversations about religion, and sketches (or phases) of such lights of the past generation as O. A. Brownson, R. G. Hazard, Ripley, Alcott, Emerson, Margaret Fuller, Follen, Father Taylor, Tuckerman, Wm. B. Greene, Horace Mann, James Freeman Clarke, and the rest. Not alone of the "past generation," as several of these names remind us; but Miss Peabody, with an Hibernian tendency to blunder, makes an index of the "names of the principal living persons mentioned in the text," and gravely enters Allston, Buckminster, Coleridge, Follen, Gannett, and a score of others who have "gone over to the majority."

Shakspeare's Knowledge and Use of the Bible. By Charles Wordsworth, D.C.L., Bishop of St. Andrews. (New York: Scribner & Welford. 1880.)—It has not been generally believed that Shakspere derived inspiration from the Scriptures or set forth the tenets of the Church of England in his plays. The contrary view has prevailed among Christians as well as in the world at large; indeed, we know of a family edition of Shakspere in which nearly every reference to the Bible has been omitted as being disrespectful to God and depraving to young readers. The common opinion, however, appears to be faulty. The Bishop of St. Andrews has convinced himself that Shakspere's poetry and thought were so much colored by the Scriptures as to prove that he read them attentively and was thoroughly acquainted with the received interpretation of them in doctrinal form. "Take the entire range of English literature," the bishop says, "put together our best authors who have written upon subjects not professedly religious or theological, and we shall not find, I believe, in them all united so much evidence of the Bible having been read and used as we have found in Shakspere alone." The evidence referred to is an ingenious collection of parallel passages which show that the dramatist knew of the history of Adam and Eve, the murder of Abel, the Flood, the parables, the Crucifixion, and similar matters found in the Bible. In this there is nothing surprising, for such knowledge has been for centuries the common heritage of every Christian child; but some few Shaksperian students may be startled to find that their master's "views of the corruption of human nature," his "perception of the method of its recovery through divine grace," and his "theory of the formation of moral habits" were based upon Scripture; that "no professed divine ever understood the doctrine of repentance better or has expounded it more clearly than Shakspere"—nay, that even in his invocation of the holy angels (so careful was he of religious sensibilities) he did not, in the bishop's opinion, "transgress the limits which a sound theology would impose."

The striking novelty of these statements leads the reader to expect strong evidence of their truth. The method of adducing parallel passages in proof of any new opinion respecting Shakspere has been employed for such diverse objects that it lies under the suspicion proverbially attaching to statistics; in this way ingenuity can prove anything. The validity of its practice in the present case can be judged of by a few instances:

"I will speak daggers."—Hamlet, Act. iii., Sc. 2.
"Swords are in their lips."—Ps. lix. 7.

"In peace there's nothing so becomes a man
As modest stiliness and humility."—K. Henry V., Act iii., Sc. 1.
"Study to be quiet."—1 Thess. iv. 11.

"Thy greatest help is quiet, gentle Nell;
I pray thee sort thy heart to patience."—K. Henry VI., 2d Pt., Act ii., Sc. 4.
"Their strength is to sit still. In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."—Isaiah xxx. 7, 15.

"his able horse . . . .
He seemed in running to devour the way."—K. Henry IV., 2d Pt., Act i., Sc. 1.
"He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage."—Job xxxix. 24.

"Woe to the land that's governed by a child."—K. Rich. III., Act ii., Sc. 3.
"Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child."—Eccl. x. 16.

"An if an angel should have come to me
And told me Hubert should put out mine eyes,
I would not have believed him."—K. John, Act iv., Sc. 1.
"Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel."—Galatians i. 8.

These are fair examples of the less obvious correspondences between the Bible and Shakspere; there are others in which the possibility of real connection is the slightest, and a few, such as occur in Shylock's speeches, in which Shakspere shows more acquaintance with the historical books than any other dramatist of his time. In fully two-thirds of the passages quoted there is no probability that Shakspere was aware of the Biblical parallel, if, indeed, in many instances, it really exists. In the other third the reference is either to some well-known event which he had learned in boyhood, or to wolves in sheep's clothing, leopards' spots, a tree's being known by its fruit, or similar figures, which dropped from his lips as naturally as a proverb from Sancho Panza's, and needed as little direct reading of the Scriptures. Marlowe, the atheist, uses them, though less frequently, in the same way. To characterize fitly the fallacy of inferring from such evidence that Shakspere was versed in the Scriptures would require the adjectival energy of Mr. Swinburne, as he has employed it upon other commentators in his recent book of Shaksperian criticism; and the evidence is exclusively of this character, unless the author meant to suggest an argument in calling attention to the "remarkable" fact that the two great depreciators of Shakspere were the infidels Hume and Voltaire.

To suppose that Shakspere meant to inculcate the peculiar tenets of the Anglican Church in respect to the corruption of human nature and the redemption of man through divine grace, or that he was indebted for his views and expressions to a direct study of the Bible, seems as wild an hypothesis as that he was a Romanist or a Puritan—fallacies which the Bishop of St. Andrews is solicitous to point out. The general tenor of his works shows that he was a secular genius, and special passages prove that he was by no means a religiously-minded man, although by faith a Christian. The author deserves credit for the charitableness with which he has overlooked these worldly passages, but his work can only be regarded as the outcome of that admiration for a hero which would impose on him our own horizons and transform him into the image of our own ideal, so that at the end we may exclaim: "My Shakspere!" A man who satisfies the requirements of an English bishop and of Mr. Swinburne truly deserves that most just epithet ever applied to him—"the myriad-minded."

The Great Artists.—Michelangelo. By Charles Clément.—Horace Vernet. Paul Delaroche. By J. Ruutz Rees. (New York: Scribner & Welford. 1880.)—The first of these latest issues of the 'Great Artists' series is a translation of the work of M. Clément, supplemented by a brief appendix in which the translator gives some memoranda of Michelangelo's familiar life from the family archives. The translation seems well enough done, the simple English professedly sought being attained even to such a phrase as "I allow that Michelangelo took," etc. M. Clément's work is in the main excellent, but the strictly popular purpose for which the series is designed would have been served by some modifications in the way of both elision and amplification. For a popular purpose the consideration of conflicting statements and other palpable errors of Vasari and other biographers is nothing less than surplusage which obstructs the current of the narrative needlessly; and upon such points as Michelangelo's quarrel with Raphael, and his criticism of Titian, and various historical allusions, too flattering a confidence is exhibited in the average reader's stock of information. There is a plentiful intersprinkling of criticism which serves to illuminate the record of events and give it proportion, and to which, considering the temperateness and good sense that characterize it and the definite place Michelangelo has come to occupy after so many years of discussion, almost no objection can be made; a primer about Michelangelo may be permitted to be freer than a Turner primer. We say almost no objection, because M. Clément does not completely avoid leaving the impression that his subject was as unique in the degree as he undoubtedly was in the quality of his genius. It is, for instance, out of place in a primer to say (p. 42), while speaking of the sublimity of Michelangelo's conceptions, that they "are far from captivating ordinary minds like the marvellous and charming creations of the painter of Urbino"; which is like saying that Raphael was the Racine of painting. Leonardo, and all the other contemporary masters, are allowed to be similarly dwarfed by implication, though not as specifically, and even Greek art suffers (p. 43). Indeed it may be laid down as a general principle that in such books as this the legitimate use of comparisons stops at illustration and characterization.

The author of the biographies of Vernet and Delaroche neglects this in so conspicuous a degree that his error carries its own corrective with it when he speaks (p. 13) of Vernet being "too true to himself to be led into the somewhat unrefined bohemianism of Delacroix," and (p. 59) of Delaroche owing an important part of his education to the warnings of the folly of extremes furnished by Delacroix's work. These allusions are on a par with that to Michelangelo (p. 17) as Vernet's "great forerunner," and illustrate the mischief of perfunctory critical writing, which deems itself secure from error because it never rises out of commonplace. Neither of these sketches has any positive value, on the other hand, beyond that which is involved in the expansion of a cyclopædic article. The descriptions of Vernet's pictures are of the quality indicated by such a phrase as "realistic striving after effect"—that is to say, they are verbiage simply; and the analysis of Delaroche's "Hemicycle" is to the last degree trite and trivial—e.g.: "Delorme, rapt in thought, constructs, in fancy, castles grander than that which won the admiration of his contemporaries" (p. 70), and "Delaroche, by his intuitive perception of their leading characteristics, has so harmonized their natures as to present the idea of diversity in unity" (p. 71); and, to sum up: "The glory of divine art in human form has never been more fully illustrated." Some one signing the initials "F. C." has appended, "compiled from the most recent authorities," brief biographies of the artists represented in the 'Hemicycle,' which have the merit of convenience, and there is also a large folded engraving of the work with a key. Those who will get the most benefit from these ought perhaps to be warned that Nicholas as well as Gaspar Poussin is usually classed with the French rather than the Italian school, and that Phidias is supposed by some authorities not merely to have been the sculptor of the Parthenon but to have had some voice in the designing of it, along with Ictinus and Callicrates, who are here mentioned as its sole architects. The rest of the engravings are poor; on the other hand, some of those in the 'Michelangelo' are the best of the series. In both books there is nothing left to be desired in the way of copious indexes and catalogues.

The Elective Franchise in the United States. A review of the effects of the caucus system upon the civil service and upon the principles and politics of political parties. By D. C. McMillan, with a preface by Hon. Horatio Seymour. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880. Pp. 198.)—Any earnest attempt to point out the mischiefs of our present political system, and to suggest a remedy for them, is welcome. We doubt whether the author of the book before us has fully solved the great problem; but he has directed attention to certain elements of the situation which are generally overlooked, and his plan, even if impracticable as a whole, has nevertheless features which deserve careful consideration. He would have done better, we think, if he had not expanded his thoughts to the dimensions of a book. The principal part of the volume, occupied in analyzing and describing the evils to be remedied, is good, and is, of course, logically necessary to the completeness of his discussion. But it is ground so familiar, arguments so many times repeated, that the really original parts of his work would have attracted more attention if he had advanced them by themselves, taking for granted all preliminary discussion.

The leading idea of the author appears to be the divorce of national and State politics. In their constant association he rightly sees a great evil, and he points out its bad effects with clearness and force. In his first chapter he asserts (p. 17) that "the existence of great national parties seems not to have been expected" by the founders of the republic, for which assertion he finds support both in the Constitution and in the language of the early statesmen. Political parties, it was expected, would hinge exclusively upon State issues, and national issues would be dealt with purely upon grounds of national expediency. It is easy to see after the event how unreasonable this expectation was; but the present condition of things, in which State issues are wholly postponed to the exigencies of national parties, was perhaps as little to be anticipated. The problem of the book is therefore to propose some plan by which State interests may form the basis of State parties wholly independent of the national party divisions; and, in doing this, to afford a remedy for the present maladministration of national affairs. The special scheme proposed by Mr. McMillan is that in all elections, State as well as national, there should be a preliminary or "nominating" election, held in advance of the final election; at this the candidates should be designated, between whom the subsequent election should be made. At this first election only candidates should be voted for who had been formally presented (for the Presidency, by the legislature of one or more States). There might, in this way, be an indefinite number of candidates at the first voting. Of course if any one obtained the majority he would be declared elected, and a second vote rendered unnecessary; but this is hardly likely to occur. If the vote had been taken last May, for instance, we should have had Grant, Blaine, Sherman, Edmunds, and probably any number of "favorite sons" for the Republican canvass, and an equal number for the Democratic; but only two of these would be taken, by the "survival of the fittest," for the final election. In order to preclude the possibility of the two final candidates being from the same party, it is provided that all of one party shall be classed as "First Canvass," and those of the other as "Second."

This proposition for doing away with the caucus and having a nomination made directly by the people, and the additional feature of having both parties participate in the same nominating election, deserve serious attention. It appears to us that they are fruitful ideas, although we question the working of the plan in the precise form in which it is presented. The first objection that strikes one is that if one election is such a nuisance, a second would only intensify the evil. But this objection is after all of very slight account; we have little doubt that this scheme would save far more cost and friction than it would cause. Suppose that in May such a preliminary election could have been held, and that Independents were able, by spending five minutes, or an hour, or half a day, to express their public preference for Edmunds or Bayard, their power would have been felt at once, and a vast amount of machinery been dispensed with. The thing would be as simple and inexpensive in its workings as is possible in the nature of things; and especially the plan of having the nomination made by a public election—a caucus, if we may so call it, consisting of both parties at once—is probably the only practicable method yet proposed for giving the caucus a public character.

That part of the scheme which limits the regular candidates to two is of course unessential; a third party is sometimes a necessity, and it would be as easy to have three "canvasses" as two. The writer, however, urges with force that only in this way can we be sure of a majority at the second election, and adds (p. 140): "The limitation of a voter's choice to two candidates at a subsequent election could work no injustice; for those who failed to secure approval when two persons are to be selected could have no hope of success as against candidates who had already demonstrated their powers, when the choice to be made is that of a single person." We are not sure as to that part of the plan which requires the name to be presented by a State legislature. It is certainly in itself the proper method; but, as our State legislatures are composed, it seems as if it would still result in the rule of the Machine. For example, it is not at all certain if Mr. Edmunds lived in a Democratic State that his name would be presented by any legislature. The main features of the scheme, however—nomination by the people at large, and that by both parties at a time—possess great merit. If it were thoroughly carried out in local as well as national and State elections, "King Caucus" would lose much of his power; and for that reason, if for no other, we suppose there is little chance of its adoption. Our rulers, the politicians, will not accept any scheme which lessens their power; but only by some such weakening of their power shall we ever reform our government. Mr. McMillan well says (p. 85): "Civil-service reform has been and will be a failure so long as our present election system exists, because in whatever guise it appears, it proposes to substitute something in the place of the will of the legislator as the chief instrumentality for procuring appointments under the Government."

The Stage; or, Recollections of Actors and Acting, from an experience of fifty years: a series of Dramatic Sketches. By James E. Murdoch. With an appendix. (Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddart & Co. 1880.)—Although we fail to find in this volume a worthy addition to the long list of histrionic autobiographies of which the latest and best are those of Macready and Mrs. Kemble, it is, perhaps, scarcely fair to Mr. Murdoch to complain that he has not here attempted an orderly biography, but rather a series of sketches, drawn partly from his professional reading and partly from his personal experience. The outline of his own life, which fills a dozen of the earlier pages, is contributed by Mr. J. Bunting, who completes his record at April, 1880, and is unable, therefore, to notice Mr. Murdoch's reappearance on the stage in his native town for a few nights in the month of May. This is followed by twenty chapters of Mr. Murdoch's own, taken, as we are told in the "Epilogue" (p. 419), from a series of his lectures called "Reminiscences of the Stage." These twenty chapters, the rather fragmentary character of which is perhaps explained by their mode of preparation, treat of the "Tragedian and his Relation to the Poet," of "Imitation and Mimicry," of the author's "London Experiences," of "Shakspere and his Critics," and more at length of the various leading actors of the last half-century whom Mr. Murdoch has had opportunities of observing and studying. These personal comments on Macready, Forrest, the two Keans, the elder Booth, and Charlotte Cushman are by far the most valuable portion of the volume, and, indeed, to any one fairly familiar with the literature of the American theatre the only valuable part of the book. Especially unnecessary is the appendix, the eighty broad pages of which are avowedly reprinted from magazines and pamphlets, though they were not worth reprinting. The final chapter of the appendix consists of "Strictures on the Acting and Personal Traits of David Garrick," and is an altogether unworthy and misleading arraignment. But where Mr. Murdoch has relied wholly on himself, his personal recollections, and his own power of criticism, his work is of great merit and interest. No one who comes hereafter to consider Forrest's career can afford to pass over Mr. Murdoch's many discriminating references to him. It may be noted that in addition to the author's portrait there is a fine steel engraving of Forrest at the age of sixty-five. Besides the purely critical consideration of histrionic notabilities Mr. Murdoch has given us also a goodly number of anecdotes hitherto unprinted.

The Natural History of the Agricultural Ant of Texas. A Monograph of the Habits, Architecture, and Structure of Pogonomyrmex barbatus. By Henry Christopher McCook. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880. Pp. 208, pl. 24.)—This work is interesting to the student of zoölogy on account of the additions it makes to scientific knowledge. Its value is enhanced by its being written in a style which commends it to the attention of the general reader. Occasionally the enthusiasm of the writer induces him to make statements that may appear rather strong, but in the main it can be considered a truthful account of the natural history and anatomy of the harvesting ant. It is intended for a "key to the habits of the whole family of ants," "a complete life-history of one representative individual." To call this a complete life-history is claiming too much for it; it would have been more accurately described as an approximation. The greater portion of the history of the queen remains to be written. We must know more of the differences between workers major and workers minor, between them and the queens and drones, and how they are caused. How the communities are governed is yet to be told. In regard to various matters which are here touched upon, the conclusions are quite unsatisfactory. In many important points the observations of Dr. Lincecum (who does not appear to be "an approved naturalist") are confirmed by the author, "and thus a strong degree of authenticity given to other facts recorded by him." Whether the ants sow the "ant-rice" upon the disc is left undecided and doubtful.

In places the reader is left in doubt as to the exact meaning through carelessness in statement. On page 20 it is said that when the sexes were out sunning themselves there were "many more females than males," and page 143 furnishes the following puzzle in arithmetic: "The females outnumbered the males at least two to one. . . . Each female struggled upon the ground in the embrace of four, five, even twenty males. Multitudes of males, besides, moved eagerly over the ground in search of females who were not to be found. The air also was full of them, flying round and round, going off a little ways and returning." A description of the pulvillus, or sucking-disc, of the foot which enables an insect to walk on smooth surfaces is given on page 101. "By means of this, Barbatus was able to run freely up or down or hang for long periods upon the glass surface of the artificial nests. . . . While all are able to move with more or less ease and facility over the smooth surface, some species seem to have no sort of embarrassment in such conditions." "So great was the desire to get the dead outside the nest (p. 137) that the bearers would climb up the smooth surface of the glass to the very top of the jar, laboriously carrying with them a dead ant. The jar was very smooth and quite high." "I could (p. 207) at any time in the course of a few moments obtain a three-ounce vial full of these ants by sinking it, with mouth open, within the disc. . . . The smooth surface of the glass, over which they cannot readily walk, prevented their escape." On page 63 it is said that six ants weighed given numbers of millimetres, and farther along that "a millimetre is approximately one-sixty-fifth of a grain," etc.

The chapter on the ancient belief in harvesting ants is interesting, but not very closely connected with the history of the ants of Texas. It goes to prove the value of Solomon's advice to the sluggard. Altogether the book has a considerable scientific value. We would suggest to Dr. McCook that if in future he were to turn his attention to the grasshopper and army or cotton worms he might lighten the labors and expenses of the Entomological Commission, and win the gratitude of farmers and taxpayers.

Early Chroniclers of Europe.—England. By James Gairdner.—France. By Gustave Masson. (London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; New York: Pott, Young & Co.)—The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has instituted several useful series of books, but none perhaps more useful—certainly none which more manifestly fills a gap—than this of the 'Early Chroniclers of Europe,' of which two volumes have already appeared, small octavos, in good type, of about three hundred pages each. We are not told what other volumes are in contemplation, but Germany, at any rate, will be looked for with great interest. The volume upon England is, we will not say better done, but far more interesting than that upon France; partly, perhaps, by reason of Mr. Gairdner's literary experience and skill, partly, no doubt, because the larger number of French chroniclers makes it necessary to treat them in a more compendious way. Mr. Gairdner has not merely given a very full account of every important chronicler, with abundant and well-chosen illustrative extracts (twenty-three pages, for instance, from Giraldus Cambrensis); he has accompanied them with such full commentary that the volume really contains a tolerably complete history of England for the Middle Ages. And not merely does it serve as a general commentary: several points are so treated that the results have almost the value of special treatises. For example, there will be found here one of the best and most instructive brief accounts of the mediæval monasteries, especially of the newer orders—the Carthusians, Cistercians, Franciscans, etc. Students of English history will find this book an indispensable aid, and it can hardly fail to stimulate them to go for further instruction to the writings of the chroniclers themselves.

Mr. Masson's volume is not deficient in interest, and his description of the several chroniclers of France is clear and instructive; but he seldom gives extracts from their works, at least any but the most brief, and the great mass of his materials forces him to dismiss most of his subjects with only a general characterization. France was no doubt more active than England in literary work; moreover, the Chronicles of the Crusades were mostly French, and these make an addition to the historians of France, properly so called, perhaps equal in amount. We think it might have been well, considering the great importance of the Crusades and the number of their chroniclers, to give them a separate volume, and thus, by limiting the present volume to the chroniclers who wrote of the internal history of their country, to make possible a treatment like Mr. Gairdner's. As an illustration of the different styles of the two works, Villehardouin has only eleven pages to Giraldus Cambrensis's twenty-three; and—to take works of precisely the same character and value—Eginhard's Life of Charlemagne has three pages, Asser's Life of Alfred eighteen pages. So far as the scale of his book permitted, however, Mr. Masson has aimed to give the same kind of general illustrative information which Mr. Gairdner gives with such fulness. His work is introduced by a chronological list of French chroniclers, occupying over three pages.

We have only noted one misprint in Mr. Gairdner's book—where Henry I. (p. 92) is called "the impious king" (for imperious). On page 231 William of Occam is said to have taken refuge from Pope John, and "put himself under the protection of the Duke of Bavaria." It would mean more to the reader if it said "the Emperor Louis the Bavarian," for the Duke of Bavaria was at this time Emperor. The other volume contains several misprints. On page 36 we read Louis the Fat for Charles the Fat; on page 116, the date 1230 for 1300, and page 155, 1860 for 1272; page 278, Charles VIII. for (we suppose) Charles VII.; page 310, Chartier for Charlier; page 349, Gnesnen for Gnesen. Philip Augustus is said (p. 102) to have "divided his dominions into seventy-three prévôtés, each placed under the rule of a bailiff." Perhaps "bailiff" is meant for a translation of prévôt, but if so it is misleading, for there was a superior officer called bailli, and each bailliage contained several prévôtés. Moreover, the reader would naturally understand by "dominions" the kingdom of France; but this arrangement was confined to the royal "domains"—the duchy of France, and the country between Paris and Orléans—being afterwards extended to the great fiefs of Normandy, etc., as they were successively annexed. By an oversight (p. 297) the chronicle of St. Maurice is said to have been, down to the year 965, a mere compilation from Orosius—who died about 420.

We find an interesting remark of Mr. Gairdner (p. 231), where he has been speaking of the Franciscan, William of Occam: "It was the friars of the Middle Ages, and not Wycliffe, who really were the first to shake the dominion of the Pope of Rome. It was they who, pointing to apostolic poverty, suggested how Christianity might be relieved of everything that was superfluous, and reduced once more to its essential principles."

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF 'MR. SMITH.'

Troublesome Daughters.

By MRS. L. B. WALFORD,

Author of 'Mr. Smith,' 'Pauline,' and 'Cousins.'

16mo, $1.

What the Nation says on Mrs. Walford's earlier novels:

"It is not often that the reader comes across such intelligent satire of vulgar people, and such sympathetic drawing of a fine character, as can be found in this book (Pauline). . . . Her picture is a distinct and true one. Her characters are very vivid and very real. Few persons, we imagine, who begin 'Cousins' will fail to finish it, or to notice what a clever and genuine contribution it is to the better class of English comedy."

VIRGINIA MILITARY INSTITUTE.— Extract from report of Examining Board, July, 1875:
"In conclusion, your committee cannot too highly commend what has seemed to them the marked and distinguishing features of this institution—the happy combination of the military system of instruction with the departments of science and of literary culture, and the more ennobling culture of the heart and soul. Nowhere else have we seen this combination so complete and perfect. We cannot speak of it too highly. It is such a system as fits a pupil for life and for death. The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 12, 1880.

The Week.

THERE was a "conference" of leading Republicans held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel on Thursday morning last, most of the States being represented. An attempt was made at the outset by General Logan to have reporters excluded, on the ground that if the proceedings were public it would be "advertising the campaign to the enemy," but this failed. After much discussion a resolution was passed declaring the expediency of carrying on as active a Republican campaign as possible at the South, and requesting the National Committee to respond to such calls for speakers as they should deem wise and proper from Southern Republicans. The Southern Republicans first spoke. Mr. Hicks, of Florida, thought that with "aid and encouragement" from the North they could carry that State, and believed there would be a fair count this fall. Senator Conover, of Florida, also believed there would be a fair count, but Mr. Cessna, of Pennsylvania, thought the Democrats were sure to cheat this fall, and was in favor, if need be, of sending a Congressional committee down to the South to protect the Republicans in that section, and if he could not protect them in that way he would transport them out to the great West. Colonel Sypher, of Louisiana, also took a gloomy view. He denied that there would be a fair count in Florida, but thought that if the result of the October elections at the North were favorable some Congressmen might be gained in Florida, Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina, but no electoral vote anywhere. Judge Freeman, of Tennessee, thought there was no use in trying; that the ballot-stuffers would make the whole Southern vote secure for the Democrats. Mr. Pinchback, of Louisiana, thought great good might be done in the way of encouraging the colored people, if Messrs. Blaine, Conkling, and Sherman would go down and talk to them. Colonel Tony Jones, of Illinois, was somewhat bellicose, and talked of "raising another army" if necessary. Senator Blaine thought the way to stand by the South was to carry Maine, Ohio, and Indiana at the North; if this was done, he evidently believed that all Southern votes which could be obtained by any means would come in without trouble. His own sphere of usefulness lay at the North. Secretary Sherman had his "sympathetic repugnance" excited by the proposal to abandon the South; but he, too, declared that the way to stand by them was to send "men and money" into Ohio and Indiana. Sending them to the South he characterized as a "doubtful experiment," in which he was evidently going to take no part himself. General Logan advocated "harmony," and General Harrison "a concentration of forces against the weak points of the enemy's line."

Whether anything has come of the conference, and if anything, what, it would be hard to say. There was no expression of opinion on any subject now before the public except the probability of ballot-stuffing at the South, nor was any light thrown on the matter by the speaking at the demonstration in honor of General Garfield on the following day, which was devoted almost exclusively to recalling recollections of the war. It is quite evident that no leading Republicans have any intention of going South, either to encourage the blacks or secure a fair count. General Garfield's address to the "Boys in Blue" contained no programme except a promise to "stand by these black allies of ours" at the South, "until the equal sunlight of liberty, fixed in the eternal firmament of our constitution, shall shine with equal ray upon every man, black or white, in the Union." In the absence of any definition of "stand by," it is evident that this is a pledge which any statesman might make without the slightest inconvenience.

General Weaver's Alabama canvass probably gave rise, in other minds as well as in his own, to expectations which the election of last week completely dissipated. The Democrats carried the State by a majority estimated at seventy thousand, and the so-called Independent ticket—Greenback, "endorsed" ad hoc by the Republicans, who expressly repudiated the platform, but seized the opportunity to get their votes counted, and so had no separate ticket of their own—was successful only in a few localities where there had been some previous organization. There has been the usual allegation of wholesale fraud, but the specifications offered have been anonymous, and until white men at the South who protest against corruption and violence there have the courage to sign their names to communications to Northern papers, they deserve to have their testimony disregarded. Nevertheless, we do not believe that opinion is freer in Alabama than in the South generally, and as the Democrats had the appointment of election inspectors they had the means to secure returns satisfactory to themselves. On the other hand, we must not give in to the Greenback pretensions, and assume that a free vote would have drawn out the full Republican strength in addition to the defections from the Democracy. The South sharing the prosperity of the country is really no better field than the North for the demagogism which thrives only in hard times. The gospel of fiat money, too, has no such historical or sentimental associations for the negroes as to make it a substitute for Republicanism, whatever the latter may mean. It must be considered fortunate that the Greenback failure will loosen what little hold the heresy has upon them.

How much better the Greenbackers of Texas will fare in the November elections than their brethren in Alabama remains to be seen. Probably nowhere will the local Democracy repudiate more vigorously, by word and deed, Mr. English's doctrine about the twenty-year limit of office-holding. They are in a minority in Texas, and would strive in vain to maintain themselves in power but for the fact that the opposing elements are unwilling or unable to unite in turning them out. There is the usual coquetting between the Greenbackers and the Republicans, but no fusion ticket has resulted, owing to antipathies more powerful than the hatred of capital or the love of fiat money. The Greenbackers have chosen to try their chances with a "straight" State and national ticket, to which they can invite the adhesion of members of both the other parties without prejudice. Immoral as the alliance would be, it might embarrass a Northern missionary, sent to stump the State by the National Republican Executive Committee, to advise against it, all the more because the State platform of the Greenbackers does announce some aims which all friends of public order and intelligence ought to cherish. So we may yet see the Republicans harmoniously "buckling on their armor and putting on their war-paint," to borrow the anachronistic metaphor of the Greenback organ in Austin. Apropos of the subject which engrossed the Fifth Avenue Conference, an intelligent observer writes us from Texas:

"My conviction is that if a few Southern-born Union men, such as ex-Governor E. J. Davis, were sent for to canvass at the North, they would effect more good than any number of Northern politicians that might be sent to canvass in the South. The good people of the originally free States do not understand the condition of things in the South, where the white men never were and are not yet free, but are ridden by the same old set of Democratic politicians who held office before, during, and since the war, and intend to continue to hold office, without scruple as to how they get it, while life endures."

A correspondent has called our attention to an error in the Nation of July 29 with regard to the Chittenden-McClellan suit in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois. We stated that the judge held the plaintiff's demurrer "good," whereas he, in fact, held it bad. The pleas to which the demurrer was interposed were held good, and these pleas set forth General Garfield's connection with the De Golyer contract in the light in which the World now thinks it ought to be regarded. Our correspondent thinks that the fact that Chittenden did not see fit to withdraw his demurrer, as he might have done under the decision, and put in an answer and go to trial on the facts, has some significance, and that we ought to have called attention to it. It has, however, absolutely no significance, as the motives which led to Chittenden's failure to continue the litigation are quite unknown. It may have been from want of funds on Chittenden's part, or because he was badly advised, or for any one of a thousand other reasons. Besides all this, it should be observed that Mr. Garfield was not a party to the suit. For these reasons we do not think that the suggestion recently made in a letter to the Sun, that "a certified copy of the pleadings" in the case "would make a powerful campaign document against Garfield" is sound. To any one who recollects the "charges" brought against Mr. Tilden in 1876, the use made by Democrats of this case can but recall in a comical way the arguments then drawn by Republicans from "certified copies" of judicial records supposed to involve the Democratic candidate of that year.

Judge David Davis has published a letter in support of Hancock. He says that his election is desirable because it will "put an end to sectional strife," and "will revive a patriotic sentiment all over the land which political leaders and factions for sinister ends have sought to prevent." Great as were the achievements of General Hancock in war, "his conduct in peace, when in command of Louisiana and Texas in 1867, was still greater." Judge Davis is particularly pleased with General Hancock's Order No. 40, in which he announced that "the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, the natural rights of persons and the rights of property must be respected," and says that "these principles are the basis of free government." He declares that "the man who, in the midst of the excitements of that stormy period, was cool enough to see his duty clearly and courageous enough to execute it firmly, may well be trusted in any crisis." His letter to General Sherman "marks him as one of the wisest of his time, with a statesman's grasp of mind, and with the integrity of a patriot whom no sense of expediency could swerve from his honest convictions." With regard to the Republican party he urges that "long and unchecked possession of power by any party leads to extravagance, corruption, and loose practices. After twenty years of domination by the Republicans chronic abuses have become fastened upon the public service like barnacles on the bottom of a stranded ship. There is no hope of reform by leaders who have created a system of maladministration, and who are interested in perpetuating its evils." As to the prospects of the campaign, the judge is clear that "the people demand change, and, being in earnest, they are likely to be gratified." This letter, carefully avoiding any topic upon which there is any conflict of opinion or interest in the country, and going back to the sure ground afforded by trial by jury and habeas corpus, marks the judge as even a wiser and more statesmanlike man than General Hancock. If the latter, in reply to General Sherman's letter, had written about the Wilmot proviso and the alien and sedition law he would have performed a feat equal to that of his independent supporter.

The cheerful Colonel Forney, who makes a specialty of "looking at the bright side of human nature," has been getting into trouble by his overzealous devotion to General Hancock and his very gloomy view of General Garfield, whom he calls a "hypocritical charlatan" and man convicted of "ineffable baseness." This has led the Philadelphia Bulletin to take a gloomy view of the Colonel, and to recall in an unkind way that $25,000 of the Pacific Mail Corruption Fund was traced to the Colonel's hands by a committee of Congress in 1875, when he had gone abroad as some sort of Commissioner for the Centennial Exhibition. We called attention to the matter at the time, and urged the officers of the Exposition to give the Colonel a furlough, and let him come home to explain what he did with the money, which we believe he has never done, feeling doubtless that it was too dismal a subject for a joyous nature like his to dwell on.

The census has already given a very heavy blow to the great Chinese question. The Californians, in working up the Mongolian grievance, have long maintained that in San Francisco, out of a population of 300,000, 60,000 to 75,000 were Chinese. It now turns out that the total population of the city is only 233,000, and of these less than 21,000 are Chinese. It is highly probable, but not yet certain, that there are not over 50,000 Chinamen in the whole State, instead of 150,000 to 175,000, which have been the favorite figures of the agitators of the Mongolian question. This does not prove that there is no such a thing as a Mongolian question, but it does prove that there is gross exaggeration in most of the talk about it.

John McDonald, the most prominent member of the Whiskey Ring which was broken up by Secretary Bristow, has come out with "revelations" on the subject intended to set all doubt at rest with regard to the connection of both General Grant and Babcock with the conspiracy. He is himself a convicted whiskey-thief, and since his release from prison has been getting ready, "with the aid of a young journalist," an octavo volume of some six hundred pages. This is said to have been offered in the first instance to the Republicans, who prudently refrained from paying any hush money for it, and it will now appear as a Democratic campaign document. McDonald says that there was a distinct understanding between General Grant, Joyce the revenue agent, Ford the collector, and himself that a ring should be formed for the purpose of getting up a campaign fund, and that Grant's collusion with the ring "consisted in his utilization of corrupt money to secure his election." After this object was secured McDonald wanted to dissolve the conspiracy, but on laying the matter before Grant and Babcock it was determined to make further use of it for third-term purposes. He says that Commissioner Douglass was one of the ring, and that at the time of the gift to General Grant of a carriage and horses by the ring he took from the President the sum of three dollars, "to enable him to say, if the question were asked, that he had sold the team to him." At another time a box of cigars with a thousand-dollar bill enclosed was sent to General Babcock. He also gives an account of another interview with the President, at which the latter promised to prevent any accumulation of evidence of the whiskey frauds, and if necessary to turn Mr. Bristow out of office. So far as Babcock is concerned the evidence of McDonald is very important. It seems to supply many connecting links that were wanting at his trial, and had it been forthcoming at that time might have resulted in his conviction. As to General Grant, the evidence of a convicted whiskey-thief whom the President refused to pardon, wholly uncorroborated by documentary or other proof, cannot be accorded much weight.

The execution of Balbo and the close of Dr. Tanner's fast will give great relief to a very large body of decent newspaper readers. The space devoted for a fortnight back by some of our esteemed contemporaries to minute accounts of Balbo's physical and mental preparation for death has been almost as great as that devoted to descriptions of the phenomena of Tanner's stomach, and have been fully as disgusting. Chastine Cox's case was taken up by a considerable body of colored people and their ministers as a race question, though it should in justice be said that a public funeral and street-procession were prevented by the good sense of two colored clergymen. His friends threatened Governor Cornell with punishment at the polls for not pardoning him, which was not very surprising considering the talk they heard from plenty more knowing white men in the Whittaker case. After this it is natural that the Italians should have made Balbo's case a race question, and should have threatened Governor Cornell with punishment at the polls for not pardoning him. Not only did they give him a huge public funeral, but they held a meeting outside the cemetery after the interment, at which one of the speakers, named Pratti, a mayor's marshal, denounced Governor Cornell furiously, and, recalling the example of the negroes in Cox's case, pledged his hearers to vote against Garfield in November. Balbo murdered his wife in a most brutal manner, and Cox smothered an old lady in her bed.

Tanner's vomitings and eructations, as minutely described by our esteemed contemporaries, ceased at twelve on Saturday by the close of his fast, and he began to eat again in a most promiscuous manner amidst the frantic applause of the crowd. His eating as he does seems to have alarmed the doctors who have had him in charge almost as much as his fasting, as it ought, under the received theories, to throw him into the most frightful convulsions, but as a matter of fact he seems to digest considerably better than if he had not fasted at all. Medical men, outside the circle of his watchers, do not seem to attach much importance, from a scientific point of view, to Tanner's performance. They are not satisfied with the guaranties for the bona-fide character of the fast, and they say, which we believe is true, that people have lived for forty days on water before now. In the religious world opinions seem to be divided about it. One paper objected to the fast as throwing a slight on one of the New Testament miracles, but others, the Rev. C. S. Williams, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for instance, rejoices in the victory of Tanner's will over his stomach, as showing the superiority of the immaterial over the material, the power of cold water, the folly and ignorance of the doctors, and as rebuking the spirit of gluttony.

Foreign gold of the value of about one million dollars arrived here from Europe during the week, and the foreign exchange market is a trifle nearer to the point at which gold imports will be freely made. Notwithstanding these arrivals and the payment by the U. S. Treasury of about $3,000,000 coin interest, the weekly statement of the New York banks showed a gain in specie of less than $700,000. The Treasury bought $2,500,000 bonds for the sinking fund during the week, making $4,500,000 within ten days of the close of the bank week; but the bank statement showed a loss in legal-tender notes of about $3,500,000. Some currency was sent to the West and the South, but it is impossible to believe that this amounted to one-third of the apparent loss. It was, therefore, concluded by bankers and others that the bank statement had been "rigged" by Stock Exchange speculators. Railroad earnings continue to show a wonderful increase. Forty-two railroads, reporting receipts for June, exhibit an increase of about 34½ per cent. over the large receipts during July, 1879, a circumstance which makes it clear that mercantile business is very active and in volume very large. At the Stock Exchange, investment securities further advanced; the U. S. 4 per cents sold at 109⅝ to 110, the highest price ever reached; and railroad bonds advanced 1 to 3½ per cent. The stock market was without decided tone, except for the stocks of railroads in the Northwestern States, and these advanced from 3 to 10⅝ per cent., the wheat harvest, which the rumor-mongers so persistently destroyed a few weeks since, having turned out to be the best and largest ever gathered. In every department of trade the indications favor a prosperous autumn business.

The Ministry in England seem to have accepted the defeat of the Irish Compensation Bill in the Lords as a final disposition of the matter, and apparently propose nothing in its place, but are determined to enforce the law in Ireland, and have sent fresh troops thither for that purpose. It was somewhat disheartening to find that a majority of twelve of the Liberal peers voted against them. The severe distress in Ireland has ceased for the present, and there is a fair prospect of a good harvest. What the Irish Home-Rulers will do in consequence of the defeat of the bill—that is, whether they will break with their late Jingo allies and support the Ministry or continue their warfare on it—seems to be still undetermined. That the Irish land question will come up again in the next Parliament, and that Mr. Gladstone will attempt to deal with it permanently in a more carefully considered measure, there can be little doubt. There is abundant evidence of the failure of the act now in force to do for the tenant all that it is intended to do, partly owing to the costliness of litigation and partly to a narrow construction of it by the courts. For instance, it has been ruled that to enable an evicted tenant to obtain compensation for his improvements under the act he must, at the time of his eviction, have been in possession of exactly the same holding on which the improvements were made, neither more nor less. Should he before eviction have surrendered a part of his land to the landlord, or have accepted more from him, he lost his right to compensation.

Ayub Khan, who, after his victory over General Burrows on July 27, had the choice of marching either on Kandahar, held with its citadel by General Primrose, or northeastward on Kelat-i-Ghilzai, the British garrison of which is both isolated and weak, seems to have been vacillating for some time, and finally determined to march southward and turn Kandahar, with the object of preventing its relief from Quettah. His troops are reported to have crossed the Argandab. General Primrose has a force of about three thousand men, including the remnants of Burrows's brigade. He has cleared Kandahar of hostile elements, and is believed to be provisioned for more than a month. General Phayre, commanding at Quettah, immediately on receiving the news of Burrows's defeat, marched his troops to the relief of Kandahar, but he has been unable to proceed beyond Chaman-Choki, not fully half-way between the two places. Beyond and around Chaman-Choki the country is seriously disturbed, and both that place and the Khojak Pass, which its fort is intended to secure, are threatened by Afghan tribemen. In the rear of Quettah, too, skirmishing has taken place between British troops retiring upon Sibi and Afghan bands. Though considerable reinforcements have been despatched from India for the support of Phayre, it is very doubtful whether the rescue of Primrose's division can be effected by this advance from the southeast. A more powerful column has been directed on Kandahar, under General Roberts, from Kabul. This column, numbering ten thousand men of all arms, with eight thousand camp-followers, is to pass through Ghazni, there overawing the elements of the population hostile to Abdurrahman, and fight its way, if necessary, to Kelat-i-Ghilzai and Kandahar. This march of about three hundred and fifty miles, from a base which is just being evacuated—General Stewart retiring from Kabul, with the rest of the troops, to Gandamak—will require at least a month's time, and equal boldness and prudence. Kabul is quiet, and the disposition of the new Amir, who is about entering it, is said to be quite satisfactory. On the whole, however, the military situation of the British in Afghanistan is very grave, and the English Government recognizes this fact by sending there reinforcements from Portsmouth, the Cape, Bombay, and the Indus.

Dean Stanley's letter, acquiescing in the decision of the committee to abandon the erection of the monument to the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey in submission to the resolution of the House of Commons, has caused his friends a genuine and somewhat painful surprise. He not only argues the matter over again in a very acrid tone, but closes with what it is almost charitable to call an explosion of anger. He compares the spirit which actuated the House of Commons in passing the recent resolution to that which led the Parliament of 1661 to order the remains of Cromwell and other chiefs of the Commonwealth to be disinterred and dragged from the Abbey to the gibbet. His imagination seems to have been so much touched by the Prince's personal misfortune that he had no eye for the political bearings of his career.

The elections of the Councils-General in France have been looked forward to with great interest as an indication of the effect on the public mind of the Government policy towards the Jesuits. Each department elects a Council, one member being returned from each canton. The term of office is nine years, and a third go out of office every third year. As the electors are the voters of the commune who vote for the members of the Assembly, the result is a pretty fair expression of public opinion, apart from the fact that the Councils-General elect a portion of the Senate. The complete returns show a gain of three hundred seats for the Republicans, a preponderance so enormous that it seems to promise the virtual exclusion of the Bonapartists and Legitimists from public life. As this result is wholly unexpected—the clericals counting with the utmost confidence on the support of the rural districts, and many of the conservative Republicans, such as Jules Simon, fearing that the attack on the religious orders would ruin the Republic—it seems to have produced complete bewilderment among the enemies of the Government of all shades of opinion. It will probably put a stop to the attempts of the Jesuits to resist the Ministry in the courts on the plea, which is technically true, that their houses are private property. The most important consequence of the event, however, will probably be the acceptance of the Republic by a large number of Conservatives who have hitherto refused to treat it as a definitive political settlement. It is undoubtedly the most important event which has occurred in France since the overthrow of the De Broglie-Fourtou Ministry.

THE CANDIDATE'S PARTICIPATION IN THE CANVASS.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S travelling through the country delivering addresses, and visiting New York for the purpose (it was said) of participating in or exercising some influence on the Republican Conference which has just been held in this city, is reviving the discussion of the question of the extent to which a Presidential candidate should take part in his own canvass. As to the expediency of the thing, considered with reference solely to its effect on votes, some of our Republican contemporaries seem to have fully made up their minds. They say that General Scott did it, and was defeated; that Horace Greeley did it, and was defeated; and that any candidate, however able or judicious, who does it is sure to be defeated. No matter how dextrous his speeches may be, and however effective they might prove if delivered by the same orator in a different character, the appearance on the stump of an aspirant to so high an office as the Presidency on his own behalf gives, it is said, a fatal shock to popular prejudice. A good many of the traditions of decorum connected with the Presidency in the public mind have perished since the war. The President delivers speeches during his term of office; he accepts invitations to dinner; and, in fact, of late takes considerable pains to avoid any appearance of official dignity in his relations with the world outside of the White House. With all this people are very well pleased. They like to see the Chief Magistrate carrying himself as a common man while wielding the powers of the greatest office in the world; but they still insist, we are told, that anybody who asks their votes for this office shall during his canvass remain in rigid retirement, and leave to others the task of setting forth his claims to it. This delicacy was pushed so far in 1876 that Mr. Tilden's superintendence of his own canvass, even to the extent of establishing an office for purposes of correspondence and for the issue of documents, was treated by a good many Republican papers as a very serious scandal. This view has, however, of late been completely abandoned. In fact, Mr. Tilden's modus operandi seems to have tickled the imagination of many of his Republican opponents to such a degree that they have since then adopted it themselves. No disgrace seems any longer to attach to "seeking the Presidency." The organization of two, at least, of the "booms" which preceded the late nominating convention was superintended personally by the candidates themselves, who resorted without the least shamefacedness to any means which seemed likely to pack the convention in their own interest. Mr. Blaine's exertions in this line were last spring a frequent subject for the admiration and applause of his supporters. Mr. Sherman modestly announced himself as a candidate on the stump, and followed Mr. Tilden's example to the extent of establishing a "literary bureau" for the issue of documents intended to convince the Republican party of the wisdom of nominating him. Indeed, after all that has occurred, there would have been a certain absurdity on the part of either of these gentlemen in refraining, if nominated, from taking the stump on their own behalf. A candidate who has passed six months in trying to pack a convention cannot possibly lose much dignity by trying to explain to the people that it was all done for their good. In fact, there would be a certain fitness and propriety in his accounting publicly for his extraordinary activity in his own behalf.

We have little doubt, therefore, that though the popular prejudice against the personal participation of candidates in the canvass may still exist, it has been considerably weakened within the last few years. What ruined General Scott was the folly or insipidity of his mode of commending himself; that is to say, he revealed in a peculiarly flagrant manner by his speeches the unfitness for the place which might very well have been inferred à priori from his character and career. Somewhat the same thing may be said of Horace Greeley. He was, under the best of circumstances, a poor orator, and it would have required such powers of speech as very few men possess to make his appearance as the Democratic candidate seem anything but grotesque. When a man puts himself in such a position as that in which he put himself by accepting the Democratic nomination, silence is his best vindication. His wisest course is to let the voters explain his conduct for themselves. They are almost sure to think better of it before hearing his reasons than afterwards. There is nothing either in Greeley's case or General Scott's, apart from the popular prejudice to which we have referred above, to demonstrate the impropriety of the public appearance of a candidate whose nomination has come from his own party, and is a legitimate and just result of his experience and achievements. In fact, there is a great deal to be said in its favor. The great flaw in the working of the governmental machine in our time is the absence of any direct responsibility to the public on the part of officers, and the absence of any direct means of communication between them. If Presidential candidates had always been expected to justify and commend on the stump the party nomination, there is very little doubt that the practice of nominating obscure and mediocre men and keeping them in strict seclusion till the election, would never have sprung up; and the candidate, on the other hand, would not have been able, as he is now, to protect himself against all responsibility by taking shelter behind the party. His position towards the public, in short, would have undergone an assimilation, in many ways desirable, to that of the chief of the cabinet in England. The party would not venture to nominate a man who could not make a good figure in the public presentation of his views on the leading questions of the day, or who had no views to present on such questions. Knowing well, too, that if he took the stump he would have to explain the party position on these questions, not vaguely or evasively but explicitly, they would probably be more careful to furnish him a platform which would bear being expounded. In expounding it, too, he would necessarily commit himself distinctly on all matters of importance, and would thus furnish the voters with very valuable memoranda to be used in watching and criticising his Presidential career.

The effect of this in increasing his sense of responsibility can hardly be overestimated. In England at this moment the Liberals possess no more effective instrument for keeping the Ministers now in office up to their work than the speeches they made when out of office. These speeches were made by the score by nearly every member of the Cabinet; Mr. Gladstone, as was fitting, made more than anybody else. They could not have filled them simply with vague generalities. They had to enter into detailed descriptions of the kind of policy they would substitute, on nearly every matter then before the public, for the policy which was being pursued by the Beaconsfield Ministry. They thus furnished the voters with a kind of hand-book by the aid of which they are now able to call them to account for all errors either of omission or commission. They cannot treat as of no importance things which they said on the stump were of the utmost importance, or escape under cover of a high-sounding phrase from the performance of a duty of which they had before the election given a minute account. In France, in like manner, it is Gambetta's speeches, not only in the Assembly but before popular audiences, which are marking him out for the presidency of the Republic. He is winning public confidence, not by lying quiet or by holding his tongue, but by letting people know what he thinks. In truth, it is through speech and not through silence that the road to high office should naturally lie in constitutional government. In its natural working a man who asks the country for a high trust, instead of becoming dumb as soon as he has announced his candidacy, should talk more than ever before. Nothing can be said in the canvass of half the value of what he says for himself. Our plan of carefully shutting the candidate up after the nomination is made is the result, in part, of the fact that a sort of monarchical tradition surrounded the Presidency from the beginning, and made the reticencies and reserves of royalty seem a part of its essential drapery; in part, of the working of our nominating machinery, which so often produces a candidate who is simply the result of a compromise, or whose best claim to the office has been derived from his obscurity, and who is, therefore, in no sense a fit person to go forth as its champion and attempt public justification of its right to carry on the government.

In 1876 the working of what may be called the Grand-Lama theory of the candidate's position was carried in Mr. Hayes's case to a very mischievous extreme. His backers not only threw the platform overboard, but preached furiously a policy with regard to the South of which it subsequently appeared he totally disapproved, and ignored completely a reform to which he had in general terms committed himself strongly in his letter of acceptance. Nor was this all. While he was presented to the people as par excellence a scrupulous politician, who would win by fair means or not at all, and to whom all tortuous ways were odious, thus offering a happy and most edifying contrast to Mr. Tilden, the chief managers of his canvass, the late Mr. Zachariah Chandler and Mr. Jay Gould, were engaged in a great variety of sinful games (which Tilden must have often viewed with envy) under the pleasing euphemism of "fighting the devil with fire." In fact, Tilden's cipher operations were neither more nor less than an attempt to undo the process of "fixing" which the Republican managers had already successfully carried out in the Southern Returning Boards. When all was over, nobody on the Republican side was responsible for any wickedness or evasion, or for any attempt to mislead or confuse the public mind. Tilden, having assumed the direction of his campaign in person, was, however, held to strict accountability, which he in vain tried to evade, and politics were undoubtedly the better of it.

If it had been possible to retain the earlier ideal of the Presidency—that of a sort of elected constitutional monarch, representing not one party but the whole people, and confined in his sphere of duty to the execution of the laws and the recommendation of beneficial legislation—the plan of keeping him out of the strife of the election would have had a great deal to be said for it. But this ideal has long passed away. He is now recognized as a party leader just as much as Gladstone or Gambetta, and is expected when he gets into office to do far more for his party than either Gladstone or Gambetta. There is, therefore, no reason that will bear serious examination for closing his mouth before election. There are a dozen excellent ones why he should be called on to talk freely. If he talks foolishly or indiscreetly he ought to suffer for it like any other public man. If the candidate had to talk, the convention would take that into account in making the nomination, and govern themselves accordingly. Reputation and experience would then come to have a far higher value in conventions than they have now; the canvass would be much more instructive and interesting, and the people would know on election day far better than they can know now for what and for whom they were going to vote. Though last, not least, the nomination would become a prize to which men of real ability could more confidently look forward, and skill in the manufacture of "booms" would correspondingly decline in value.

THE ADULTERATION OF NEWS.

WE publish elsewhere some account of the expedient to which some men, of both parties in England, who are interested in the Eastern Question have been compelled to resort in order to obtain trustworthy accounts of the real state of things in Turkey. The Eastern Question is, in some of its phases, to Englishmen very much what the Southern question has for some years back been to Americans. Turkey is inhabited by men of various races, and of at least two creeds. Between the Turks and Christians of all races there reigns the deadliest hostility, which displays itself in "outrages" on both sides. These outrages have for the last three or four years played very much the same part in English politics which Southern outrages have played in American politics. It helps the Liberals to produce plenty of outrages by Turks on Christians, and these the Tories have of late been making desperate attempts to offset by stories of outrages on Turks by Christians in the recently liberated provinces. The newspaper correspondence from those regions is almost invariably colored by the political sympathies of the journal in which it appears. The Liberal correspondent is most impressed by the ruffianism of the Turk, the Tory correspondent by the villany of the Christians, which he always maintains is largely the result of Russian prompting. Even tourists, travelling for their own pleasure or information, seem to have their observation affected by the possible influence of what they see upon the fortunes of their party at home. The general result is that materials for a sound judgment upon the policy which England ought to pursue in the East are considered by a good many Englishmen as not attainable in their own press. They have accordingly opened a news-office in London at which they undertake to collect really impartial and trustworthy intelligence from the region which the Eastern Question covers, and sell it at retail to subscribers, much in the fashion in which news of all kinds was sent to the provinces by letter-writers in London in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

In this country, at this moment, the public is reduced to almost similar straits with regard to home politics. There is no leading daily paper, except, perhaps, the New York Herald and its Boston namesake, which makes any attempt to draw a clear line of distinction between its news reports and its editorial commentary. The attitude of the paper towards the politics of the day is settled by the editor in his articles, and the reporters then either only collect such news or give such a coloring to all news as will support his view. The newspaper treatment of the Southern question has, of course, supplied the most striking illustration of the way in which this system of news-gathering works. To the Democratic editor there have never been any outrages or any ballot-stuffing at the South, or, at least, there have been none worthy of notice. To the Republican editor outrages and ballot-stuffing have since the war constituted not only the principal occupation of the Southern whites but their favorite amusement. If the editor sends a reporter or "staff-correspondent" down to discover the real state of the case, he invariably finds that the facts are exactly such as would sustain his chief's editorial view of the situation. The chief's view of the situation is such as to constitute an unanswerable argument for putting or keeping his own party in power. It is not the South alone, however, which furnishes party ammunition. Almost everything that occurs in the political arena at the North is equally useful. Every public man who makes himself at all conspicuous on the opposite side is described either as a drivelling idiot or a great scoundrel. His speeches are either not reported, or reported in such fashion as to make them seem an outburst of either wickedness or folly. The meetings of the opposite party are described as wretched failures in point of numbers or as a huge assembly of the criminal class, drawn together by a brass band and calcium lights and addressed in the intervals of disorder and tumult by notorious political profligates. No reading of the newspapers will to-day furnish any intelligent man with the means of forming a rational judgment as to the condition of political feeling in the Northern States or the prospects of the opposing Presidential candidates. He will find in every State and district that Democrats and Republicans are equally joyous and hopeful; if there has been any apathy or despondency on either side, it has just given place to the most buoyant anticipation. The Democratic reporter never meets or converses with any one who does not look for a "rousing victory" in November for the Democrats. The Republican reporter never meets or converses with anybody who does not look for the same thing for the Republicans. Neither of them ever overhears any talk in hotel, bar-room, or railroad-car in the least discouraging to his own side. He frequently hears, however, expressions of great despondency on the part of the enemy and cutting remarks on the terrible blunders of the leaders. In fact, if either the Democratic or the Republican view of the situation were anywhere near correct, the other party would hardly think of keeping the field, even in name. No foreigner would infer from reading the newspapers on both sides during a Presidential campaign, or during the preparations for the nominating conventions, that there was any body of persons in the country who cared to know the exact truth about the social or political phenomena of the day. He would never imagine that the collection of news—or, in other words, the description of facts just as they occur—was ostensibly one of the largest business enterprises in the country; that tens of millions of capital were invested in it, and probably more ardent, unremitting industry ostensibly devoted to it than to any other money-making calling.

That this is a very serious state of things is plain enough when we consider how rapidly the dependence of the public on the newspaper for everything it knows or wishes to know is increasing. With regard to events which have no especial bearing on party politics the newspaper discharges the function of news-gathering fairly enough. The story of a murder, a fire, a collision, a boat-race, an elopement, a foreign war, an inundation, or a pestilence is told in substantially the same way by all the journals. There may be a difference in the degree of correctness or literary finish between the report of the Crab-apple and that of the Water-melon, on any of these things, but both are written with a fair desire to tell the truth. But the opinion of the community on these things has no especial importance; it does not lead to nor find expression in organized action. Politics is the one thing about which half, or nearly half, the nation has to come to a common understanding and take some decided and concerted course; and the reasons of this course have to be such facts of the day as the working of certain legislation, the condition of society in certain parts of the country, the conduct of certain public men, or the drift of opinion in particular States. It is true that were these facts never so correctly reported, parties would differ in the lessons to be drawn from them. The inferences of one party or the other, or of both, might be erroneous, but no error based on essentially correct information can be half as mischievous or far-reaching as error based on sheer delusion. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the picture of the political condition of the country presented by the party newspapers on both sides at this moment is a phantasmagoria. Not only is nothing of the kind to be found anywhere, but anything of the kind is hardly possible.

As the country grows in population this adulteration of their wares by the news-collectors will prove an increasingly dangerous cause of confusion, unless a new branch of the newspaper business springs up for the supply of as pure news as can be got. It seems useless to expect anything of the kind from the managers of the great journals already in existence. They are all apparently under the influence of traditions of party fealty and advocacy too strong to be overthrown. The separation of the news department from the expository department will apparently have to be the work of a fresh set of newspaper pioneers, like those who produced the form of "great daily" which now flourishes in this city and is such a remarkable advance on its predecessor, which made little pretence to news-gathering at all. Certainly it would be hard to think of any new agency which would contribute so much to the rational decision of great political issues, and to the encouragement of talent and integrity among public men, as the application to news-gathering of the rules of conduct which now make it infamous for a man to sell watered milk, or sanded sugar, or fill life-preservers with hay.

THE DECLINE OF "YOUNG AMERICA."

IT is considerably less than a generation ago that the representative American youth took a pride, that was at least conspicuous, in the possession of traits of character which it is easy to see are now the object of his profound, though it may be half-conscious, commiseration. The spirit of "Young America" was a very distinct and not unpicturesque thing; it was both American and young; the national symbol of the American eagle, noticeably rampant, and the national sentiment that found expression in the three or four songs of which the airs alone now remain familiar, had their correlatives in the individual character, in which the virtues of independence, self-reliance, energy, shrewdness, and so on were often recognizable in their respective excesses. The individual's association of himself with his country was intimate to intensity; patriotism was quite unreasoning—"My country, right or wrong," its shibboleth; a general jealousy of foreigners, a particular hostility to Great Britain, admiration of things American because they were American, were universal. Impersonal criticism of these or other things was very nearly unknown; "culture" was an unmeaning term; education was viewed as a process of acquisition merely; and even of education which exceeded plainly utilitarian purposes it may be doubted if there was not a popular distrust felt by the "self-made" majority, which echoed the sentiment of the late Mr. Greeley: "Of all horned cattle deliver me from college graduates." College graduates themselves were very much of Mr. Greeley's temper; they were not given to abstractions, and had a quick sympathy for vigor, activity, summariness, and the chameleon quality called practical common sense. A firm belief in material civilization, a confidence in its ability to take care of itself with the minimum of guidance, a comfortable comparison of the United States with priest-ridden Italy or "slow-going" Great Britain, charity for "idealists," a devotion to the simpler half of Davy Crockett's maxim, were as distinctly in the creed of the college graduate who was "worth anything" as they were illustrated by the lives of the exemplars held up to him from his boyhood. The "be-sure-you're right" part of the maxim was undoubtedly in effect assumed to be Fabian and un-American. The condition of politics quite as much, perhaps, as the character of our civilization contributed to this; the two, at any rate, joined forces and worked in harmony. The division of parties was, except to a very few, essentially a moral one. The great political question, in some shape or another and more or less remotely, being slavery, it could not be that the disputants should conceive each other as intellectual opponents merely, or as anything but fanatics on either side. One of the heaviest penalties that has been exacted of the South is, perhaps, to be found in the survival among the most intelligent of the Southern people of the political terminology of a past period; the term "Abolitionist" has passed out of existence in great measure, but that of "Radical" still remains, and is supposed to characterize a political opponent with equal vigor.

This mental attitude is certainly not confined to the South, and one may still hear in certain highly cultivated quarters of Yankeedom a doubtful person referred to with sincerity as "either corrupt or a Democrat," or, on the other hand, find excellent and "conservative" folk who still associate certain political doctrines with "short-haired women and long-haired men." But this is strictly confined, so far as our observation serves us, to the passing generation. The youth of the present day, whose family teaching was that one set or the other of public men were profoundly immoral, but who finds that there is really no way of telling whether a man is a Democrat or a Republican except by asking him, and experiences increasing difficulty in deciding whether he himself is one or the other, unless heredity (which has less and less force in such matters) settles it for him, is really hard put to it to appreciate his father's intensity in the matter. The feeling between the two is not very unlike that which Scott portrayed with so much humor in the novel in which figures the fine old baronet who is enraged at being entrapped into eulogy of Milton. In one sense this explains the phenomenon which has been so variously interpreted recently of the allegiance of the passing and the hostility of the rising generation to the Machine in politics; the Machine secures the adherence of the one in virtue of their habitual attachment to what the Machine once stood for, and which they are reluctant to see no longer exists; with the other it stands on its merits. As Mr. Beecher says, the "very young men" do not like it. The same attitude is observable in their patriotism, which has manifestly little that is obtrusive or rank about it. Former universality of the most cherished stock notions seems to be less and less a sufficient guarantee to them for the validity; and the notion that "the great American" this or that is the ideal of its kind is in the way of suffering accordingly. Cosmopolitanism is a new thing in America, but among them it is a decorous enthusiasm. The association of monarchical institutions with despotism no longer occurs to them; the disadvantages of a democracy in general and of this republic in particular are quite as present in their minds as the corresponding excellences; they have a smattering of political science, and are fond of using its terminology and applying its abstractions. Scores of young men whose "language" is "large" may be found who look upon the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor as rather puerile, think the execution of André a piece of colonial impertinence, and regard Washington as a prig; who will argue in favor of caste and the beneficence of an aristocracy with a fervor and from premises that would astonish an Austrian archduke, and plead the right of "the people" to be governed, with a cordiality that Carlyle would approve. We venture to say that the advantages which lie in conditions that preclude the uneasiness of ambition and the anxiety of human competition, are set forth nowhere with so much fluency and unction as they are by a young American fresh from his Senior year's examination of a philosophy which proclaims the ideas of the Declaration crude and unsound. We have recently witnessed the expression of a good deal of strictly American indignation, excited by Mr. Henry James's book on Hawthorne; and it is not to be denied that this incident is scarcely an apt illustration of the decline of one of the most ridiculous phases of "Young America." In general, however, we suspect it is true that the younger of its competent critics did not find it an objection to the book that it measured Hawthorne by universal rather than American literary standards; and that, if we except the surviving Transcendentalists of thirty or forty years ago, most of its censors were dissatisfied with it not because Mr. James's view was unpatriotic, but because it was a little too consciously "objective"—although it must be admitted that this was not the reason generally assigned. But Mr. James himself is a hundredfold nearer the typical American youth than his censors, and the difference between the reception of his book and the storm of patriotic disapprobation which Cooper aroused by a far milder cosmopolitanism, is a striking instance of the change which a few years have wrought.

That potent material cause to which so many and such various effects upon national manners and character are so rightly attributed—the sudden increase of wealth, namely—is evidently to be credited with a good deal of this. It is, of course, idle to speak of it as universal; one thinks of a multiplicity of exceptions at once. But in speaking of types no one looks for an actual embodiment of the qualities in question, or attempts to arrive at them by a count of heads and determination of majorities; in other words, it is plain that the "average" man may or may not be the "typical" man, and that when we speak of the typical American youth of the present day, it is largely a matter of tendencies generally characteristic rather than of the individual character shared by the greatest number. In this sense it is clear that he has now become a member of a class which, to a greater or less extent, is an educated class, and which—since every American, whatever his own acquirements, has an active belief in education—is increasing in numbers in a direct ratio with the increase of wealth. Of this class many have travelled, and not a few have studied abroad. Every year all the colleges send a larger number of graduates to Germany. Those who go, from the Heidelberg student of biology to the butterfly who flits from London to Paris, to Vienna, and so on, are, in one way or another, learners; and they come back, many of them, in precisely the opposite spirit to that of Senator Conkling, who waited till late in life, like General Grant, before leaving "the greatest country the sun shines upon," even temporarily. Unlike Senator Matthews, they care very much "for abroad." In New York there is a large class of wealthy young men who omit no effort to secure complete Anglicanization. They cherish the eccentricities of the English vernacular and accent, order their clothes of a London tailor, interest themselves in the fashionable gossip to be obtained from the new English weeklies, possess photographs of English "professional" beauties, and even go so far as to "talk horse" in English fashion. The solemnity with which this last is done is very remarkable; conversation about "riding to hounds" in a country where there is no opportunity for such an amusement, except in a few instances where there is no game, sounds as singular as it is undoubtedly innocuous, but it is certainly a striking indication of the dissatisfaction existing among many young Americans with the "provincial" sports that have hitherto sufficed for them. Coaching, polo, and lacrosse can be transplanted and have intrinsic adaptability to American conditions, but nothing, one would say, could be more like the play minus Hamlet than fox-hunting in a country where there is nothing to resemble or answer to the time-honored squirarchy of Great Britain. Along with this no close observer can fail to notice a great decline in the peculiarly American vices of young men. The more boisterous varieties of dissipation seem to be gradually but perceptibly getting out of date, though we can fancy the statement would be received with surprise by the great West. Nothing is so fatal to fashionable vice as becoming unfashionable, and the whiskey-drinking, gambling, and horse-trotting young man of a dozen or fifteen years ago has in great measure given place to a jeunesse dorée which has come to regard his practices as vulgar. The people who "hang around theatres," frequent bar-rooms, and drink too much when they plainly shouldn't, are now apt to be either low or over forty. There may be as much dissipation, but it is fair to say that it is more decorous.

A sense of decorum, even in its excess of affectation of manners, freedom from prejudice, even in its excess of lukewarm patriotism, and an inclination towards things of the mind even at the price of exchanging the substance of realities for the shadow of abstractions, are not, however, qualities to be deeply dreaded in Americans. They are, as yet, chiefly tendencies, and it will probably be some time before their conflict with their opposites ceases to be unequal. Moreover, they are now mainly visible in the excess, which is a characteristic of all development so rapid as that of America; and that they lie in the line of national development instead of being an accidental variation, should be clear to every one. For the present, at least, action is giving place to speculation in American life, and it is more important that the national intelligence should be widened and quickened than that the American heart should be fired by a newspaper rumor that a Spanish gunboat has made a target of the stars and stripes, or a squad of Mexicans has crossed the Texan border; more important that political economy should be generally understood than that Fourth of July audiences should be large; and of consequence that men should know how to use as well as how to get money. Nevertheless it can hardly be that the present transformation should not be looked upon as a mark of decadence by many of the passing generation, at least by that part of it which has acumen enough to realize the change without the ability either to sympathize with it or contemplate it impersonally. The passing generation is always the laudator temporis acti, if it has accomplished its work as faithfully and through as high a sincerity as the generation of Americans which has been an active witness of a great civil war, the death of a powerful social institution, the establishment, as it were, of something like a new nation. It appreciates too nearly the cost of its own progress to accept lightly the possibility of another step in advance unattended by "severe pains and birth-throes"; it reflects upon risks which seem too great to be run twice with impunity, and dreads the effect of its own momentum. But no historical induction is clearer than the constant correspondence between new dangers and adequate provision for them, if only the two conditions of character and intelligence accompany national growth; and to distrust the effect upon character of the evident progress of this country in intelligence is to abjure what may almost be called the main article of the American creed, which affirms the intimate connection between education and morality. There is slight analogy as yet, at all events, between the United States and the later Roman Empire. We have long ere this had the stimulant of our Gothic invasion on the one hand, and have stood the shock of barbarian hordes on the other. The modern world having very distinct characteristics, its own perils and its own defences, the main thing is to keep abreast of the modern world. Having accomplished this to the world's surprise in a material way; having conquered a lasting peace, wealth, and, relatively, thorough contentment, to put our "machinery" to some use, and to keep pace with the world in the things beyond machinery, other faculties are demanded than those required to perfect it. To avoid the result of stagnation, in which successful struggle sometimes ends, a new set of forces is clearly needed, and any one who infers from their fastidiousness, idealism, or even their pococurantism and absurdity, a lack of seriousness in contemporary American youth, evinces ignorance of one of the most characteristic of American traits—a trait whose permanence is secured by the genealogy of the people—namely, a disposition, proceeding equally, perhaps, from sensitiveness and bravado, to guard securely and, if necessary to that end, misreport in a dozen ways the really fundamental earnestness which is their Anglo-Saxon inheritance. At least the decline of "Young America" was as important as it was inevitable, and to lament it with misgiving will seem to reflecting patriotism a mark of the "little faith" which has always, and on the highest authority, been adjudged unwisdom.

JULY 14, 1789—JULY 14, 1880.

LONDON, July 27, 1880.

"OF all the events in the history of the world, how much is this the greatest, and how much the best." These were the words with which Charles James Fox greeted the tidings that the Bastille had fallen. His language re-echoed the universal sentiment of his time. Pietists such as Cowper, writers such as Coleridge and Wordsworth, destined to give expression to the sentiment of anti-revolutionary reaction; thinkers as calm as Mackintosh, statesmen as versed in affairs as Washington, or, one may add, as Pitt; men leading the quiet life of the middle classes, such as Dr. Rigby at Norwich, or Steffens or Perthes in Germany; persons, in short, of all nations and of all ranks, shared, or even exaggerated, the enthusiasm expressed by Fox. The fall of the Bastille was to the men of 1789 like unto the fall of the walls of Jericho. A miracle had been worked. At the voice of the people the high places of tyranny had been overthrown, and a generation burning with what in later days has been termed the "enthusiasm of humanity" were prepared at once to occupy and possess the long-promised land of freedom, of equality, and of enlightenment. Now that ninety-one years have passed since the day which the French Republic has with admirable tact chosen to commemorate by a national anniversary, the enquiry inevitably suggests itself whether the enthusiasm excited amongst our forefathers by the "greatest event in the history of the world" has been justified by its results. The question is one rather of history than of politics, and may now be discussed without prejudice as without passion; and I will, with your permission, give the reasons which, in my judgment, may satisfy an age as sceptical and unenthusiastic as our own that the hopes of 1789 were something better than generous illusions, and have received as much justification from the course of events as is ever granted to the aspirations of mankind.

Any one who discusses this subject must at once make one or two admissions. No person of half Fox's sense could (it must be granted) now in calm blood apply to the taking of the Bastille terms which, in his mouth, were the natural expression of natural feeling. The storming of the royal prison-house was assuredly neither the "greatest" nor yet the "best" of historical transactions. If, again, we are to estimate the true results of the Revolution we must be careful not to limit our gaze to France. We must further admit that no movement, however great—not, for example, the Reformation, nor, one may say, the propagation of Christianity itself—has ever produced, nor, human nature being what it is, can produce those purely and absolutely beneficial effects which have been expected from it by reformers, heroes, or saints. These and some other obvious admissions must undoubtedly be made by any one who attempts to answer the enquiry I have raised. But they need not prevent him from replying to it with a decided affirmative.

The objects towards which the hopes of 1789 were with more or less consciousness directed may be roughly summed up in the terms "popular sovereignty," "equality of rights," "liberty," and "enlightenment." These terms are vague. Part of their power to move mankind was due to their vagueness. They are, however, though, like all general conceptions, extremely hard to define, sufficiently intelligible. The true mode of estimating the results of the Revolution is to consider how far these its aims have been attained. The "sovereignty of the people" was, unless my memory deceives me, the principle which was toasted by Priestley and his friends when the philosopher incurred the anger of the mob of Birmingham; and persons like George III., who were not prepared exactly to justify Lynch law, still felt and expressed a certain gratification at the dreams of a philosophical radical being roughly broken by the very mob to whose sovereignty he was doing homage. No doubt the celebrated Unitarian was for the moment met by a rather awkward argumentum ad hominem; but whoever compares the present with the past must surely admit that Priestley's dream has been verified, and his formula, in substance, been accepted by the world. The "sovereignty of the people" means neither more nor less than the admission that in civilized countries the government exists for, and ought to be in the main carried on in obedience to the wishes of, the majority of the nation. This principle, like every other, is but imperfectly obeyed, but it certainly is throughout the greater part of Europe, as in the United States, a recognized axiom of government. Its power is, in fact, most observable in states which do not possess democratic institutions. Bismarck and his master are more powerful than any other European rulers, but every one knows that their power rests on their fulfilling the main wishes of Germany. The people, like nature, are governed by being obeyed, and within a century after the fall of the Bastille the most powerful monarchy in Europe owes its strength to owning the sovereignty of the people.

Of the triumph throughout the civilized world of the idea of "equality" there is no need to say much, since the very complaint of thinkers who, like De Tocqueville, have analyzed the political phenomenon of modern society, is that the passion for equality menaces the love of liberty. A single point, however, requires notice. One cannot understand what the leaders of opinion in the last century meant by equality unless one tries to realize the condition of ante-revolutionary Europe. Its prominent feature was inequality —i.e., the fact that men's rights depended on difference of classes. This held good throughout the Continent. It was even more true of republican Switzerland than of monarchical France. It was, in fact, the legacy of feudalism. No doubt there were many persons who fancied that because artificial class-distinctions were then the curse of the world an equally artificial absence of all distinctions whatever was the "state of nature," and as such the true panacea for all the diseases of a corrupt civilization. But the real grievance was a condition of things which the most vehement conservative of the nineteenth century would find in practice absolutely intolerable. The cry for equality meant the abolition of feudal institutions and the opening of a free career for talent. In its real significance it embodied a perfectly rational demand, which has during every year since 1789 received more and more complete satisfaction.

The side on which a hostile critic would, at first glance, be most likely to charge the Revolution with failure is the attempt to secure individual liberty. There is certainly much to suggest that in France, as in some other parts of Europe, the movement which produced equality took away many of those checks on power which are essential to the security of freedom. Still if, putting aside theories or preconceived ideas, one tries to look facts in the face, it is difficult to believe that during the last ninety years individual freedom, both of opinion and of action, has not made the most stupendous progress. If we leave Russia and Turkey out of account, as countries which lie outside the great European movement, there is not a civilized state where individual freedom is not, at any rate in theory, admitted as the basis of the existing institutions. No doubt theory and practice by no means always coincide. Still, it is not rash to assert that throughout every part of the civilized world an ordinary person leading the every-day life of a common citizen is protected or is, in fact, exempt from the caprices of arbitrary power. Persecution, in the true sense of the term, has all but ceased to exist. The petty and irritating despotism which till the very eve of the Revolution was rampant in every state of Germany, would not now be tolerated even in Spain; whilst in countries such as England, France, and Italy there are such security for personal freedom and such unrestrained liberty of discussion as have never been known at any other period of the world's history. The intense admiration excited in the last century by the English Constitution is not so much a tribute to the merits of institutions far inferior to those which now exist in Great Britain and elsewhere, as an unmistakable sign of the failure during the eighteenth century of Continental governments to secure for their subjects the most ordinary blessings of freedom.

The weak point in the revolutionary movement lies in its not achieving anything like the general diffusion of enlightenment which was supposed to be the almost necessary result of overthrowing political despotism. The causes of this comparative failure might themselves form the subject of lengthy speculation. One or two points, at any rate, deserve consideration. It is, in the first place, clear that the opponents of the Revolution, such, for instance, as Burke, were nearly as much at sea as the revolutionists themselves as to the relation between religious belief and politics. In a certain sense the revolutionists were the clearer-sighted of the two. They at least saw, though very dimly, that somehow or other Catholicism and modern liberalism must come into conflict, whilst Burke never seems to have supposed that many of the notions of justice and good government in which he himself fully believed might be thwarted by religious fervor or fanaticism. No one, in the second place, anticipated that the religious society in which Talleyrand was a bishop contained in it sufficient life to become again a moral or immoral power in the world; and one cause of this was that few persons appreciated what is after all the formidable fact in the modern world, the different degrees of education attained by different classes, and hence the difference of the beliefs by which they are certain to be influenced. Add, lastly, that the statesmen of the Revolution deplorably neglected the lessons of the Reformation. They neither knew how to oppose fervent faith to fervent superstition, nor how to strike at the root of priestly domination by substituting for an unmarried priesthood, who could not be citizens, a body of married clergy forced by their very position to be loyal to the state.

On one side, at least, the movement of 1789 has hitherto fallen short of its promise. Still, even this shortcoming is due rather to the reaction of the nineteenth than to the Revolution of the eighteenth century. In any case, an event which heralded in the reign of popular sovereignty, the abolition of legal inequality, and the increase of human liberty, may claim a foremost place among the great transactions in the history of the world.

THE PASSION PLAY.

Ober-Ammergau, July 14.

THIS quiet Bavarian village of some two thousand inhabitants, remote from the railroad, isolated from the rest of the world in a broad, high valley, which is surrounded by a wall of mountain ranges, and through which flows the swift and sparkling Ammer, is very old. It was built on the mediæval highway between Venice and Augsburg, and has always been under the immediate auspices of the great and famous monastery of Ettal, two miles away. The soil is clayey and infertile, and the inhabitants make a scanty livelihood by carving wooden images of the saints, altar-pieces, crucifixes, and more recently toys and useful and ornamental articles of household furniture. The Passion Play has probably been performed here since the thirteenth century, although tradition dates it from early in the seventeenth, and declares that it was first represented in consequence of a vow made during a plague. Like other mysteries and miracle plays it was originally written in doggerel, the manuscript of which the burgomaster still preserves, and was performed in the churchyard, with the church-door as a background, and with priests and monks in the chief rôles. The prince of hell and his court were represented on the lower part of the stage, and imps tore out and devoured the entrails of Judas after his suicide. Rival representations in other places decayed one after another, while this, owing in part to the constant revision of the monks of Ettal, and partly to the unique character of this choice survival, has steadily grown to be more and more widely famous; till now, as the inhabitants of Olympia were largely occupied during the intermediate years in preparation for their great festival, so here the Passion Play is the great event of the decade for the Ober-Ammergauers. The "passion year" is a sort of jubilee. Debts are paid, the poor pensioned, marriages delayed or hastened to fall within its limits, and every household receives a part of the proceeds of the season after it has ended.

The people are devoutly religious in the best Catholic fashion. The outer walls of all the best houses are adorned with large and gaudy paintings representing Biblical scenes, and done by native artists. The usual form of salutation is Greet God. There are few newspapers and almost no books to be found in the village, but I heard in a kind of beer-shanty a lively discussion of the manner in which Joseph of Arimathæa embalmed the body of Jesus. An immense crucifixion group, done in stone, was presented by the King of Bavaria and stands on a slight eminence just outside the town, and a tall wooden cross rises above the lofty peak of the Kofel, which almost overhangs the town. Votive tablets abound in every street. In short, since a brief visit in Oberlin some years ago, in which I was immediately questioned with considerable minuteness by the venerable ex-president about my personal relations to the Saviour, and since hearing in the college yard there the prayers and hymns with which every recitation is opened, I have not spent a week in an atmosphere of such all-pervading piety as here. The peculiar flavor of Gemüth native among these highlands, together with the dreamy beer, the intractable and almost threatening aspect of nature, poverty, and I know not what other causes, have combined to give the inhabitants a calm, tender, and contemplative character which their occupation in carving, and now, since the establishment of a school of design here, in studying various attitudes of devotion and suffering in saints and martyrs, has deepened and confirmed.

I shall attempt no account of the play itself, which is described in a dozen hand-books. It consists of seventeen acts, lasts eight hours, brings between five and six hundred people upon the stage, and is listened to on an average by about thirty-five hundred peasants, who sit through rain and sunshine on the benches in the unroofed space immediately in front of the stage, and by more than a thousand "guests" further back under cover. A great majority of the latter are English and American visitors. Most have read by this time how the rôles are assigned by vote of a large committee of citizens, after long and careful discussion of natural adaptation in character and personal appearance; of the long and tedious drilling required at rehearsals; of the studies of costume and attitude, many of which are easily-recognized copies of pictures in the galleries of Munich; of the inflexible rule that only those born in the village can have any hand in the play; of the long hair and beard cultivated years beforehand; how the tall, handsome Joseph Maier, who looks and acts the part of Jesus so creditably, must seclude himself after the play till the peasants from a distance have left town, that they may not fall to saying prayers to him as if he were really Christ. Indeed, I have been told (I know not how advisedly) that some of the leading characters live and grow into their parts so deeply—for which, indeed, they are sometimes destined from childhood—that, but for the long interval of ten years, aided by the corrective influence of assuming various parts in other smaller religious dramas (including even a version of "Antigone," often performed for practice and for the amusement of their townsmen), they would no doubt fall into the insane delusion that they were in very deed the characters they delineated. However this may be, most of the leading performers, whom I have taken pains to meet, appear in their homes remarkably as they do on the stage, and they seem to me profoundly penetrated with what they suppose to be the consciousness of the characters they have assumed. I have observed in none of them the frequent fluctuations of tone common to so many actors in personal intercourse with their private friends.

I heard the play twice—once among the peasants and once upon the visitors' seats further back. Many of the former come from a great distance, and sometimes on foot as a sort of pilgrimage, and prepare themselves for it by fasting and by attending early mass, where they are told how to make the spectacle a means of grace. Most of them wept, some convulsively, at the affecting passages, and laughed heartily at the well-acted remorse of Judas. The play is designed, of course, for the people, and is intensely realistic. They see and hear the blood spurt when the spear is thrust into the side of Jesus. The casting of the lots and the parting of the garments are tediously true to life. Real doves fly away when the tables of the money-changers are overturned. Every spectator can see and count the thirty pieces of silver as they are rung down upon a stone table, and the laugh is loud as Judas greedily scrabbles them up one by one into his bag. The scourging, the bloody sweat, the blows of the hammer upon the nails of the cross, are all wearily real and unmistakable without the long explanation of the choragus. Nothing whatever is left to the imagination. Even the language in some scenes is scarcely less than vulgar, and most of it is in striking contrast with the elaborate elegance of most of the English versions. That the people who hear the play are edified and instructed there can be little doubt. It is also a valuable discipline for those who perform it. The community is united in a common, serious occupation. In the larger scenes hundreds act and sing together with an earnestness and unanimity very rarely witnessed in the best operas or theatres. Each feels a common local pride and responsibility; and although the individual actor often seems to forget himself in the earnestness with which he enters into his part, I doubt if he for a moment entirely forgets that his Dorf is under inspection.

The great majority of the guests also were religious people, but Protestant, with perhaps even a larger proportion of clergymen than there was of priests among the peasants. Here I saw no one visibly affected by the pathos of the scenes: none laughed; but many turned away with apparent pain or disgust at the thrust of the spear. I believe that all who expected to find any grand dramatic element, or religious edification, or to get a deeper sense of the ideal content of the story of the cross, were disappointed. The details and the dénouement were too familiar beforehand, and interest centred inevitably upon a critical contemplation of the technical elements of the play. There is a melodramatic sort of religious idealism in tinsel, gaudy costumes, transformation effects, tableaux vivants, and pleasant but indifferently good music for peasants, if the theme is moral and devotional, which no degree of realism or vulgarization can entirely obscure. This effect all who have thoughtfully observed the unhappy results of scepticism upon the average half-cultured mind must heartily sympathize with. There is a steadying, elevating power about this most sublime of popular epics the place of which for the ordinary consciousness nothing else can supply. It closes up the vast abysmal and unprofitable speculative questions of life and destiny in which the oriental mind was absorbed, in a way which stimulates art and regulates conduct and has given a practical direction to the course of history. Yet at the same time, from the Protestant standpoint, the Passion Play seems pretty well shorn of better and higher motives, clumsily composed (in a dramatic sense), and its leading rôles very inadequately conceived. Thus, despite sympathy with the theme and the kindest feelings toward those who represent and enjoy it, there is an element of pity, disappointment, and recoil from such a materialism of faith which the high strategic authorities of the Church, who are so hopeful and happy over the popularity the play has attained among Protestants, do not detect, and which will make it harder than ever for clergymen to produce any effect by mere descriptions, however vivid, of the life and passion of Jesus. Powerful as these have been in art and in the history of Catholicism, and readily as they would lend themselves to a more Protestant treatment (as Bach's Passion music shows), making the cultus of Protestantism less nonsensuous, and less remote from every-day life, and less transitional and unsteady, no one can or does deny that they are rapidly losing points of contact with modern life.

At the same time there is one obvious "improvement" which we trust it is not too sanguine to expect many Protestants may extract from their experience in this village. There is a standpoint of more trained and developed understanding and reason, still more non-sensuous and still more deeply religious than theirs; a standpoint from which their creed and service appears in all respects precisely as that of these peasants appears to them—as a useful and valuable symbol of truth, the perfection of which for those who hold it is to be judged by its moral and social effects. That the Protestant is less satisfied with his faith than the Catholic believer is shown by the great jealousy of the former of being approved or "patronized," however warmly and sincerely, by those above him, who dispute nothing but the old and baseless claim of absoluteness and universal validity, and whose social and devotional sentiments often lead them to try to attend church despite so much that is personally distasteful to them in the utterances of the pulpit. Finally, the Passion Play is a product of the ancient communal German life. It is eminently national, although it is animated by the old guildic local spirit. It has demonstrated the possibility and the tremendous impressiveness of the historic drama. The size of the stage and the number of people shouting and acting in chorus upon it are the largest and most impressive, I think, in the modern world. As Devrient well says, upon such a stage and in the open air of day, not only the ordinary private confidences and intrigues of guardians and lovers, but even Thekla, Romeo, and Katherine of Heilbronn would be shamed and ineffective. A larger measure of interests transcending the individual, and even a realistic roughness in act and word in place of ordinary dramatic polish and unity, become imperative. The "Nibelungen" can, why cannot more strictly sacred themes be made impressive by the highest of the arts?

THE LONDON PRESS.—III.

THE MORNING POST.

LONDON, 1880.

THE London morning newspapers, making exception of those which are purely local and are devoted to cultivating the public spirit of Hackney and Kensington, of Newington Butts and Hockley-in-the-Hole—a class of journalism to which of late a considerable extension has been given—are seven in number. They are the Times, the Morning Post, the Morning Advertiser, the Standard, the Daily News, the Daily Telegraph, and the Daily Chronicle. Of these one is distinctly Conservative, the Standard; two are distinctly Liberal, the Daily News and the Daily Chronicle; the remaining four fluctuate between Liberalism and Conservatism, as Liberalism or Conservatism happens to be in the ascendant, or as Lord Beaconsfield or Mr. Gladstone is the Minister of the day. Of these newspapers three are published at what is now considered to be the full price of threepence, though a generation ago, and even less, a threepenny newspaper would have been considered as an impossible and dangerously cheap venture. Looking back on the past it seems almost impossible that an evening journal such as the Globe, whose size was not greater than that of a single page of one of the present morning newspapers, should have been sold for sevenpence. The threepenny newspapers now in existence are the Times, the Morning Post, and the Morning Advertiser. They are also, by a coincidence which has no particular meaning in it, the oldest members of the London morning press. They a little resemble ancient stately but impoverished families, who carry on a starved but dignified existence in scantily-furnished baronial halls and at slenderly-burdened baronial tables. The Times, of course, stands by itself, and it ought to be excepted, perhaps, from the remark which has just been made. It is quite probable that under skilful management it will maintain its position as the organ of the purely political world, of the richer mercantile classes, and of those wealthy persons who stand aloof from narrow party connections.

The other two papers, the Morning Post and the Morning Advertiser, maintain their threepenny dignity under conditions very different. The Morning Post is the oldest daily newspaper now published in London, its existence having begun some dozen years before the Times appeared under its original name of the Daily Universal Register, and some sixteen years before it was issued with the title that it now bears. The Morning Post was started in 1772, four years, therefore, before the American Declaration of Independence. It always affected to be what is now called a society paper, and its first editor, who was known as Fighting Parson Bate, from his profession and from his duelling propensities, was a journalist of a type, half ruffler half dandy, which is more common in Paris at present than in London. Parson Bate afterwards succeeded to a baronetcy, and was a characteristic figure of his time, when a clergyman was often a younger son who would more decently have been in the army than in the Church, and when prize-fighting and cock-fighting were considered to be if not essential to the character of a gentleman, yet by no means in disparagement of it. The Morning Post, however, had its brilliant literary period. It fell into the hands of two very business-like gentlemen as its proprietors—a Mr. Stuart, who was connected with literature in so far as he was the brother-in-law of Sir James Mackintosh, and Mr. Christie, who was a well-known auctioneer. These gentlemen dealt with and used authors as Mr. Tattersall would deal with and use horses, or not so well; or as the publishers of a former day dealt with and used Johnson and Goldsmith and Savage. Besides Mackintosh, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, Southey and Charles Lamb were contributors to the Morn- ing Post, Coleridge writing political and literary articles, Wordsworth and Southey writing anti-Gallican verses, half-reactionary and half-revolutionary, and Charles Lamb contributing what were supposed to be sprightly paragraphs. The difference between the contemporary and the posthumous estimate of great men can scarcely be more pointedly conveyed than by the comparison of the terms in which Mr. Stuart spoke of his literary men, and the value which the present generation place on their writings. Fox declared that it was Coleridge's articles in the Morning Post which provoked the rupture of the Treaty of Amiens; and the story is told that the first Napoleon made an attempt to intercept the vessel which bore his literary assailant from Italy to England. They deserve to take rank among the very few writings in ephemeral politics which, in discussing the questions of the day, elucidate principles and evolve ideas of permanent value and general application. In this respect they may be compared, although the interval is great, with the speeches and letters of Burke. The difference is that Burke gave up metaphysics for politics, and that Coleridge gave up politics for metaphysics. In other words, we have in Burke's writings and speeches the thoughts of one who above all was a statesman and a man of action, and in Coleridge those of one who drowned in moon-struck and opium-inspired reveries whatever faculties of clear and decisive perception were left to him. Byron alludes in one of his spiteful lines to Coleridge as having let his "flighty pen unto the Morning Post's aristocracy," with a sneer at his unaristocratic matrimonial alliance.

The Morning Post's aristocracy is the one feature which has remained common to it from the days of the fighting Parson Bate to those of its present proprietor and manager, Sir Algernon Borthwick. It is the organ of the two most aristocratic classes of English society—of gentlemen, and of the persons who are known as gentlemen's gentlemen; of ladies, and of ladies' maids. Its politics are essentially of an exclusive type, and if there is any class of persons more exclusive than the upper ten thousand of English society those persons are the lower hundreds of thousands of gentlemen in livery or out of it, and of ladies in the cast-off robes of their mistresses, who wait upon the titled and untitled nobility of England. The politics of the boudoir and of the still-room, of the smoking-room and of the butler's pantry, are, there is every reason to believe, identical. They are inspired by the common dislike of Mr. Gladstone and of the Radicals, and a contempt for the trading and the lower classes. Probably this feeling is stronger in "Jeames" even than it is in his master. The mention of Jeames at once recalls Thackeray, who threw the fierce light that now beats upon everything on Jenkins of the Morning Post. The original Jenkins (his real name was even more literary) was during his day the most valuable of contributors to the Morning Post. He is still living. He has retired from journalism to the wine trade, in which there is every ground for thinking that he flourishes. In the same way the humbler Jeamses of plush usually emancipate themselves from servitude by becoming the owners and landlords of public-houses frequented by their former comrades. It was Jenkins's business to describe fashionable weddings and funerals, and other festive and melancholy celebrations in which the aristocracy bore part. On one occasion an account appeared in the Morning Post of the interior of a great house in which events supposed to be interesting to the public were taking place. Midway the narrative was suddenly interrupted, and the writer proceeded, without a moment's notice, to describe the outside of the mansion which was the subject on which he was engaged. The comment of Punch on this abrupt transition was characteristic: he inferred from it that Jenkins had suddenly been detected and kicked out, and that, faithful to his duty, he immediately proceeded, without a moment's delay, to describe the outside of the edifice from which he had been violently extruded. Jenkins, however, had his revenge upon his malicious assailant. It was one of Thackeray's weaknesses not only to be fond of "good" society, but also to be anxious that the world should know that he was admitted to it. One of the duties of Jenkins, as it is now one of the duties of his very respectable successor, was to sit in the halls of great houses at which receptions are being given, and to take down the names of the guests, for publication in the Morning Post next day. Thackeray soon discovered that his name was systematically omitted from these lists, where probably he would have been prouder to see it than upon the title-pages of his books. He remonstrated with Jenkins, informing him carefully on more than one of these occasions who he was, but without effect. Jenkins avenged himself on Thackeray's satire by punishing his snobbism. The flunky saw the flunkyism which was the weak part of the great author's character, and punished his satirist through it.

The distinguishing feature of the Morning Post to the present day is its lists of the guests at aristocratic dinner-parties and receptions, which sometimes extend over two or three columns. These glorious registers enable fashionable people and people who are anxious to be fashionable, or to be known as occasionally in the society of fashionable people, to hang in a sort of ecstatic trance over the record which contains their names in the same column with those of dukes and ambassadors and earls. It is understood that a price is paid by some, at least, of the entertainers whose guests are thus made known to an awe-stricken world. The really fashionable and distinguished people are probably indifferent to the appearance of their names, and the commemoration of their hospitalities. But the would-be fashionable, the ladies and gentlemen who are struggling from the vast background and abyss and unorganized chaos of the vulgar world into the realms of light, who are striving for recognition, and may be said, so far as fashion is concerned, to be as yet but half created—these worthy people pay, and pay heavily, for the privilege of having it announced in the Morning Post that they have entertained at dinner or received in the evening Lord This, Lady That, and Sir The-other. The difficulty, of course, is to get the right people to come, and some well-born persons who, by certain errors of conduct and taste, have found their way to a certain extent out of society, are very glad to meet in mid-course the respectable people who are finding their way into it. It is said that there are Lord Thomases and Lord Williamses who are not above accepting a fee for dining with hosts and hostesses who have newly acquired riches and have not yet acquired position. This fee is increased, it is said, if the gilded youth—gilded in a nearly literal as well as in the metaphorical sense—condescend to join the ladies after dinner, and to look for a few minutes into the drawing-room after having sat through dinner and the wine after dinner. These newly-rich aspirants are the people whose advertisements of themselves under the guise of fashionable intelligence contribute, it is believed, no small part of its revenues to the Morning Post. Another source of its income lies in more open and genuine appeals of chaperones and ladies' companions, butlers and footmen, who want places, and of the people who want services of this kind.

The political tone of the Morning Post is in the main such as might be inferred upon these conditions. It aspires, above everything, to be genteel, and to take a gentlemanly view of the great interests of England and of humanity. Its accomplished manager, Sir Algernon Borthwick, is in a very good position for informing himself as to the currents of feeling among the more leisurely and idle classes. He is himself one of the few journalists who are legitimately, and not by vulgar self-assertion and intrusion, in society; and his dinner-parties and receptions are, in the conventional sense, "honored," if not always enlivened, by the presence of princely and noble persons, royal dukes and duchesses, and swells of every degree. Sir Algernon Borthwick was one of Lord Beaconsfield's latest knights. Defeated for Evesham at the last general election, he was consoled with the cheapest honor which it is in the power of a Prime Minister to bestow. Everybody was astonished when Mr. Borthwick consented to take knighthood. That dignity, except when it is forced upon judges and the law-officers of the Crown, who are not at liberty to decline it, is the reward usually of H-less sheriffs, and lord-mayors, and provincial notabilities. Sir William Harcourt, it is believed, made a stout but ineffectual resistance to his knighthood when he was appointed Solicitor-General, but routine was too strong for him. The only law-officers of the Crown and judges who have been able to refuse it in recent times were men like the late Spencer Percival or the present Mr. Justice Denman, who, as sons of peers, were higher in rank than knights, and could not, therefore, be required to take a title lower in the scale of precedence than the position which their birth conferred upon them. Lord Beaconsfield is said to have privately expressed the hope, in reply to some untimely ridicule of which Sir Alexander Borthwick, as the new knight, was being made the victim in his presence, that the time would never come when the title would be thought ridiculous which had been borne by Sir Francis Drake and Sir Walter Raleigh. Sir Algernon Borthwick certainly has no right to feel ashamed of being historically in the society of Sir Francis Drake and Sir Walter Raleigh. What Drake and Raleigh may think, if they have any cognizance now of what is taking place in this lower world, at finding Sir Algernon Borthwick among them, is a very different matter. They certainly need not be ashamed of him. If not a great man he is an able and pleasant one, whom many people like and of whom none has any occasion to speak ill. It is said that he himself is now a little repentant of the precipitancy with which he accepted knighthood. He feels perhaps like a man who, through some freak or other, in a weak moment has allowed himself to be ornamentally and conspicuously tattooed. The tattoo is indelible and so is knighthood. Sir William Harcourt, who is in some sense connected with Sir Algernon Borthwick, both of them having married daughters of the late Lady Theresa Lewis, and step-daughters of the eminent statesman, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, would no doubt have been glad if he could have handed over his knighthood to Sir Algernon Borthwick.

The characteristic feature of the Morning Post is that which I have described, but it is in other respects an ably and fairly conducted political journal, possessing, through Sir Algernon Borthwick's social opportunities, means of early and accurate information on political questions. From the Liberal-Conservative point of view of the politicians who take the name of Lord Palmerston in vain, it is efficiently written. The editor of the Morning Post is Mr. Hardman, who unites with this office the magisterial one of chairman of the Surrey Quarter Sessions. Its leader-writers include Mr. O Donnell, M.P., whose Ultramontane and Home-Rule politics do not prevent his adapting himself to the John Bull Jingoism and the genteel Conservatism of the organ of fashion; Mr. James Knowles, a son of the eminent play-writer Sheridan Knowles, and Mr. Baker-Green, a gentleman whose training has been that of the bar and of the Reporters' Gallery. The dramatic critic of the Morning Post is the genial and jovial Joe Knight—it is impossible to call him Mr. Joseph—whose friends find in him a reflection of Mr. Fred Bayham; and its musical critic is Mr. Markwick. Mr. Dunphy is at the head of the reviewing department.

Correspondence.

RELIABLE INFORMATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is long since England has known more anxious days than at the present time. Internal questions are threatening enough, but from two different quarters are arising complications which may try the strength of the empire. The "Eastern" or Turkish question, though it may include the largest possibilities, is not so immediately dangerous; but in Afghanistan the interest has a realistic intensity. The English people, having entrusted their fortunes to an arch quack, who saw fit to place a fellow novel-writer in almost absolute power over two hundred millions of people, find themselves involved in a war which, in the motives which began it, in the preliminary steps, in the results, and almost the incidents which followed, was so completely foreshadowed by the previous events of 1840, that it seems as if those who neglected so obvious a warning could hardly have read the history. Among the unpleasant discoveries which a new government has brought to light and has to deal with is a deficit of some ten million sterling in a budget which had been represented to be in equilibrium. A brigade has been cut off and nearly annihilated in the interior of a hostile country; the troops in Kandahar have been obliged to retire to the citadel, and communication with the country below has been cut off. And besides this uncertainty is the added one whether all India, excited by an English reverse, may not rise and involve untold expenditure in money and men. Yet there is no panic in England. No reliable gentlemen are turning up from the seat of war and driving the community mad with manufactured news. The newspapers are not urging the Government frantically to adopt a dozen different courses. Members of Parliament are not turning to their constituents to find out what had better be done. In place of these methods, which may have a familiar sound, what does happen? The Marquis of Hartington rises in his place in the House of Commons and states what are the latest items of news from India. That ends it. Everybody knows that that is the only news of any consequence as far as action is concerned. Again, everybody either approves of any action the Government may take or disapproves of it, and when the latter side is in a majority the Government will go. But nobody outside the Ministry ever thinks of setting up a scheme of his own and expecting it to receive a moment's attention. Members of Parliament make themselves critics or defenders of a policy, instead of each one wanting to run the Government himself, or determining that if he cannot nobody else shall.

In Russia the machine of government seems to be falling to pieces because the unlimited executive power works so violently and arbitrarily, and cannot or will not respond in any way to the wishes and aspirations of the people. In this country, while our actual condition is, thank God! far better than that of any other in the world, our Government operations fail because we have no executive power at all, and are governed to death by legislatures. It is this combination of an executive, strong to despotism, but responsible for the use of power to the popular representatives, which has carried England through so many stiff crises and will carry her through so many more.

Why cannot we have it? Why cannot we have some individuals to give us on their public responsibility facts as to the South, facts as to the civil service, facts as to the tariff, facts as to the Indians; authorized to propose one policy at a time for Congress to accept or reject, instead of having a broth spoiled by too many cooks, out of which no policy can be evolved? We can do this when the leaders in politics will begin to talk about principles instead of disputing whether one of the candidates for the Presidency did at one time steal $329.

A TRIBUTE TO MOMMSEN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Shortly after the great Chicago fire a large number of foreign authors united in sending their works, or sums of money, to form a nucleus for a library in that city—an act which was remarked upon at the time as an unusual and agreeable expression of international comity. To-day Mommsen the historian has the sympathy of scholars in all parts of the world for his loss of his library by fire, and a subscription to purchase a new library for him is now mooted in Europe.

Many of us who were school-boys or students not so very long ago know how much we are indebted to Mommsen, and it seems to me that it would be a graceful act of "international comity" if an American subscription were made for the same purpose as that in Europe.

If suggested by the Nation, such a tribute to the aged scholar would no doubt be looked upon with favor by a large number of your subscribers.

I am, sir, etc., E. Brainerd.

THE LIMIT OF DAMAGES FOR FATAL ACCIDENTS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the Nation of August 5, No. 788, on pages 86 and 87, there is an inaccuracy in the editorial calling attention to the disproportionately small amount of money legally recoverable as damages in actions for causing death by wrongful act, negligence, etc. It said on page 86: "In cases of death by the negligence of transportation companies, however, the statutory limit of five thousand dollars damages, which prevails throughout the United States, seems very low"; and on page 87 it is said: "While the five thousand dollar limit in cases of death has been rigidly maintained in this country," etc.—the italics being my own. The inaccuracy in the passages quoted is that they convey the idea that no larger sum than five thousand dollars may be recovered in any of the United States in such actions, while in Ohio, and perhaps in other States, by amendments to the statutes originally allowing any recovery at all, the limit beyond which a jury may not go has been raised to ten thousand dollars, just double the amount stated in the text.

This matter has already, in accordance with the Nation's suggestion, borne "legislative investigation," and by an act of the Legislature of Ohio, passed March 7, 1872, to be found in section 6135 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, and amended by the Legislature of Ohio on April 13, 1880, the limit of the amount so to be recovered is raised to ten thousand dollars, while other humane provisions to expedite and effectuate the recovery, and its application "to the persons respectively for whose benefit such action shall be brought," are to be found in the same acts.

Notes.

Macmillan & Co. have in press 'The Aryan Village, Past and Present, in Bengal and Ceylon,' by Sir John B. Phear, formerly Chief-Justice of Ceylon, and one of the Judges of the High Court of Judicature in Calcutta.——B. Westermann & Co. send us Parts 16 and 17 of the new edition of 'Stieler's Hand-Atlas.' With maps of Upper and Middle Italy, Spain and Portugal, Northeastern France (including a large part of Switzerland and Southern Germany), the Eastern United States, the northern heavens, the editors postpone such controverted or unexplored territory as calls for the latest revisions. The general map of Asia, however (Part 16), diminishes Afghanistan in the sense of the "scientific frontier." It remains to be seen if the northern sheet of India will do the same.——'Scientific Billiards—Garnier's Practice Shots, with Hints to Amateurs,' just published by Appletons, is a work whose title sufficiently indicates its nature and value; but we may explain that it consists of a short preface which celebrates the usefulness of the game; an introduction which succinctly states terms and gives a few simple directions; and diagrams, executed with great precision, of one hundred and seven shots, from the ordinary opening shot to the most difficult massé. It will scarcely enable the amateur to bridge the great gulf fixed between "the average" and "a strong" game, but it may facilitate the acquisition of the former. To the small number of players who have tables of their own it will undoubtedly afford amusement, and so be of advantage. ——Jansen, McClurg & Co., Chicago, have published a very good translation of Ludwig Nohl's shorter 'Life of Mozart.' This work would have been more instructive had it contained more facts and fewer reflections; but on the whole it is pleasant reading. On pages 188–9, by a common figure of speech, the names of Händal and Bach are used for their works, but in such a manner that a person unacquainted with the history of music would certainly take the expressions literally, and infer that the men were living in 1788, and that Mozart then became personally acquainted with them.—— Sidney S. Rider, Providence, has handsomely brought out Mr. Edward L. Peirce's optimistic Commencement address before the alumni of Brown University on the "Public and Social Duties of the College Graduate."—— A thick pamphlet, consisting of the addresses before the Historical Society of Pennsylvania on occasion of the presentation of a portrait of Maj.-Gen. John F. Reynolds last March, bears the title, 'Reynolds Memorial,' and the imprint of J. B. Lippincott & Co. It has an etched portrait of Gen. Reynolds, a map of the theatre of Lee's invasion of the North, and a plan of the first day's fighting at Gettysburg, to the history of which decisive battle it is a useful contribution.——The beginning of a series of articles describing experiments in destroying obnoxious insects by means of fungoid growths is made in the American Naturalist for August, by A. N. Prentiss.——In a recent article in Harper's, Dr. Draper credited Dr. Franklin, we believe, with the earliest observation on the southern origin of our northeasterly storms. In the July number of the Magazine of American History are grouped several early descriptions of Niagara; from one written in 1764 we quote this passage: "It is very remarkable that when they hear the noise of the fall at the above fort [Niagara] more plain than ordinary they are sure a northeast wind will follow. This is really surprising, as the fall is southwest from the fort, and one would imagine it should be a contrary wind."——A brief bibliography of the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play is given in Bulletin No. 54 of the Boston Public Library.——The current number of the Publishers' Weekly makes the gratifying announcement that Mr. Leypoldt will undertake to complete the Library Journal to the close of the present year. It is also stated that in October Mr. George P. Philes will revive his Philobiblion, with fac-simile and other illustrations.——The publisher of the Antiquary will issue by subscription a work describing and in some measure graphically illustrating the sixty-six ancient monuments of Great Britain which Sir John Lubbock's bill proposes to put under Government protection. The book will contain numerous valuable appendices. Mr. J. W. Bouton is the American agent.——M. Jules Steeg has had the happy thought to make an abstract of the "principal pedagogic elements" in the first three books of Rousseau's 'Émile,' and to provide them with an introduction and notes. The confession of the Savoyard Vicar is omitted. Hachette is the publisher.——Several German newspapers have lately announced that Goethe's family originally came from Bavaria. His ancestors, under the name Götze, are said to have lived in the village of Heustreu, in Franconia, as early as 1449. Some of the descendants remained there. Another branch emigrated to Thuringia and called themselves Gothus, Gothes, or Gothe, from which the name Goethe was developed. The grandfather of the poet came to Frankfort as a tailor apprentice from Thuringia, and became by marriage the owner of the tavern "Zum Weidenhof," which still flourishes. It is also noteworthy that as a student in Leipzig Goethe was a member of the Bavarian corps.

—The International Review for August has an attractive table of contents; but, as magazine-readers are well aware, this is not an infallible indication of excellence in detail, and the different papers are each perhaps a trifle thin. The opening article, "The Caucus in England," by W. Fraser Rae, is rather fragmentary, and will be of value only to those who know nothing of English politics. Mr. Lodge's review of Masson's 'Life of Milton' is a glorification of the Puritan party, and summarizes very well the familiar points of the Puritan presentation of the case. How well taken most of these are has been very well known since Macaulay and Carlyle "laid their strong hands upon the historical fabric reared by fervent royalism," as Mr. Lodge says. But a search for the germ in Parliamentary times of what led to the Restoration immorality and weakness, seems more in order now than it did when there was occasion for using the said "strong hands." Mr. Lodge is content with the explanation that the Puritans fell out among themselves. Mr. Higginson writes of Garrison and Levi Coffin. Brooks Adams notes Mr. Howells's "new departure" with gratification, and thinks he has "spent his strength on rather small game" hitherto. Horace White contributes a chapter of "contemporary history" that was worth writing, on "The Nominations"; Prof. Crane, an account of "Italian Popular Poetry"; and Rowland Connor, a paper on "National Ethics." The reviews of current books are agreeably numerous, though none are striking if we except the remark on Oppert's Corean voyage (recently noticed in the Nation): "It is impossible not to sympathize with the author's disappointment at being unable to carry out his novel experiment for establishing commercial intercourse with a strange nation; it is to be hoped that his next device may be as ingenious and more successful." But we do not see how Oppert's experiment was, strictly speaking, any more "novel" than that of the abductors of Charlie Ross.

—One of the best specimens of destructive criticism we have met with in a long time is Mr. Henry P. Johnston's 'Observations on Judge Jones's Loyalist History of the American Revolution' (New York: D. Appleton & Co.) Mr. Johnston is known to our readers as the latest and most authoritative historian of the battle of Long Island; Judge Jones as the author of a posthumous work published last year, in which neither the leaders of the American cause nor their British opponents are spared, and which has naturally excited a good deal of resentment in various parts of the country. His critic, with characteristic restraint and judicial-mindedness, first exposes very clearly the temper which Judge Jones brought to his task (executed, by the way, in England after the war); his opportunities for observation, which were very poor, considering that he was part of the time a prisoner in Connecticut and part on parole on his own estate on Long Island; and his other sources of knowledge, which cannot be highly estimated, at least for their impartiality. Mr. Johnston then takes up in succession some of the more glaring misstatements concerning the Judge's own treatment, and concerning individual officers, the American Congress, the British generals, the fortifications of New York, the evacuation of Charleston and Savannah, etc. In every instance he completely satisfies the reader by irrefragable evidence of the falsity of the Loyalist narrative, and the cumulative effect of these rectifications is to create a serious doubt whether Judge Jones's History has any value whatever. Mr. Johnston, indeed, does not go quite so far as this, but his strictures involve a censure of Judge Jones's editor for dereliction. What is remarkable in this pamphlet is Mr. Johnston's range of Revolutionary knowledge and research. His method, too, is a model.

—The following belated addendum to our London correspondent's recent letter on the London Times will be read with interest:

"Professor Wace is also among the Times's leader-writers; and I must not forget Mr. John Macdonell, an able and rising barrister and a philosophical lawyer, the brother of Mr. James Macdonell, of whom I have spoken. The assistant editor of the Times is Mr. Frederick Clifford, a gentleman who has long served the paper in the Reporters' Gallery and as a special commissioner. Mr. Crump is the city editor, and Mr. A. J. Wilson (who must not be confounded with Mr. E. D. J. Wilson, before mentioned) is the assistant city editor. Mr. James Payn, the novelist, contributes bright and lively papers on social topics, and Mr. W. F. Rae, known in your country as a friendly traveller and critic, and on both sides of the Atlantic as a political biographer, versed especially in those portions of history in which English and American affairs come into contact, is among its reviewers. The chief of the Parliamentary staff is Mr. Ross, the Father of the Gallery, whose memory goes back to the times of the unreformed Parliament, and who is a better representative of an almost obsolete Toryism than almost any member of the House. Besides M. Blowitz, already spoken of, the Times counts among its foreign correspondents—foreign in a double sense—General Ebers at Vienna, Herr Löwe at Berlin, and Signor Gallenga, whose roving commissions and brilliant command of many languages have made almost every country of the Old and New World familiar to him. Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, whose work on Russia is perhaps the most complete study of a nation ever made by a foreigner, not excepting De Tocqueville's 'America'—for Tacitus's 'Germania' is as fictitious as More's 'Eutopia' or Bacon's 'New Atlantis'—represents (as the diplomatic phrase runs) the Times at Constantinople; and Mr. Shakspeare Wood does so at Rome. Its Philadelphia correspondent does not need any introduction to you."

—The Athenæum announces an extraordinary news-letter enterprise which must put journalists to the blush. Lord Dunraven, several M.P.'s, Mr. Laurence Oliphant, and numerous other gentlemen interested in the Eastern Question, who are fully convinced by past experience of the hopelessness of trying to learn what is actually taking place or being said or thought "in all the countries concerned" in that question, have undertaken to "collect, receive, and diffuse intelligence from trustworthy, competent, and impartial sources," at regular intervals. Convenient rooms will be taken at which "subscribers may receive and read the letters as they arrive." This seems like a relapse to coffee-rooms, packet-ships, and post-boys; but there is no doubt the press has forfeited its right to ridicule such rivalry by its failure to employ correspondents without bias, or rather its determination to have only one side presented, according to the editor's predilections or the requirements of party. We may witness, moreover, in our own country precisely the same phenomenon in the way news from the South is reported for Northern journals. Would that we, too, might have our "trustworthy letters from the most important places," not merely in times of excitement and disorder but from week to week or from month to month, marking the regular development of each community with no more passion than a gold-and-stock telegraphic indicator, and with as little liability to deliberate falsification. The English project, by the way, is perhaps the best commentary on our correspondent who writes, on another page, about "Reliable Information."

—Professor Hillebrand, whose name now appears more frequently in British magazines than those of most native writers, discourses, in the Contemporary for July, on "The Sources of German Discontent." He finds that his countrymen are really very well off, but that they do not appreciate their blessings, and are, politically speaking, spoiled children, unhappy because the moon is beyond their reach. "The sum total paid by every German annually for direct and indirect taxes scarcely exceeds fifteen shillings, whereas an Englishman pays at the rate of forty, a Frenchman even of fifty-four shillings; nor should we forget that in England, France, and Italy half the budget is spent in paying off interest, while in Germany it goes towards public education, worship, justice, canals, roads, etc. Ask every man belonging to the middle class; not a vote would be given in all Germany in favor of the abolition of universal service. . . . Our army amounts to 430,000 out of 43,000,000—i.e., one per cent. The French army numbers 500,000 to a population of 37,000,000, more than one and one-third per cent." And as to the capacity for bearing taxation, a distinguished economist, Mr. Soetbeer, "has irrefutably proved that the growth of our national wealth has by no means been checked by the depression of 1876, and that it is now more rapid than ever." To Socialism, also, this writer attributes but trifling importance. It "is redoubtable only where there is no true middle class, as in Russia, or where the middle class allows itself to be intimidated, as in France. In Germany, which has the most numerous middle class in Europe, and a middle class resolved to defend itself, Socialism has no more chance of success than the servile wars and Jacqueries which have burst forth periodically ever since an organized society has existed." It is not, therefore, in essentials that Germany is ill-off or behindhand; but the non-essentials are yet of considerable importance. "Our middle class cannot afford to purchase substantial goods, as the French and English middle class can, therefore the workmanship must necessarily suffer. Were we to renounce showy, scamped wares, we should have to eat with wooden spoons, and go about in homespun and unbleached linen. I do not deny that we might be happier and richer under a more primitive simplicity in our outward life . . . especially if we were to spend on our families what is now squandered in taverns in the evening." There are German gentlemen, Prof. Hillebrand continues, "reserved without austerity, self-reliant without intrusiveness; but as yet they are lost in the crowd of half-educated upstarts of all sorts, the stream of whom overflows foreign countries, exhibiting their collective conceit." This fact, however, does not lessen his faith that his country contains "within itself not only a perennial spring of healing water, but also the metal of which a strong yet comely and agreeable people may be made." For their improvement he relies upon the state, which, "although no longer paternal, still disposes of means—were it only in military service and the schools—that are sufficient to influence individuals—i.e. to accustom, which is the only effectual mode of influencing them." Unfortunately, the Government has not full swing in this direction, more than in any other:

"We feel that the Prussian monarchy, resting on the army, the bureaucracy, and the schools, is the only historical power of Germany, and that such exotics as parliamentary government . . . only serve to cramp its vital energies, or, at least, to fetter the liberty of its movements. . . . The continual interference of parliament is corrupting our excellent bureaucracy, while the 'Geheimräthe' do not allow a healthy development of genuine parliamentary life. On the one side there is nothing but servility, militarism, and rigid drill; on the other, insubordination, disrespect, and the free-and-easy ways of the carabin; on all sides half-culture."

—The fortunate possessors of Robert Koenig's 'Deutsche Literaturgeschichte' (Leipzig: Velhagen & Klasing), which we perceive has attained a sale of from fifteen to twenty thousand copies, will be glad to learn of a companion work, a popular History of Germany, edited by L. Stacke and others, and published by the same house (New York: L. W. Schmidt). The plan of freely illustrating the text from the most authentic sources has been again followed with signal success. The first of five parts lies before us, and ends with the beginning of the reign of Henry I., the founder of the Saxon line. The columns of Antoninus and Trajan, sarcophagi, tablets, busts, statues, and other monuments have been copied for the earliest effigies of the German race in its contact with the Romans. There is the fragment of the Capitoline fasti for the year 222 B.C., commemorating a victory over the Insubres and Germani—the first known inscription of the latter name. Of peculiar interest is the epitaph from a columbarium near the Porta Maggiore—"Suebus Germanus hic situs est"; and so, too, the cenotaph of Marcus Cælius, who perished in the rout of Varus. Illuminated fac-similes occupying a full page are the title-page ornaments and lettering; copies of a mosaic preserving the appearance of Theodoric's palace in Ravenna; an edict of the Lombard King Rotharis, graduating the penalties of mayhem; a mosaic after the triclinium of Leo III. in the Lateran; a page from the Evangels of Charlemagne—gold and silver letters on a dark violet ground ("In principio erat verbum"); Sintram's "Evangelium longum" (Matt. i. 18), etc., besides numerous initial letters in two colors. Of the "iron crown" studded with gems, and anything but sombre, there is a beautiful illuminated picture from an aquarelle. Then we have Pepin's autograph as major-domo and as king, and Charlemagne's; a portion of the latter's will in Einhard's MS., and, among other examples of Carolingian and post-Carolingian manuscript, the passage from Widukind's Saxon History (tenth century) describing Henry the Fowler's preparations to meet the Hungarians. Maps of Europe at the close of the migrations and in the ninth century further aid the text. As in Koenig's History of German Literature, the designs are fully discussed in foot-notes or on fly-leaves; and the general typographical distinctions are preserved. The succeeding parts will doubtless not suffer in comparison with this in respect of embellishment. The whole work will cost but twenty marks.

—In his 'L'Art et le Comédien' (Paris: Ollendorf; New York: F. W. Christern) M. C. Coquelin, of the Comédie-Française, seeks to show that acting is an art, that it has its difficulties, its utility, and its greatness, and that the actor, therefore, takes rank alongside of other artists. This final part contains the gist of the matter and was the cause of the writing. Alone among all French artists, the comedian is not enrolled in the Legion of Honor. The rumor even that it was to be awarded to the three great comedians of the Théâtre-Français, M. Got, M. Delaunay, and M. Coquelin himself, excited much controversy. Of course, M. Coquelin in this little book, the substance of which he delivered first as a lecture, makes no allusion to his personal share in the question; but in pleading the cause of his order he makes out a strong case for his comrades, and gets altogether the best of his fight. The incidental discussion, however, of the principles of his art by an artist so celebrated as M. Coquelin is of more general interest. He considers carefully the question as to whether an actor should share every feeling of his part, weeping himself to make others weep, or whether he should remain master of himself even in his most passionate outbursts—in fact, in Diderot's phrase, "to move more surely not be moved himself"—and concludes that Diderot's "paradoxe sur le comédien" is not a paradox at all, but an elemental truth of histrionic art. M. Coquelin cites an apt anecdote of Talma and instances Rachel, and we may add that Mrs. Kemble laid down a similar law in her recent 'Records of a Girlhood,' and quoted her own experience. M. Coquelin, by the way, protests against Zola's attempt to abolish theatrical conventions, and he shows that the theatre is of necessity a mass of conventions which change from time to time, and even disappear, but only to be replaced by others.

—Professor O. Rygh, who has charge of the unique collection of Norwegian antiquities at the University of Norway, has had upwards of six hundred of them drawn on wood by Mr. Lindberg, and is publishing them with Norwegian and French text in an elegant quarto volume, the first half of which has just reached us. The remaining half will appear early next year. The one before us contains ninety-one illustrations from the stone-age, fifty from the bronze-age, and two hundred and forty-one from the elder iron-age. The next will contain about three hundred illustrations pertaining to the younger stone-age. Of many of the finds several views are given, so that the whole number of figures is more than twice as great as that of the subjects proper. The title-page bears the imprint of prominent Paris, London, Leipzig, and Boston publishing-houses (in Boston that of John Allyn). The work is printed on heavy, almost stiff, paper, and the illustrations are among the finest we have ever seen, surpassing, in our judgment, the best work of this sort that has been done for the United States Geological Survey—which is saying a good deal. By addressing the Norwegian publisher, Alb. Cammermeyer, Christiania, clichés in copper can be obtained of all the designs in the volume, a privilege of which publishers and authors of prehistoric works will doubtless avail themselves. The stone-age department furnishes numerous specimens of axes, hammers, poignards, and arrow-points strikingly like those found in this country and attributed to the mound-builders. The department of the bronze-age supplies fine illustrations of axes, celts, swords, poignards, spear and arrow points, knives, buttons, buckles, pins, rings, and other ornaments. In the department of the elder iron-age we find straight and curved knives, celts, axes, combs, keys, shears, various parts of the primitive spinning-wheel, needles, handsomely-shaped boxes, spiral gold rings used as money, with balances for weighing them, two-edged swords with their appurtenances, bosses of shields, spears, a fine lot of buckles and ornamental pins and rings. There are also several specimens of Roman gold coins which have been used as ornaments, and Norse imitations of these. Finally, there are beautiful bracelets in gold, armlets in gold and in silver, fragments of woollen cloths, Roman vases, glass goblets shaped like drinking-horns, buckets, kettles, and other household utensils. But all these things must be seen to be appreciated, and to study them in the pages of this work is a luxury.

—Of the accompanying text it is enough to say that it has been carefully prepared by Professor Rygh, who is the most eminent antiquarian scholar in Norway, if not in all Scandinavia. Of the stone-age he says that it has not yet been possible to fix even approximately at what time it began in Norway, or, in other words, at what period Norway received its first population. Nor is it possible to determine precisely the cessation of the stone-age. All that can be said is that it probably ended a few centuries before the birth of Christ. To what race the inhabitants of the stone-age belonged is not known ; the opinion heretofore generally accepted, that they were Lapps, has not been confirmed by the more recent investigations. The succeeding bronze-age ended, according to Prof. Rygh, about two centuries after Christ. To what race the inhabitants of this age belonged is also uncertain. Its monuments show that they not only raised cattle but also engaged in agriculture. They possessed considerable skill in working in metal, wove handsome clothes, and built ships of considerable size. The prehistoric iron-age extends from the first centuries after Christ to the introduction of Christianity—that is, to the first half of the eleventh century. Rygh divides it into two periods, the elder and the younger, the latter beginning in the eighth century. Cremation is known to have prevailed in Norway during the first part of the elder stone-age, but was also frequently employed even to its close. During this period are also found the earliest traces of a written alphabet. The alphabet of the elder stone-age was the so-called Runic Futhork, consisting of twenty-four characters, and was, according to Professor Rygh, formed in the lands near the Alps on the basis of the Latin alphabet, having been brought to Norway at the same time with the antiquities which reveal the first influence of Roman civilization. In this view the author is opposed to other scholars, who believe the runes not to be based on, but to have a common origin with, the Roman and Greek stave-rows. The language of the runic inscriptions is Teutonic, and thus they for the first time give unmistakable information in regard to the nationality of the population.

A PHILADELPHIAN ABROAD.*

TO most Americans, we fancy, the author of this stout volume of reminiscences is little more than a name. Although Mr. Wickoff's life has been a long and varied one, and has covered, in time, many Presidential terms, in space many strange cities and countries, and in sentiment an immense range of the most thrilling emotions, he has still not succeeded in so impressing himself upon his time, in literature, diplomacy, or any of the other branches of activity to which he has devoted himself, as to make his "reminiscences" sure of an eager and attentive audience. For our own part, we confess to having known little more of Mr. Wickoff before reading this volume than that he was generally identified as the "Chevalier" Wickoff. As to what kind of a "Chevalier" he was or how he became one, or, in fact, what "Chevaliers" nowadays are, seemed always to be a matter on which no certain knowledge was attainable. Even this book, so far as we have examined it, does not clear up the mystery, but that it is one which ought to be authoritatively cleared up, no one who recollects how many different sorts of chevaliers there have been in the world can doubt. This, however, is the only point on which the writer can be accused of failing to give exact information with regard to himself. On every other topic he unbosoms himself as an idler should, taking us into his confidence with regard to the most trivial as well as the most important facts of his life, including, as we have already said, an extraordinarily wide range of emotion.

It is really rather as a record of emotion and sentiment that the book has interested us. Mr. Wickoff belongs to a past generation, to which sentiment of all kinds was much more dear than it is to us—to the generation which took in its emotional nourishment from Scott and Byron and Bulwer. He travelled abroad before the mocking spirit of the latter half of the nineteenth century had reared its head, during a period marked by the production of "Childe Harold" as its greatest poem, which could not have enjoyed the 'Book of Snobs' nor have imagined the memoirs of Michael Angelo Titmarsh. It is impossible that foreign travel should ever again be enjoyed by any nation as it was then by Americans of means and education. Coming from a country not only absolutely barren of romance, unprovided with either literature or art, but devoted by necessity and tradition to the absolutely practical work of money-getting, and yet taking with them all the feelings and thoughts produced by early association with European literature, European history, and European art, the young American gentlemen who crossed the Atlantic in the second quarter of our memorable and wonderful century really went to an earthly paradise. Since then Europe has become Americanized and America has become Europeanized, and travelling has become so common that there is, comparatively speaking, little novelty in it ; but when Mr. Wickoff was a young Philadelphia lawyer the voyage to Europe was a real translation. To go to Paris, and London, and Vienna, and even (as he did) to distant Russia and Constantinople, to be presented at court, to see kings and queens, dukes and duchesses, great generals covered with orders, and to mingle with them and become for the time being a part of them, was a bewildering, intoxicating pleasure. Philadelphia is still, we suppose, a good place to go to Europe from, but not what it was in the golden prime of our emotional Chevalier.

To give any idea of the impression which Europe made upon our author, we must make an extract or two from his book. It was in November, 183-, that Mr. Wickoff first entered Paris. The whole way from Havre he "scarcely slept a wink for excitement," and, when he reached Paris about 10 A.M., he frankly says that his "emotions were overpowering." It has become quite the fashion for modern American travellers to deny roundly that the sight of places or things famous in song and story affect them emotionally in the way they are by tradition expected to do. But however this may be—and it must always depend greatly on the individual traveller—it was certainly not the case with Mr. Wickoff. A great New England lawyer, a contemporary of his, is said to have found such a difficulty in being properly affected by operatic music that he directed his daughter to explain the libretto to him, lest he should "dilate with the wrong emotion." There was never any difficulty of this kind with Mr. Wickoff. He always dilated with the right emotion. "Of all the cities of the world," he says, "I was most eager to see this renowned metropolis, whose history was so full of startling and terrible episodes.". The trait in Mr. Wickoff's character, he tells us, which "transcends all the rest" is "a veneration for the past." (The past has indeed such a hold upon our author that of the nearly six hundred pages of the volume he has devoted about one-half to an outline of the public events of the past forty years.) This veneration for the past invests "the men and events of other epochs" with a halo which, in Mr. Wickoff's eyes, "partakes of the sacred" (p. 82). "It often seemed to me I lived more in the past than the present. I could linger and contemplate an edifice, or a tomb associated with a great name, for hours together. I could conjure up all the moving incidents of their history, until I could almost fancy myself an eye-witness. Of all enjoyments this to me was the quintessence." Even in Philadelphia this taste was so powerful that Mr. Wickoff had endeavored to gratify it by visiting the room in the State-House where Congress in 1776 assembled. "Sitting down, I would abandon myself to my heated imagination, till methought the great men of that day stood before me. I could almost hear the ringing voice of John Adams, when he cried, 'Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I am for the Declaration.'" Yet this was only in the last century and in Philadelphia, in a plain, bare room in Independence Hall, in which the imagination, to become heated, must have had vast internal stores of fuel ; "whereas yonder palace was built by Catherine de Médicis in the sixteenth century, and those beautiful gardens were laid out by Louis XIV. in the seventeenth century. Since then what tremendous scenes have been connected with both! Why, it was only a few years ago, 1830, that an infuriated mob invaded the Tuileries for the second time, and drove forth to exile the elder branch of the Bourbon dynasty," etc., etc.

In England Mr. Wickoff was still more impressed. "No American," as he justly says, "can be insensible to the claims of the mother country on his affections and respect." We are not surprised when he adds: "My heart warmed as I heard for the first time in Europe the accents of my native tongue, and recognized in the manners and customs of the people the closeness of our relationship." "There are few Americans," Mr. Wickoff thinks, "who visit England for the first time whose feelings are not profoundly stirred by the consciousness that they are treading the ground of their forefathers, whose names still survive on the tombs scattered over the churchyards of England." This emotion, however, must be confined to comparatively few American travellers, unless indeed Mr. Wickoff has in mind that sort of feeling which all branches of the Aryan race may be supposed to feel on visiting any one of the various resting-places in its nomadic career. At any rate, the discovery by an American that he is really an Englishman may always be set down as greatly to his credit, particularly if he does not go any further in the invention of an English ancestry than to imagine, with Mr. Wickoff, that their names are still scattered over the churchyards of England.

All travellers in England have noticed the lack of appreciation of enthusiasm displayed by the average Briton. This at first jarred a good deal upon Mr. Wickoff, whose imagination, if it became heated by taking a casual seat in Independence Hall, fairly boiled over when he reached London. As he was bowling along in a coach he observed a "splendid park," "bustling with equipages." "'What's that?' I asked. 'Hyde Park.' 'Where's

* 'The Reminiscences of an Idler. By Henry Wickoff.' New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert. 1880.

Hyde Park Corner?' I demanded eagerly. 'We are passing it now.' 'This, then,' I exclaimed earnestly, 'is the very spot where Charles II. made the witty retort to his brother James, who remonstrated at the king going about without escort. 'Nobody will kill me to make you king,' said the Merry Monarch, laughing." The gentleman holding the reins at Mr. Wickoff's side, to whom he imparted this interesting information, looked at him askance. "It may be so," he remarked, "but I never heard it." We cannot help thinking that we have heard this illustration of English lack of enthusiasm before; and we may observe, by the way, without questioning the historical truth of this instance of what Mr. Burnand would call "repartee to a king," that in the humorous anecdotes recalled by the author there is sometimes a lack of accuracy which suggests that his imagination is not so good when set to work upon humor as it is when fired by the grand events of history. In giving the history of the various places he passes through he adheres to facts with all the rigid accuracy which lends so much of their charm to guide-books and encyclopædias. But when he recalls a jest he is apt to give it a new turn. For example, the story of Dr. Johnson saying, on hearing from a lady that a certain piece of music which had just been performed was very difficult, "Would to God, madam, it had been impossible!" is a good story of Dr. Johnson, but when the invocation of the Deity is omitted, and the words are put in the mouth of Lord Melbourne, the anecdote lacks something of its point. So, too, it is rather a surprise to find Talleyrand's "Déjà!" put in the mouth of "the king," and addressed to Talleyrand himself on his death-bed (p. 477). If we could regard these changes as experiments or essays in jocular historical anecdote, it might do very well; but Mr. Wickoff is rather a serious writer than a humorist, and should not forget that his imagination is his greatest treasure as a literary possession.

It is needless to say that Mr. Wickoff was quite as much interested in persons as in places or things. With regard to ladies, he confesses that his interest in the fair sex was always so engrossing as not to leave him master of himself, and he speaks of the attractions of several ladies whom he met during his travels with a frank admiration that could hardly but be gratifying to them, however it may strike the male portions of their families. When he sees at once a woman who is a "superb creature" and a distinguished character as well, his emotions reach a pitch which, as is frequently the case with intense sentiment, curtails his powers of expression. On going to the Zoological Gardens with a family party he saw "a brunette with lustrous glowing eyes that seemed almost to scorch the object they lit upon." "Who is that superb creature?" he asked. "That is Mrs. Norton." "'Good gracious!' I exclaimed; 'Mrs. Norton, the authoress, the granddaughter of Sheridan, the heroine —?' I stopped abruptly. 'Yes,' returned Mrs. Dunlop, smiling, 'the same.'" In the course of his travels Mr. Wickoff fell in with a considerable number of more or less distinguished persons—artists, politicians, literary men, actors, and actresses—and of all of them he has something to tell. A good deal of the book is taken up with travels in which his companion was Edwin Forrest, and another portion with an account of the queer sort of superintendence which he and Mrs. Grote exercised over the fortunes of Fanny Elssler. Several letters of Mrs. Grote are given, which show her eccentric and amiable character in a striking light. Fanny Elssler and Mrs. Grote, however, were so much more interesting to Mr. Wickoff than any men could be that he neglects to give us much account of Grote himself and of Sir William Molesworth, both of whom he met, and the first of whom he must have seen in a familiar way. Of Grote he observes that "he had always an abstracted air, like a man thinking of something else. It was no doubt the case, as he was plunged knee-deep in a history of Greece that quite absorbed him." Sir William Molesworth Mr. Wickoff identified as "a chum" of Grote's, and sets him down as "evidently not a man of society, but rather given to study and seclusion." At the Grotes' he met Charles Sumner. Mr. Sumner has, of course, left his own account of his adventures in England. It is always valuable, however, to have several points of view in studying the career of a great man. We know the Senatorial Charles Sumner, and we know also the youthful Sumner as he appeared to the English people, to whom he took letters as a young man; but we have never before had an opportunity of knowing how he appeared as a young man in England to another American. The following is Mr. Wickoff's account of a brief conversation with Mr. Sumner apropos of Fanny Elssler: "'You seem attracted,' I said, 'by our hostess's newest favorite, fresh from the coulisses.' 'Yes, by Jove,' he returned emphatically; 'what a sweet-mannered, refined creature she appears to be! There's something about her, a je ne sais quoi, wonderfully engaging. And who could imagine the great woman sitting there, so modest and gentle, is the brilliant, dashing, ethereal artist I have repeatedly applauded at the opera?"

It must not be supposed from Mr. Wickoff's slightly negligent account of Grote that the history of Greece does not interest him. The impression that the reader gets from his book is that he is so thoroughly familiar with the history of all countries that the labors of those who devote their lives to historical research must appear to him rather thrown away. At Athens he was taken about by a "learned antiquary." Walking around the Acropolis the antiquary pointed out objects of interest to the young Philadelphian. "'There,' he said, raising his finger, 'is the prison of Socrates, the very cell where he drank the hemlock, 400 B.C.' 'What!' I exclaimed; 'was it there that he discoursed so tranquilly in his last moments on the immortality of the soul, and died declaring that there was but one God?' 'And there,' continued the guide, 'is Mars Hill, where the Areopagus used to assemble.' 'That tribunal,' I responded, 'so famous for its impartiality that it would allow no rhetoric to be uttered that would bias or disturb its judgment. And it was on that spot,' I asked, 'that St. Paul in the middle of the first century addressed these pagan judges, and boldly proclaimed the truths of the new Gospel?' 'The very place,' he answered. . . . 'There, where you see a clump of olive-trees, was the site of the Academy founded by Plato in 388 B.C.'" etc., etc. It must be confessed that Grote's history is poor stuff compared to this.

The above extracts will give a pretty good idea of Mr. Wickoff's book. As a work of sentiment and imagination it deserves more than a passing attention. As an historical manual it may prove of considerable value to other Philadelphians, combining, as it does, the range of Gibbon with the accuracy of Headley and Abbott. Its descriptions of the personal appearance of the ladies met by Mr. Wickoff in his travels will set fire to the coldest imagination.

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.—II.*

ASSUMING that he has disproved the wage-fund theory and the Malthusian law of population—having shown that the cause of low wages is not to be found either in an insufficiency of capital for employing labor or in an excess of laborers competing for employment—our author concludes that the fault, or the cause of the poverty of some and the wealth of others, must be sought for in the distribution of the general earnings of mankind. The factors of production being land, labor, and capital, the distribution of the product has been commonly assigned to rent, wages, and interest, or, by some writers, to rent, wages, interest, and profits, the last term being intended to include wages of superintendence and compensation for risk. Wages of superintendence, Mr. George thinks, should be classed under the head of wages simply, and "compensation for risk," he says, "has no place whatever, as risk is eliminated when all the transactions of the community are taken together." As the whole world is not a mutual insurance company it is difficult to see how risk is eliminated by taking all transactions together, or how Jay Cooke's failure in Northern Pacific, for example, is compensated by some other person's success in Union Pacific. If there is no such thing as risk in business there is no such thing as enterprise. If risk can be put out of sight by saying that the losses of some are balanced by the gains of others the parable of the talents is of no further use, for the servant who returned to his master his own with increase is not more meritorious than he who digged in the earth and hid his lord's money till his return. Wages of superintendence and compensation for risk are an exceedingly important part of the problem of distribution, and they are properly grouped together under the head of profits. "Wages of superintendence," as here used, has no likeness to the wages of employees, whether of high or low degree. It is a phrase signifying the return reaped by superior ability and directing force, not by conventional agreement but by virtue of its own grasp upon the nature of things—such, for instance, as that possessed by the late A. T. Stewart.

We pass over Mr. George's chapter on "Interest and the Cause of Interest," because it is hard to understand and is not satisfactory when understood. In this, and in the following chapters on Wages, it is sought to be shown that both interest and wages are governed by rent; in other words, that the proportion of the total produce assigned to labor and capital is what remains after the demands of land-owners have been satisfied. In the distribution of wealth land is the omnipotent factor, and it decides how much is due to itself, and from its decision there is no appeal. The rise in the value of land from generation to generation is but an expression of this law. Rent is for ever appropriating to itself a greater and greater proportion of the joint produce of land, labor, and capital. Wages may, indeed, rise simultaneously with a rise of rent—the laborer may obtain more comforts for his day's work now than in the time of the Heptarchy—but this is because the total produce has enormously increased. The proportion of this total taken by land in the shape of rent is greater now than at any former period, and is ever increasing.

It is an essential point in this enquiry to know whether land enjoys any peculiar privilege in determining the division of the joint produce, so that it may fix its own proportion without reference to the other partners and swallow up a greater and greater share as time rolls on. Rent seems to have been declining in England during recent years, not merely by reason of bad harvests, but also and chiefly by reason of the lessened cost of transportation of breadstuffs and meat from other parts of the world. Therefore the argument does not hold good as to any particular country so long as there are lands still to be brought under the plough in any other country, or so long as the minimum cost of transportation has not been reached. Again, the complaint is frequent in the Western States of America that the profits of farming—that is, the rental values of land—are entirely dependent upon the whims of the transportation companies. It may be replied, that competition will eventually bring the charges of transportation down to the lowest possible point, and that then the demands of rent will become irresistible. This view is opposed to George Stephenson's maxim, that "where combination is possible competition is impossible." The principal grain-carrying companies of the United States have been studying for years how to effect such a combination, and it is not unlikely that they will succeed. It does not follow that they will then be able to dictate the terms of division of the joint produce of land, labor, and capital, but it is clear that they will put it out of the power of land-owners to dictate those terms. What is true in this regard of the United States is true of every other country. It is true even of countries whose means of communication are natural water-courses open to all carriers. The carriers with large capital can always find means to buy out or crush out those of small capital, and thus monopolize the trade. In the existing state of the world land does not possess the domineering power over labor and capital which the author assigns to it. He frequently speaks of capital as labor stored up (which indeed it is) and refers to the world's wealth as the product of land and labor, instead of land, labor, and capital. This is scientific in the last analysis, but it cannot be said that land dictates to labor in this sense the share which the latter shall receive in the division of the joint produce. As civilization advances and the wants of mankind become more complex, and as exchanges multiply, the immobility of land will give to labor an ever-increasing power and weight of authority in the determination of this question.

Mr. George's theory of industrial depressions or commercial crises is that they proceed mainly from speculation in land. The genesis of such paroxysms is not, however, found in the multiplication of debts which the land-buyers eventually cannot pay—their defaults being propagated into other business channels—but in the fact that speculation in land causes rent to advance beyond its normal limit, "thus compelling labor and capital to accept a smaller return or (and this is the only way they can resist the tendency) to cease production."

"Now," he continues, "it is not only natural that labor and capital should resist the crowding down of wages and interest by the speculative advance of rent, but they are driven to this in self-defence, inasmuch as there is a minimum of return below which labor cannot exist, nor capital be maintained. Hence, from the fact of speculation in land we may infer all the phenomena which mark these recurring seasons of industrial depression."

The author has here lost sight of his definition of rent—the surplus yielded by certain lands over and above the sum yielded by the poorest lands in use—a surplus not dependent upon or subject to the desire or volition of anybody whomsoever. According to this definition of rent, which is the correct one, the speculator has no power to advance rent. He may hold his land out of use, neither cultivating it himself nor allowing others to do so, but this he seldom or never does. While waiting for somebody to pay him his price for the fee, he is always ready to accept what he can get for the use, if it be nothing more than the annual taxes. It may be safely affirmed that speculation in land never caused rent to advance a penny an acre; therefore, never caused labor and capital to cease production; therefore, never contributed to an industrial depression in the way described by the author. That it contributes to and sometimes originates such depressions by bankrupting the speculators, who in turn bankrupt other people, is, however, an observed fact in the commercial history of this country.

If Mr. George's conclusion depended wholly upon his premises, it might be dismissed without further consideration. But the expediency of private ownership of land is and will remain a debatable question from many points of view. The superior title to land is and must be in the state. This superior title is asserted in every act of condemnation of lands for public or quasi-public use. It is not doubted that the state might, for reasons satisfactory to itself, resume possession of all landed property, making compensation therefor through its own tribunals, without violating any right of its subjects. The expediency of private ownership rests upon the consideration or belief that public utility is thus best subserved; that cultivation is more thorough, and production greater under private than they would be under public or common holdings. The author of 'Progress and Poverty' seems to agree with this view, or not to dissent from it, for he proposes that no man's title shall be disturbed, and no new land policy be adopted, but merely that the taxes on land shall be made equal to its rental value apart from the value of improvements; in other words, that the state shall confiscate rent to its own use, and abolish all other taxes. This fiscal policy, he contends, would set the world running in new grooves; poverty would speedily disappear, overgrown fortunes would melt down to honorable competence, and the kingdom of Saturn return. No particular process or mode of transition bringing in this mighty change is pointed out. All is to be accomplished by adopting the impôt unique of the physiocrats—the single tax on land—provided the tax be high enough to leave the cultivator nothing but wages, and the owner nothing but interest on the cost of the buildings, stock, and utensils. Such a plan of taxation is not liable to a sudden access of popularity in a country where the ownership of land is widely distributed, although Mr. George takes pains to show that American farmers would be among the chief beneficiaries of the system.

Although we have to consider Mr. George's positions essentially unsound, we find many admirable passages, and a notable spirit of candor pervading his work. The style is for the most part engaging, and often eloquent. So far from being a work of communistic tendencies, the reader will find in it arguments to overthrow nearly all the communist theories of the present day.

A Physical, Historical, Political, and Descriptive Geography. By Keith Johnston, F.R.G.S. (London: Edward Stanford. 1880.)—By the preparation of this volume Mr. Keith Johnston has not only conferred a great boon upon geographical students in general, but has made a very important addition to English geographical literature; for if it is not quite as comprehensive and as carefully elaborated as we could have wished a work of this nature to be, it is decidedly a great way in advance of its predecessors. We have here not only a clear, concise, and, in the main, accurate account of the various natural and political divisions of the earth's surface, but also a valuable epitomized chapter (eighty-two pages) of the geographical history of the world, covering thirty centuries, illustrated by a series of maps delineating the progress of geographical discovery and of territorial conquest, a very interesting and not less useful sketch of physical geography, and a few introductory pages on map-making. Mr. Keith Johnston exhibits a facility for exposition and a skill for combining and condensing which render the work peculiarly readable and comprehensive for the total number of pages (487) which it covers, and he evinces a pretty thorough knowledge of the divers subjects brought under consideration. A certain carelessness in execution is therefore the more regrettable, inasmuch as the inaccuracies and omissions which, unfortunately, too frequently occur are sometimes of a serious nature, and ought not to have escaped the eye of an author of equal capacity.

Thus, in the orthography of foreign names little regard is had for the diacritical marks, for we have T*u*bingen, L*u*beck, W*u*rtemberg (p. 159), D*u*sseldorf, Innsbr*u*ck, and M*a*hrischen Höhe for T*ü*bingen, L*ü*beck, W*ü*rtemberg, D*ü*sseldorf, Innsbr*u*ck, and M*ä*hrischen Höhe. The Hungarian names Tátra and Kecskemét are printed T*a*tra, Kecskem*e*t. Orléans in France, which occurs several times accentuated on p. 223, is given as Orl*e*ans on p. 221; likewise the river Saône bears the circumflex on p. 224 and not on pp. 218 and 221. The accent is omitted in the Brazilian Pará, Xingú, Tupí, and Guaraní, and also in Potosí, Bolivia, and Copiapó, Chili. These oversights appear surprising when it is known that no inconsiderable attention has been paid to the rendering of foreign names in general, as is shown by a reference more especially to eastern countries. Readers unaccustomed to the new system of orthography gradually being introduced for East Indian names will scarcely recognize in the "Rann of Kachh" the familiar Runn of Cutch; or in "Gujrat," "Mirat," and "Haidarabad" the equally familiar Guzerat, Meerut, and Hyderabad. The frequently-recurring "Himalaya," usually misaccented both in this country and in England on the penultimate, should properly bear an accent on the antepenultimate, Himálaya. As for purely geographical data the book is not entirely free from what some may consider unpardonable blunders, as when, on p. 155, Cape Matapan (lat. 36° 23′) is given as the extreme southern point of Europe, instead of the promontory of Tarifa (36° 0′); or when, in treating of the hydrographical basins of Europe and Asia, no mention is made of the Ural River, although rivers of less importance and magnitude are enumerated. Nor is it correct, on p. 572, to state that Mont Blanc (15,784 ft.) is the highest summit in Europe, for whether the Caucasus be considered as forming the boundary between the Russian provinces of Europe and Asia, or to belong both by position and configuration mainly to Asia, the isolated peaks of Elburz (more properly Elbruz), 18,500 ft., and Kazbek, 16,500 ft., unquestionably belong within European limits. In some instances the author appears to have intentionally, in others inadvertently, failed to avail himself of the results of late explorations. The peak of Aconcagua, for example, perhaps the loftiest summit in America, is stated, on p. 408, to be 23,910 ft. in height, a measurement to be found in works as old as 1849, and which is about 700 ft. above that obtained by the officers of the Beagle under Capt. Fitzroy, nearly fifty years ago. The later determinations of Pissis, accepted by most Continental geographers, place it at 22,422 ft. On p. 410 we have the statement that the Organ Mountains, near Rio de Janeiro, reaching "heights of 7,500 ft.," "are probably the highest points in eastern South America," whereas the Montes Pyrenos, also in Brazil, attain an elevation of about 9,500 ft., and the peak of Itatiaiossú perhaps upwards of 10,000 ft. The Alleghany Mountains do not reach their highest elevation in Mt. Washington (p. 409) but in Black Dome, N. C. (as stated on p.

424), nor has Mt. Washington an altitude of 6,650 ft. Few well-known mountains of the United States have been more conservative of their height than Mt. Washington, which has gained or lost not more than a man's stature from the determinations of Guyot (6,288 ft.) thirty years ago to the more recent measurements of Hitchcock (6,293 ft.) We are unacquainted with the measurements which give Mt. Hooker, in British Columbia, a height of 16,760 ft. (p. 409). The author does not always appear to have been fortunate in the general apportionment of his material. We should have liked to see under Austria-Hungary a separate treatment of at least Bohemia, Galicia, and Hungary, as in the case of Saxony and the South-German states under the German Empire. In the section devoted to Switzerland no height is attached to any of the Alpine summits (although Mont Blanc is the only elevation of the Alps to which an altitude in feet is given in the general chapter on Europe), whereas no less than twenty-eight determined heights are enumerated in the British Isles.

The historical portion, treating by periods of one to three centuries, sets before the reader in a plain and attractive manner the development of the principal states, past and present, which have figured in history from the Phœnician colonization of the shores of the Mediterranean to the present time. The general skilful handling of the subject renders certain omissions and errors the more apparent. Thus, we fail to notice any account of the rise and growth of the great realm of the Netherlands—the successive annexations of Flanders, Artois, Brabant, Holland, etc., to the duchy of Burgundy—but we get the United Netherlands, as it were, ready made under Charles V. No mention is made either of Bohemia or Moravia in connection with the rise of the Slavic monarchies, nor does the name of Leon occur in the early history of Spain. The territorial acquisitions of Sweden by the Treaty of Westphalia, which introduced that kingdom into the Germanic body, are omitted. The dates are, on the whole, very accurate, but their frequent omission occasionally produces a disagreeable vagueness. On p. 58 we have the curious statement that the "Czar Romanoff, of the house of Rurik," was placed on the Russian throne, and on p. 29 that Roderick was the last king of the Ostrogoths. It may be as well in this place to note that Kepler was not a native of Stuttgart, had very little connection with that city beyond the fact of his having been born in the vicinity (p. 112); and that in addition to the three universities of Basel, Bern, and Zürich (p. 209) Switzerland has a fourth in that of Geneva, reconstituted from the Académie in 1875.

Despite all its shortcomings, this geography possesses very decided merits, which ought speedily to ensure it a wide circulation. It is but fair to suppose that a large number of the minor errata here pointed out would, in all probability, have been rectified by the author himself previous to publication, had not an untimely death, brought on by the hardships of African exploration, suddenly removed him from the field of his active labors.

Perception of Space and Matter. By the Rev. Johnston Estep Walter. (Boston: Estes & Lauriat. 1879.)—It is a pleasure to meet with a really able American philosophical book; though at the moment of writing this sentence certain impressions accumulated during our reading of the work sum themselves suddenly up into the suspicion, May not the Rev. J. E. Walter be an Englishman in disguise? First-rate American writing is distinguished by a cleanness of form, a verbal originality, a sensitiveness seldom found in England. Poor American writing is more ignorant, more vague, more eccentric and lopsided than English work by men of corresponding native endowment. There is a straightforward, solid common sense about Mr. Walter's mental atmosphere, a business-like clearness about his style, and a solidity about his erudition within its narrow range which remind us of that whole class of well-educated medium British intellects to which we can offer hardly anything to correspond. An American book as good as this would be apt to be better—more winged, so to speak, more epigrammatic in style, more cosmopolitan in its learning, more excursive in its speculations. An American book as narrow as this in horizon would almost certainly be far less clear, solid, and thorough than this within the horizon's limits.

But, be the author Briton or American, we have rarely read better critical pages than those in which he reviews Hamilton's, Bain's, Spencer's, and Brown's theories of perception. The theory of cognition is, Heaven knows, clogged with enough of gratuitously-invented difficulties through which the student must wade. Of all the cobwebs with which it is overgrown none are nowadays so much in the way as those spun by Mill, Bain, and Spencer when they try to derive the notion of space from that of time, instead of postulating it as an original and primordial element of our sensibility. Here Mr. Walter's broom sweeps beautifully clean. His own position may be indicated briefly for the benefit of the initiated. He believes in the absolute veracity of our knowledge of space and matter; but he repudiates all attempts to prove this veracity either by "immediate" presence of distant objects to consciousness (Hamilton), or by arousal of cognitive faculty "mediately" through sensations which serve as signs (Reid, Kant). He of course rejects, as above remarked, all essays to explain away these perceptions; and he finds the only unshakable basis for realism in the assumption that the soul is an extended substance, and, knowing immediately the amount of space affected in each of its own sensations, can infer mediately the spaces occupied by objects. As for matter, when one bodily organ is grasped by another, the mind immediately feels "the incompressibility, so to speak, or resistance of the mind itself," and so can mediately become aware of substance when grasping an inanimate object.

Mr. Walter's doctrine that the soul is extended has received much elaboration in Germany at the hands of Ulrici, I. H. Fichte, and their school. It is likewise a favorite doctrine of Ueberweg, and Lange dabbled with it. But Mr. Walter seems unaware of any forerunner besides Ulrici. We must confess to a feeling of regret that such superior intellectual power should have been wasted on obsolete forms of the problem. Nothing, to be sure, is entirely obsolete in philosophy; but a discussion of space and the space relations of consciousness which ignores Hodgson, Abbot, Helmholtz, Wundt, and Lotze necessarily condemns itself to incompleteness. With all this imperfection, however, Mr. Walter's book remains within its sphere one of the clearest and ablest critical contributions ever made to the subject.

Die Vereinigten Staaten von Nord-Amerika. Von Dr. Friedrich Ratzel, Professor der Erdkunde an der technischen Hochschule zu München. Zweiter Band. Culturgeographie, unter besonderer Berücksichtichung der wirthschaftlichen Verhältnisse. Mit 2 Holzschnitten und 9 Karten in Farbendruck. (München: R. Oldenburg; New York: B. Westermann & Co. 1880. Royal 8vo, pp. xvi.–762.)—The first volume of Professor Ratzel's work was noticed in No. 699 of the Nation. With the second, now before us, is concluded the most comprehensive and, all things considered, perhaps the best book of general information yet written on the United States. Where such a multitude and variety of topics are treated there will be, even with great knowledge and ability on the part of the author, unavoidable inequalities in the execution and a varying value in the results. The first volume treats of the physical geography and natural characteristics of the country; the second presents a description of its civilization, with special reference to its politico-economical aspects. Four-fifths of the latter, it may be safely said, falls within the province of strictly scientific discussion, and the remaining fifth may be handled, if not with equal precision, yet "neid- und neigungslos"—without envy and without partiality.

This Culturgeographie, or discussion of the human element in the development and present condition of the United States, is divided into five sections, as follows: I. Introductory, treating of the natural conditions of American civilization, together with an historical synopsis (104 pp.) II. Population, treating of the Indians, immigration, the statistics of the white population, the negroes and their enslavement, and the Chinese (114 pp.) III. The politico-economical relations, including agriculture, forestry, mineral wealth and mining, industry, routes and means of communication, and commerce (256 pp.) IV. Political, ecclesiastical, educational, intellectual, and social relations (156 pp.) V. Separate descriptions of States and Territories (100 pp.)

Of these divisions the third is the longest and most elaborate, while the fourth, passing from the more material features of our civilization to the exhibition of its moral and intellectual qualities, is undoubtedly the most interesting to the general reader. It is at the same time the most difficult part of the author's task, and the least likely to give entire satisfaction. Foreign writers, when they begin to talk about American politics, imagining themselves on the high sea of political philosophy, and being unprovided with either coast-chart or pilot, are almost sure to run upon some unexpected rock or shoal. It is easy enough to give an intelligent and correct account of the Constitution and administration of the general Government, but far less easy to give a comprehensive and yet specific description of the various State governments, and utterly impossible to bring the multitude of differences in county, township, and municipal administration under a single rubric. There is a want of accuracy in this part of Professor Ratzel's work which, considering its otherwise high character, is, to say the least, surprising. For instance, here are statements supposed to be generally applicable:

"The [State] senators are elected from a larger district and for a longer time than the members of the House of Representatives" (p. 506).

"The Governor is elected directly by the voters; the council or the ministers (secretaries) who assist him, as a rule, by the Legislature. The Prime Minister alone, the Secretary of State, the Governor himself appoints" (p. 507).

On the other hand, the reflections which the author makes on American political life, political parties, tenure of office, elections, corruption, office-seeking, and the like (pp. 513–527) testify to his penetration, moderation, and impartiality. The same may be said of the dozen or more pages concerning the church. Dr. Ratzel thinks that, while the Americans have a special talent for politics, they have a talent no less for religion; and the practical direction which American religion takes, turning upon the solvable questions of life rather than upon insoluble doubts and misty speculations, seems to him worthy of praise. Though he is not blind to the existence of a good deal of hypocrisy, he charitably attributes it largely to the respect which every American has for the opinions of others, and to the American's desire to avoid wounding the feeling of those who differ with him. Passing to the consideration of the intellectual life of America, we are told that, although politically and economically independent, we are, in matters pertaining to the intellect, still in the "colonial" phase of our development. This, being interpreted, means that we have yet no independent literature, science, or art. We are not, indeed, without talent; but the exigencies of life in a new country have thus far not been favorable to its cultivation. Our rising literature is like a star that "hath had elsewhere its setting." Our incipient science has been devoted mainly to practical inventions. Our art consists in imitation and importation. These are the general conclusions at which the author arrives (perhaps we ought to say, premises from which he unconsciously argues), and which to him are not irreconcilable with a large and often generous recognition of individual merit.

Candor compels us to say that Dr. Ratzel has sometimes yielded to the temptation to utter "glittering generalities" at the expense of careful, discriminating analysis. Many of his observations on the American people and on American society are thoughtful, well pointed, and altogether just, while others must be characterized as generalizations from insufficient induction. The tone and manner of his work are admirable, and taken together it is certainly a valuable addition to the list of "books about America."

Astronomy for Schools and Colleges. By Simon Newcomb, LL.D., Superintendent 'American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac,' and Edward S. Holden, M.A., Professor in the U. S. Naval Observatory. (New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1879. 1 vol. 12mo, pp. xii.-512. American Science Series.)—Of the manner in which the labor of preparing this work has been shared between the authors we have no direct indication, but those who are acquainted with the other works of Prof. Newcomb, not only on astronomy but in other departments of science, will probably infer that the general plan and tone of the work are due to him. It is in some respects quite different from most text-books of astronomy. There is hardly any department of the science about which we are not told something. Of course, where so many things are embraced in the compass of a single volume hardly anything can be treated in that exhaustive manner which one intending to make astronomy his profession would require. But this is rather a merit than a defect. Only an infinitesimal portion of those who would like to know something, not only of astronomy in general but of its instruments, its methods, and its processes, will ever give it any extended study after leaving school or college. If a text-book gives the pupil clear ideas of elementary principles, and takes him so far into details and applications that he will be able to use the knowledge already acquired, and ascertains what he must do and what he must expect should he desire to go further, it will do more than most text-books, either in astronomy or any other science. The authors have evidently attempted to construct a treatise which should combine as far as possible what are usually, though somewhat vaguely, designated as the popular and scientific methods. The attempt is, on the whole, eminently successful. A person of even no more than a common-school education will find enough in the volume to repay him well for its purchase and perusal; while those who come to the study of the book with sufficient preliminary knowledge will acquire such an insight into the methods and processes of astronomical science as to be able to study with profit works of far higher aim. Those portions of the work which assume a knowledge of the higher branches of mathematical science are printed in smaller type than the others, and are more especially intended for those who desire to go further than is usually done by persons of liberal education. But even in these portions the authors seem to have carefully abstained from any parade of the peculiar language of mathematics, and to have given the minimum of formulæ consistent with the attainment of the end in view. For example, they tell us in their preface that in some cases a knowledge of the differential calculus has been necessarily presupposed; but, while certain results are mentioned in various parts of the work as having been arrived at by means of the calculus, we have not noticed a single formula in the whole book in which the peculiar notation of the calculus is employed.

Much as the mathematical sciences are involved in every department of astronomy it is still eminently a science of the imagination. The student must mentally construct and carry about with him in his head a picture of the solar system, and the celestial sphere with its various imaginary lines and circles, or he can make little progress. For example, no map of the solar system can be constructed upon any one scale within the limits of a text-book. A scale which would bring the orbit of Neptune within the limits of a page would reduce the sun to a mere speck, while our poor little earth and moon would vanish from sight. The authors seem to have done all that is possible by means of maps, diagrams, and descriptions to aid the student in this respect.

The treatment of the tides is very brief. In his 'Popular Astronomy,' published in 1877, Professor Newcomb gave an explanation of the tides in which the centrifugal force generated by the revolution of the earth and moon about their common centre of gravity played a very important part. Mr. Arnold, in the Scientific Observer for October, 1878, criticised this explanation rather sharply. In a note published in the next number of the Observer Professor Newcomb admitted the general accuracy of Mr. Arnold's strictures, and said:

"The correct and vigorous translation of the expressions for this force from the language of the calculus into that of the vernacular does not seem possible, but I supposed I was near enough right to give a correct general idea of the reason why there are two tides a day. I now see that the task is a more difficult one than I supposed, and one which requires a good deal of close attention from the reader."

In the present work the authors seem to have abandoned the attempt to "translate the language of the calculus into the vernacular," and nothing whatever is said of the centrifugal force in question. The explanation given, is, no doubt, perfectly correct so far as it goes, and the pupil, by completing the diagram to which the authors refer so as to exhibit the action of the attractive force of the moon upon the waters on the remote side of the earth, will see that he is forced to admit a tide there as well as on the side nearest the moon. But even when thus forced to the correct result, probably his conception of the production of the latter tides will be clearer than of the former. But certainly the authors did well to abandon the language in which the explanation is usually couched. The talk about "the earth being drawn away from the waters," although susceptible of intelligible explanation, conveys no definite idea except to those who already understand the subject. Perhaps it would have been well to mention the fact that the tides at the winter solstice, owing to the greater proximity of the sun, are sensibly higher than at the summer solstice. An explanation of the phenomena of twilight would, we think, have been in place in a text-book on astronomy, but we find no reference to the subject in the present work.

Gleanings from Pontresina and the Upper Engadine. By Howard Payson Arnold. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.)—Pontresina is a village in the Upper Engadine, or upper valley of the Inn, surrounded by the Rhætian Alps. Its fifty solid stone houses, crowded upon a single and devious highway, are, no doubt, daily witnesses of peculiarities of peasant character which are worth recording, and would furnish forth an entertaining volume of the sort that has of late so frequently and pleasantly illustrated the modern taste for rustic life. The author, however, except in one instance—the description of the hermit brooding over the wrongs he had suffered in his enforced enlistment in the army, and kindled into momentary emotion by the rehearsal of his story—has been content to generalize the townspeople, and has preferred to attend particularly to the summer boarders. There is nothing agreeable, instructive, or interesting in the latter as he describes them, and, perhaps for that reason, he uses them only as the foil for his own humor and sarcasm. The English seem to have been the principal objects of his observation, and in exposing them he indulges in all the tricks of the peculiar American style usually termed "racy," marked by frequent puns and curiously constructed phrases which appear extraordinary in one who objects to Mr. Ruskin's English. Indeed, the style is as disagreeable as the people against whom it is employed. In the other portion of his volume, which treats of the natural features of the country, the mountains and the Roseg glacier, the Cembra pine, the Linnæa and other Alpine flowers, the racy style yields to the luxuriant, marked by an accumulation of choice adjectives and adverbs and by poetic quotations, of which the author is profuse on nearly every page. It is not often that style deserves so much notice, but in this book it is the most noticeable thing, and reveals the half-culture of which the volume is the product. Some aspects of life in a beautiful and remote mountain village the author has described truthfully, but for the most part they are in themselves unprofitable and are presented with what must be called coarseness. It requires genius to reconcile facetiousness and refinement, but when the facetiousness extends through two hundred pages, and is exercised upon everything and everybody, from Etruscan research and Linnæus to English subscription-lists and uncompanioned old maids, refinement is out of the question.

Outlying Europe and the Nearer Orient. A Narrative of Recent Travel. By Joseph Moore, jr. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880.)—The bulk of this volume has appeared in the foreign correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. The author travelled through the Mediterranean and up the Nile, made the tour of the Holy Land, Constantinople, Sicily, Spain, Portugal, Western France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and then returned through Berlin, St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Vienna to Paris. The rapidity of such a journey prevented any valuable observation of manners and customs, and, as in most of these countries picture-galleries are few, little was left for description but architecture and the broad features of the landscape, the former of which is treated with considerable detail. Great attention is given to the historical associations of places, and a sketch of the history of countries, and frequently of cities, is introduced. The poetic associations are exclusively with "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." There are a few characteristic stories of General Grant, whom the author found strangely inclined to conversation. The style is simple and wholly destitute of the rhetoric which disfigures so many American books of travel.

Chapters from the Physical History of the Earth. By Arthur Nicols, F.G.S., F.R.G.S. (New York: Harper & Brothers.)—The author of this instructive little work does not pretend to present his readers with an introductory general treatise on geology, or with an advanced text-book, but merely with an exposition of some of the leading phenomena connected with the earth's geological history. Commencing with the more purely physical problems involved in the formation of the planet and of its solid crust, a rapid survey is then had in chapters ii.–v. of the origin and characters of the stratified and unstratified deposits, upheaval, subsidence, and denudation, and the organically formed rocks; chapter vi., concluding Part I., is devoted to the glacial periods. This portion of the work, dealing with structural and dynamical geology, will probably be found to be the most interesting and readily digestible by the general reader, as its plain and familiar treatment, devoid of technicalities, cannot fail to render the subject-matter easily comprehensible even to the non-scientific mind. Part II., Palæontology, details at some length the beginnings and development of organic life from the Laurentian period to the Post-Pliocene, and concludes (chap. xiii.) with a review of fossil man. The author, in our opinion, might with advantage have restricted his remarks on the history of life to the more general principles connected with extinction and succession, instead of entering into the different minutiæ, which, in the absence of an introductory chapter on the animal kingdom, cannot but prove tedious to a considerable degree. The insufficiency of illustrations is another obstacle to the proper comprehension of this portion of the work. A stricter adherence to facts might in some cases be insisted upon. Thus, the statement on p. 150 that the crustacea were preceded in the order of appearance by the mollusca is, at best, very doubtful, the recent investigations of Mr. Hicks at St. David's, Wales, revealing in the Harlech and Longmynd group a rich trilobitic fauna where formerly scarcely any fossils were known to exist. Again, on p. 164 it is asserted that terrestrial vegetable life is "wanting, or at least as yet unknown," in any formation older than the Devonian, whereas, on pp. 159–60 we find the statement that "in the upper strata of the formation [Silurian] we have unquestionable sea-weeds, and an undoubted land-plant (Lepidodendron) . . ." The presence of true ammonites in the Palæozoic era (p. 170) is also very doubtful; on p. 205 we are informed that they first appear in the Trias. It is surprising to find omitted in the tabular view of the Palæozoic deposits Bohemia, the field of Barrande's remarkable labors, as one of the localities of the occurrence of the Silurian formation; and equally surprising to note (p. 174) that Carboniferous trilobites are exclusively American, when the three genera Phillipsia, Brachymetopus, and Griffithides are forms belonging to the Carboniferous limestone of England. On p. 185 the obnoxious expression occurs that the Enaliosaurians are divided into the principal genera of *Ichthyosaur*IA, *Plesiosaur*IA, and *Pleiosaur*IA. In the description of the Tertiary formations some reference might well have been made to the now generally received Oligocene, the more especially as a portion of the fluvio-marine deposits of the Isle of Wight are classed, on p. 247, partly with the Eocene and partly with the Miocene. The work will, on the whole, very well repay reading.

THE

Republican Text-Book

FOR THE

CAMPAIGN OF 1880.

A Full History of General James A. Garfield's Public Life.

WITH OTHER POLITICAL INFORMATION.

By B. A. HINSDALE, A.M.,

President of Hiram College.

A text-book for Republican voters, prepared especially for the campaign of 1880, at General Garfield's desire, by Professor Hinsdale, President of Hiram College, Ohio. Professor Hinsdale succeeded General Garfield in that position, and has been his life-long personal and political friend. Probably no other writer on General Garfield's life and times has had so good opportunities as President Hinsdale to know and study the views, character, and purposes of General Garfield.

The publishers add the following letter from Hon. Marshall Jewell, which sufficiently stamps the 'Republican Text-book' as authorized by the National Republican Committee:

"NEW YORK, July 30, 1880.

"President B. A. Hinsdale, author of 'The Republican Text-book for the Campaign of 1880,' is an intimate personal friend of General Garfield, of many years' standing. He has devoted much time and labor to making his book a full and authentic compendium of useful political information. It is well adapted to popular reading, and will be found especially useful to political speakers and writers. Believing that its circulation in the coming campaign will do great good, we take pleasure in commending it to the public.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1880.

The Week.

THE two principal "campaign stories" of the week are that Mr. English has, during the past three or four years, foreclosed a considerable number of mortgages in Indiana to recover payment of small loans. This discovery was made by the Cincinnati Commercial, and many of our esteemed Republican contemporaries seem to think it a very valuable one. Some of them have given up nearly a whole page to the list of foreclosures. Mr. English seems, like many other men, to be in the habit of investing considerable sums on mortgage, which is usually considered a business transaction, the object of the mortgage being to enable the creditor to get his money back in case the interest is not paid. But the esteemed Republican contemporaries seem to think that the mortgage is something which is drawn up either for fun or to save the debtor's dignity, and which no creditor fit to be Vice-President would think of taking seriously. So when Mr. English treats his as real security and enforces it, they denounce him as a humbug and hypocrite, and as "no poor man's friend." This is a sorry business for a paper like the Cincinnati Commercial to take up, and would be much better suited to Denis Kearney's organ. When the editor takes a mortgage we wonder what he does with it?

The other "story" is that General Arthur was really born in Ireland, and is therefore disqualified. He admits that his father was an Irishman, but says his mother was a New-Englander who never left her native country. But Mr. Hinman knows better, and says that he can prove that Mr. Arthur, senior, came to this country thirty-five years ago, when the son was about fourteen years old, which looks badly for the son, as, if he first crossed the ocean at the age of fourteen, he must have known he was not born in the United States, and must now be "lying," as Horace Greeley used to say, "knowingly, wilfully, and with naked intent to deceive." Nothing will satisfy Mr. Hinman, however, short of the calling of another Republican convention and the nomination of a native in place of Mr. Arthur. There seems to be a decline of interest in Hancock and Garfield on the part of the story-tellers, and it has even become fashionable to admit on the stump that they are both men of good character. In fact, the wretched way in which Hancock "pans out" as a rascal is a sore subject with many of our Republican contemporaries when they look at the piles of useless material about Tilden's atrocities which they had collected, in their expectation that the old villain would assuredly be nominated. Our advice to them would be to publish it all the same. It will show what kind of party the Democratic party must be to have such a person even as an adviser. We must not omit to mention, however, that it is found almost impossible to sell Hancock's campaign life to the Democratic farmers. These simple-minded but sagacious men say they "have heard enough of Hancock," and the Democratic book agents are greatly disheartened. It has also come out that a poor old soldier went to Garfield to ask for relief, and he brutally told him that "he did nothing for soldiers," and asked him why he did not go to the almshouse. Republican candidates almost always treat soldiers in this way. Schuyler Colfax once refused to see an old soldier because he could not send up a visiting card on a silver salver offered to him for that purpose by Colfax's pampered footman. The poor veteran thus refused by Garfield then wrote a letter to Hancock, and by return of mail came a fifty-dollar check and a kind note. There are rumors afloat also that Garfield has an unpaid tailor's bill at Troy, New York, and stole much furniture and bedding from a widow at the South.

Mr. Blaine in his speech at Bath, Me., on Monday, the 9th inst., set a good example by addressing himself to the action of the two parties respectively with regard to the national finances, showing that the Democrats in Congress opposed the act of 1869, for the strengthening of the public credit by declaring the Government obligations payable in coin; the act of 1870, for the refunding of the public debt at a lower rate of interest; and the act of 1875, providing for a return to specie payments—the three great measures by which the national credit has been restored. It is quite true that these measures did not receive the entire Republican vote, but it is also true that they received most of it, and that they were Republican measures, and that the debates and divisions on them fairly support the conclusion that, although the Republican party has not been wholly sound with regard to finance, the Democratic party has been almost wholly unsound, and, in fact, has produced no respectable financial doctrine whatever. In discussing the tariff he took high protectionist ground, and drew a woful picture of what would happen to the manufacturing and ship-building interests of Maine if the Democratic plan of a tariff for revenue only were adopted. He did nothing to explain the present exclusion of the United States from the foreign carrying trade, and, in fact, did not go below the surface of his case on any point; but the speech was a wholesome one, and dwelt mainly, as speeches in a canvass ought to dwell, on matters which are controllable by legislation.

At the Bankers' Convention which has been sitting at Saratoga a letter on the national banking system from Secretary Sherman was read on Thursday. He traced the history of the connection of the Government with the State banks, showing the loss and embarrassment suffered by the acceptance of their bills in payment of Government dues, and the immense gain by the substitution of the more stable currency of the national banks, and by the use of these banks as depositories of the Government bonds. Indeed, the letter was a demonstration of the complete sufficiency of the national-bank currency for all the needs of the country as regards paper money, and raises the question how its statements are to be reconciled with Mr. Sherman's arguments last winter in favor of a permanent Government issue of paper money. It would have been very interesting to have heard from him on that point also, but he did not touch on it. The most valuable of the other papers was one by Mr. George S. Coe, of this city, on the silver question, in which he exposed once more the danger of the continued coinage of silver now going on. He pointed out that there is at this moment a difference of $8,000,000 between the nominal value and the commercial value of the silver already coined. What makes the persistence of Congress in keeping up this coinage the more extraordinary is, that the silver is of no use in trade; the balance due us from Europe, owing to the enormous increase of our exports, being every year very large, and mostly settled in gold. Mr. Coe's own remedy, however, which consists in making the Government receive silver without limit on deposit, and issue certificates against it at the market value of the metal, for use in circulation, is open to the fatal objection that it might deluge the country with a third highly fluctuating currency, and would almost certainly make us the recipient of all the surplus silver of Europe. When a folly like the Silver Bill has been committed the only safe remedy is to drop it altogether. The experiment has been fairly tried, and the honest silver-men can abandon their position without discredit.

Since our last issue about $2,500,000 gold has arrived from Europe, and between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 is on the way here. Although what is called the foreign-trade balance, as made up from the Custom-house records, is not as favorable for the United States as a year ago, yet the actual balance is probably nearly so on account of the large shipments to Europe of American railroad securities, a demand for which has arisen because of the enormous earnings of the roads. As there is no official record of the exports and imports of securities, estimates as to the amount of gold which will be imported during the remainder of the year vary, the lowest being $15,000,000 and the highest $50,000,000. The principal part of the reserves of the New York banks consists of specie; the legal-tender-note part having fallen so low that it is no longer considered possible for the New York banks to supply the ordinary demands from the South and West for currency without the use of gold or silver dollars. The standard silver buzzard dollars can be sent at the expense of the Government to any part of the country, while, if gold is sent, either the shipper or the consignee must pay the express charge. It is likely, therefore, that the Treasury will be able to relieve its vaults of a part of the silver stored in them, and that the West and South will have an abundance of the ancient dollars for which their representatives a few years ago clamored. It was a dull week at the Stock Exchange. General trade continues active.

The Tennessee Democratic State Convention has resulted in a complete victory of the State-Credit party and a bolt by the Repudiators, who have set up a candidate of their own for governor, though they propose to support Hancock for President. The history of repudiation in Tennessee has been a long and disgraceful one, and it is fortunate for the State that it has reached a point at which a plain issue between making some sort of settlement with its creditors and robbing them out and out is at last prevented. There has never been any reason for repudiation at all. The entire debt amounts to some $25,000,000, and the interest on it could have been met by a rate of taxation which capital could easily bear. But instead of taking any means to provide for it, the debt has been left for years to the mercy of the legislature, which has steadily refused to impose an adequate tax. This disregard of its obligations has, of course, strengthened the hands of the out-and-out Repudiationists, and the real difference between these and the State-Credit party is that the latter's platform insists upon a final settlement of some kind, while the former insist (we quote from the platform) upon the right of the people "to settle for themselves by direct vote their alleged indebtedness." This, they say, is "the only right the people have been able to secure after years of struggle and contest," and they do not mean to give it up. The State-Credit plank, on the other hand, is as follows:

"We recognize a disposition upon the part of the creditors of the State, in view of the great losses entailed by the late war, the great depression of business, and the general shrinkage in values, to make a liberal reduction in both the principal and interest of our bonded indebtedness, and we declare that we favor a prompt settlement by the legislature with our creditors upon the best terms that can be agreed upon as a result of negotiation."

This was carried by a vote of nearly two to one, and, mild as it is, is certainly a victory for honesty and good government. The bolt will not affect the Presidential election in any way.

The Georgia Democratic Convention, after a week's conflict of extraordinary tenacity and excitement, adjourned without being able to agree upon a candidate for governor. The present incumbent, Gov. A. H. Colquitt, was the choice of much more than a majority, but the convention had bound itself not to abrogate the two-thirds rule, and neither side would budge. They agreed, however, upon candidates for all the other State offices, and the majority recommended Gov. Colquitt to the people, while the minority separately denounced him and nominated ex-Senator Norwood. In view of these dissensions the Republicans have called a convention for September, to consider how they can profit by the situation, and whether they shall support one or other of the Democratic candidates, or nominate a straight ticket. The latter course is hopeless, and there is one reason for their supporting Gov. Colquitt which seems to us almost like the voice of duty. Early in this month the country was shocked by the news of a peculiarly atrocious assault upon an unoffending colored family living near Atlanta. A gang of white ruffians, masked, the leader of whom had been fined for previous brutality to one of the victims, attacked his cabin by night, dragged him and his aged wife out and beat them unmercifully, shot their married daughter dead in bed beside her little ones, and seriously wounded her brother. "In no country—in no section—under no circumstances," said the Atlanta Constitution, "has there ever been a more horrible crime committed." The assassins were recognized in spite of their disguise, and arrested, and a report having reached Governor Colquitt that their friends intended a rescue, he took the Gate City Guard, a local troop, to the adjoining town of Jonesboro', brought away the prisoners, and lodged them in the Atlanta jail. Such an act deserves acknowledgment, and the more specific the better. We do not know what surer guarantee there could be for the lives and fortunes of the colored people of Georgia than to maintain Governor Colquitt in office by voting for him on the express ground of his readiness to execute justice without regard to color or color prejudice.

The report that there have been, or are going to be, tremendous census frauds at the South, wrought in order to increase Southern representation, is being vigorously used, in default of outrages, to stimulate sectional feeling in the canvass; and it, of course, derives a certain apparent support from such undoubtedly fraudulent operations as the Alabama election. The way the story is worked up is by taking what appear to be the returns in certain districts, and showing that these districts cannot contain as many inhabitants as the returns would seem to contain, and then inferring cheating on the same scale in all the other districts. But unfortunately, or fortunately, General Walker, the Superintendent of the Census, who knows more about the matter than anybody else—perhaps, indeed, as much as all the rest of the world—not only does not believe these stories, but explains that from the very nature of the counting machinery the data on which they are based must be worthless. The enumerators have been selected by the Census Department with care; they are presumably honest, and their honesty is fostered by the fact that if detected in fraud they go to the penitentiary for two years, and that frauds are easily discovered by the system of checks in use. So we doubt if this cry will be of much use, and trust Republican workers and speakers will turn to more serious matters. We venture to say that many more voters are disgusted and repelled than are won over by this sort of electioneering.

Complaint is made that the census shows a rate of increase in the South greater than that of the North, or 28 per cent. against 27 per cent. But in the first place, the rate of growth in population is a delusive basis of comparison. In the second place, it is not denied that on account of exceptional immigration the rates of Florida and Texas are reasonably large, though Florida gains but about 112,000 over the census of 1870, and Texas only 682,000 (or 68,200 per annum, natural increase and immigration combined). Leaving out these States, the rate for the remainder of the South is 23 per cent. But, except that they are Democratic, is there, for statistical purposes, any reason for calling Missouri, Maryland, Delaware, or West Virginia Southern States; and does 44 per cent. seem to any one who knows the natural resources of Arkansas, the extension of the railroad system there, and the efforts made by the roads to dispose of their lands to immigrants, a suspicious increase for that State, even if it involves 306,000 additional population? Excluding these States also, the remainder show a rate of a little more than 17 per cent. (against 16 per cent. for New England.) We for our part know no reason why Virginia and Kentucky should not likewise be abstracted, or why 30 and 31 per cent. respectively seem abnormal in their case. However, the main outcry is against South Carolina, when its rate is only 3 per cent., and its total increase 25,000—if we may trust a table prepared by the Boston Advertiser, which we have thus far used, and which has been relied upon by most of the Stalwart press. The Charleston News and Courier, however, defends a computed increase of 247,804, and consequent rate of 35 per cent., placing it sixth on the Southern list of rates. The improbability of this the News and Courier explains away by charging manifest errors upon the census of 1870, and this method will not be questioned by the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which says that if St. Louis had 310,864 inhabitants in 1870 "it must be apparent to the dullest comprehension" that "the census of this year must be widely erroneous."

As the time for the Indiana election draws nearer, its effect upon the minds of our esteemed contemporaries becomes more and more powerful. The defeated party in the recent constitutional-amendments case have petitioned for a rehearing, and the Times correspondent says that one judge is reported as having stated that the court would probably "grant a rehearing and reverse the decision." The decision prevented Indiana from becoming a November State; a reversal would make it a November State, and the Times correspondent says that "it is significant of the disrepute into which the court has fallen, that the general idea is that it will be guided in its action entirely by the political situation." No decision will be made until near the time for the October election, and "then, if the political managers think they can carry the State and influence the November election, the court will allow the decision to stand, or at least will not reverse it until after election." But, "if the managers think the contest in October doubtful, or certainly against them, and that a Republican victory would end all hope for November, the court will not scruple to reverse its decision, throw the election over until November, and avoid the sure disaster which defeat in Indiana in October would precipitate." "That," adds the correspondent, "is the feeling here." He has forgotten to mention one important fact—viz., that the petition for rehearing was the result of a corrupt arrangement between the defeated party and the Democratic managers. Such judges as the correspondent describes are very bad men, but no amount of badness will enable a judge to render partisan decisions until matters are brought before him for a hearing, and the opportunity for a reversal of the decision (originally unsatisfactory to the Republicans) is given by the Republicans themselves. How this can be the result of anything but a corrupt understanding between the Republican managers and the Democratic managers we do not see, and we beg to call our contemporary's attention to this aspect of the matter. Its correspondent is active and intelligent, and we feel confident that in the end he will get to the bottom of this Indiana conspiracy, which is one of the blackest in the annals of the bench. The Albany Law Journal, we notice, thinks that there is a good deal to be said on both sides of the question decided by the Indiana judges, but this was before the Times correspondent got at what the lawyers call the ratio decidendi of the case.

The annual report of the Texas-and-Pacific Railroad has been published, and is in some respects curious reading. This road has been of late years one of the most persistent and clamorous applicants for more subsidies from the Government, without which, it was stoutly maintained, it could not possibly be completed. After long and vain lobbying its managers came last year to the conclusion that there was no chance of getting the United States to help them to build the road, so they resolved in despair to build it themselves, and made a contract for six hundred miles of extension from Fort Worth to El Paso, the whole to be completed and equipped before the first of January, 1883. The work was begun promptly and has been prosecuted vigorously, and the report says 100 miles will be finished by October of this year, 50 more by April, 1881, and the rest within the time specified in the contract. The company will then have 1,140 miles of road, and expects in a few years to have only $25,000 of mortgage debt and $20,000 of capital stock per mile, as the capitalized cost of the road. Moreover, the business on the completed portion seems to be increasing rapidly. In fact, the outlook is cheerful in the highest degree, and shows what enterprising men can do when their attention is not distracted from their legitimate business by lobbying in Washington.

The Grand Jury which has been investigating the Seawanhaka disaster has found true bills for manslaughter against the owners, the captain, the engineer, and the Government inspectors. The presentment, with regard to the system of Government inspection, would have been much more effective had it been more judicial in tone; but the array of facts is such as has never before been made public in a civilized community. The jury state that an examination of seven engineers, licensed by the Inspector of Boilers and Machinery, has resulted in showing them all to be "incompetent for their several positions"; that there is no form or system of examination; that "not one of the licensed engineers examined by the jurors could answer the question how to ascertain the amount of steam in a boiler if for any reason such boiler had no steam-gauge," but that in several instances they admitted that they had "not got the education to figure it out"; that in the allowance of certificates to officers other than engineers "more consideration is given to the question of the applicant's availability for a 'special place' than to his general qualifications"; that the requirements of the law with regard to inspection "are not observed to any reasonable degree of accuracy or honest fulfilment"; that in many instances steam-vessels granted certificates are "absolutely unfit" for use; that vessels only fit for river navigation are permitted to carry thousands of excursionists miles out to sea; that the life-boats, floats, and preservers are in many cases insufficient in number, inconveniently placed, and in an unsafe condition; that no instance has been brought to the jury's attention of any drill or test being resorted to; that the annual examination required by law is grossly neglected, and that the Seawanhaka accident was directly caused by the licensing of incompetent officers, and the worthless system of inspection and equipment. They recommend the appointment of a "learned commission," and a thorough and complete revision of the laws. It does not need either learning or commissions, however, to tell us what is the trouble with the inspection.

Turkey had been allowed three weeks to put the Montenegrins in possession of Dulcigno, and at first signified her intention to do it within a still shorter period, and has despatched troops for that purpose, but still asks for a little delay. There is a general expectation, however, that she really means to keep her promise, but the difficulty has been suddenly increased by the Albanian declaration of independence. Pending the settlement of the Montenegrin difficulty, the Greek question is lying in abeyance, and it seems to be doubtful what will next be done about it. The French Government, supported with rather unusual unanimity by the French press, is said to decline joining in any coercive measures against Turkey on behalf of Greece, doubtless to Mr. Gladstone's great disappointment and chagrin. The Temps justifies this by alleging that France sought, at the Berlin Conference, to have the new Greek frontier line imposed on Turkey peremptorily as part of the requirements of the Treaty; but the matter was left open owing to the opposition of Lord Beaconsfield, and now that England has suddenly changed her Minister and her policy, France is not going to involve herself in war and precipitate the break-up of Turkey to satisfy Mr. Gladstone's "religious ideas and his love for the sons of Homer." Mr. Gladstone will now have to get help from some other quarter or else act alone, as Russia did. There is much reason to believe that this fear of precipitating a Turkish break-up will keep Austria and Germany back also, and that, in fact, nobody longs for it but Russia. But the Liberals have gone too far and are too much pledged to carry out the Treaty of Berlin, as against Turkey, to draw back now without most damaging discredit.

On August 11, two days after General Roberts's start for Kandahar, General Stewart withdrew with all his troops from Kabul, "in admirable order," and after "a very satisfactory interview" with Amir Abdurrahman, who came to the city for the purpose, before entering the Bala-Hissar in state. General Stewart's army was expected to reach Gandamak about the 17th, and thence, after a short halt, to proceed to and beyond "the scientific frontier," both military and political reasons demanding a complete evacuation of Kabulistan. General Roberts, marching in an opposite direction, made a good advance on the first day, and, as the country around him was quiet, he ought by this time to have reached and passed Ghazni. The longest and probably the most difficult stretch in his road is between Ghazni and Kelat-i-Ghilzai. The former city, after opening its gates to his still fresh force, may rise in arms after his turning his back on it. The country around Kelat-i-Ghilzai was undisturbed as late as the 12th, and its British garrison was abundantly supplied and in a condition to aid General Roberts with provisions. The news from Kandahar is even of later date, but less favorable and apparently less authentic. According to one report, Ayub Khan has begun the siege of that city in earnest, and "a heavy and continuous fire is kept up on both sides." General Phayre's advance is still delayed, and the regions adjoining his own base, Quettah, are, like the surroundings of Kandahar and of Chaman-Choki, beyond which he does not venture to march, scenes of skirmishes between British detached posts and aggressive natives. The hostile area is evidently extending.

THE WHITE SIDE OF THE SOUTHERN QUESTION.

THERE did not appear, at the late Republican conference in this city, to be much disposition among leading Republicans to go to the South to speak during the present canvass, and there is evidently a very strong disposition among many of them to rely on the old plan of "firing the Northern heart" by memories of the war, and by opposing a "Solid North" to a "Solid South." Mr. Wheeler, the Vice-President, whose voice is seldom or never heard in politics on any other subject, opened the campaign the other day in Vermont exactly as he opened it in 1876, by painting the Democrats as public enemies, of the same class as those who fought at Gettysburg, and their attempt to elect a President as a virtual continuation of that battle, to be met in the same spirit if not with the same weapons. Mr. Blaine is, thus far, the only speaker of note who has departed from this line, and addressed himself to economical topics. When Mr. Conkling takes the field, if he takes it at all, we may be sure we shall have the war view of the nature of the contest presented with the lurid rhetoric of which he is so great a master. If the Democrats are in truth a Mexican and not an American party—that is, a party seeking possession of the Government for the purpose of overthrowing it and plundering the Treasury, and not a party seeking possession of it in order to administer it constitutionally under the influence of different ideas—there is, of course, no use in sending orators to the South. It would be as absurd to do so as it would have been to send them into Lee's camp to argue him into disbanding his forces and going home. On this view, the one duty of the hour is to lash the Northern people into fury and distrust; or, in other words, to render them as impervious and indifferent as possible to what the Southern whites have to say for themselves. The first duty of a citizen in time of war is to turn a deaf ear to the enemy except when he cries for quarter, and quarter is only to be given to him when he agrees to stop disputing and accept the victor's terms.

This is, however, very distinctly the Mexican mode of conducting political campaigns; but the Mexicans conduct them in a much more rational manner than we do. As soon as a nomination is made the Mexican politician, instead of mounting a stump and denouncing his opponents as traitors and rebels who are beyond the reach of persuasion and deserve killing, gets his musket ready and begins to raise troops and drill them, and as soon as he sees a voter of the other side takes a shot at him. In order to provide funds for the campaign, instead of assessing the office-holders and sending out circulars asking for contributions from the faithful, he seizes the horses and cows and loose cash of the enemy and converts them into the sinews of war. He is right in this. With his view of the designs of the opposition he would act not only imprudently but absurdly in letting its voters come to the polls at all. The voting of men who mean to destroy the Government if they get a majority ought not to be permitted by any man who loves his country and thinks he has the preponderance of physical force on his side. If the Democrats in supporting Hancock are really engaged now in the same enterprise in which the South was engaged during the civil war, and are, as Mr. Wheeler says, for all practical purposes the same men who attacked the Cemetery at Gettysburg, it will be a very foolish thing to go through the forms of an election in November. If, however, it be thought better, on the whole, to hold the election, on the chance of their being beaten at the polls, the chance of their winning ought to be provided for, and the time now passed in holding meetings and distributing documents should be given to the raising and drilling of regiments and to collecting military stores.

The Conference, however, did not adopt the pessimistic view of the situation, and a resolution was passed requesting the National Committee to supply speakers for the South as far as practicable. We sincerely trust the Committee will be able to give effect to this resolution, and will take pains to do so. If it can send down leading and well-known speakers—that is, men who are known at the South to be influential in the Republican party—it will be a very important step, even if no immediate results from it are perceptible. It will be the first formal recognition by the Republican party that there is such a thing at the South as a White question. Hitherto the Southern question has been treated by the organs of the party, whether newspapers or speakers, as if it were simply and solely a Black question, whereas it is a combination of two questions, one black and the other white. The whites are more numerous than the blacks, and more energetic and able, and are far more potent for good or evil. The peace and prosperity of the South depend far more on their state of mind than they do on that of the blacks. In fact, to convince them, or win them over to Northern views of politics and manners, is to pacify the South permanently and to make an immense addition to the well-being of the whole Union, and nothing short of this will suffice. There has been, so far as we know, no public and conspicuous recognition whatever of this fact by the Republican party. All, or almost all, of its references to the Southern whites for the last fifteen years have been made in taunt or defiance, or in demands for degrading submission, like Mr. Charles Foster's complaint that the Southern members of Congress had made no public admission of their guilt in going to war. In nearly every Republican platform it has been, during all that period, the fashion to assume the conscious criminality of the 100,000 Southern whites who died on the battle-field, and of the survivors who sacrificed almost everything that they had in the world, except life, in the same cause. It has also been the fashion to assume that a Southern white ought not to have prejudices, or passions, or bitter memories, or foolish hopes; ought not to be ignorant, or stubborn, or turbulent—or, in fact, in any way different from a Massachusetts or Vermont white. It has been assumed, too, and is assumed to-day, in most discussions of the Southern reluctance to let negroes vote, that the question of negro suffrage is just as simple and as soluble for the South-Carolinian or Mississippian as for the New-Yorker—that is, that it is simply a question of abstract justice. The fact is that it is in some States a question whether the State government shall remain in the hands of the class which possesses nearly all the property and most of the intelligence and political sense of the community, or shall pass into the hands of a class without property, without education, and without a single political habit or tradition.

We are not now defending or attempting to defend the Southern method of solving the question. We are simply stating its real character, which Republican speakers and writers are apt to ignore; and yet we firmly believe that nothing has done more than this ignoring to keep up Southern resistance to Northern ideas. Southern whites are human like the rest of us. Providence has not created in those parts a new and peculiar human being, such as has hitherto been unknown in history. There is no Northern man who would not be exasperated by a counsellor who, in reprobating the smallness of his charitable donation, refused to hear what was the amount of his income, and insisted on assuming that it was a large one like his own. The conversion of the Southern whites to the ways and ideas of what is called the industrial stage in social progress, which is really what has to be done to make the South peaceful, is not a more formidable task than that which the anti-slavery men had before them fifty years ago in seeking to turn Northern opinion against "the peculiar institution." The intolerance to be encountered is no greater, while the natural forces which are aiding the change are much more powerful. But it must be effected, as that change was effected, by much speaking, not to the faithful but to the heathen, and by the kind of speaking which persuades men and not that which exasperates them. No good will ever be done, for instance, by telling Southerners that it is just as easy for them to accept negro suffrage as for Northerners to accept it, or that their first duty is to forget the dead who died at their bidding, or by asking them to admit, even for the sake of argument, their own moral inferiority and perversity. In short, the art of persuasion is just the same at the South as in other countries. To practise it successfully the prejudices, ignorances, and weaknesses of audiences have to be taken into account.

There is one other consideration which must not be overlooked. The South, in the structure of its society, in its manners and social traditions, differs nearly as much from the North as Ireland does, or Hungary, or Turkey. It has in common with the North religion, law, and language, which are very important, undoubtedly, as a basis to argue upon, but they are only a basis. They do not enable a man who has never been in the South or has never associated with the people to understand the real difficulties of the Southern problem now. There is no American of fair education who would not be ashamed to give himself up for many years to declamation about Ireland, Hungary, or Turkey, and offer confidently to legislate for these countries and supply a complete cure for their respective evils, without ever visiting them or having anything but a superficial literary knowledge of them. And yet this, or something like it, is what most of the prominent Republican politicians have been doing with regard to the South for the last fifteen years. There is hardly one of them who has gone into that region since the war, except as a "Visiting Statesman" to brace up the Returning Boards; they have viewed the land from afar, through a very thick mist of misinformation, prejudice, and passion. Nothing would do more to give the party temper a more constructive and statesmanlike turn than a personal examination of the ground on which the phenomena to which they give so much of their attention actually take place. And nothing, as it seems to us, would do so much to win the Southern whites to a more sober and rational view of their situation than a fair opportunity of telling leading Northerners on the spot why they have such a dread of negro majorities, and of conferring with them as to the means of robbing these majorities of their terrors. Anyhow, one thing is certain—that a Solid North is no cure for a Solid South. You might as well say that hate would cure hate, or the vendetta put down murder. Any man who preaches it as a statesman's remedy preaches perennial bitterness.

AN AGRICULTURAL OUTLOOK.

THE recently published report of Messrs. C. S. Read and Albert Pell, who were sent by the Royal Agricultural Commission to enquire into the condition of agriculture in the United States and Canada with reference to its prospective influence upon British farming, is of course of interest to Americans. The report asserts that settlement of our free lands and the termination of the free ranges, by means of which millions of cattle and sheep are grown so cheaply, will increase the cost of production and consequently raise prices, which will be further enhanced by the increase in population, and therefore that the contest for agricultural supremacy will not result wholly in our favor: self-evident conclusions, but so simple that Americans have not thought of them, and of great importance to two nations. Free lands, cheap production and transportation, and favoring seasons here; high rents, oppressive taxation, and bad weather there, have combined to produce an agitation in the United Kingdom that bids fair to end in a land revolution, involving radical changes in the social system and in the methods of English agriculture. The British farmer prospered by reason of a dense population engaged in profitable manufacturing and commerce, the absence of injurious competition, and high prices for meat and wheat; American competition has made these products unprofitable, and they must give way to other crops; but farmers change slowly, and the interim is black with uncertainty—tempered, however, with the certainty of the repeal of obnoxious laws by the Liberal Government.

Though gathering momentum from the beginning, the great progress of this country has taken place within the past twenty years, owing to the rapid settlement and cultivation of Western lands, and we have been going on as if there were to be no exhaustion of the impelling force. The Government Land-Office supplies few facts for a careful analysis of the land question, but we can sift out enough for our purpose. The public domain in the "land States" comprised 1,814,788,922 acres; of this amount 734,591,236 acres had been surveyed and presumably disposed of up to June 30, 1879. Deducting also the Territory of Alaska, the unsurveyed desert territories of New Mexico, Arizona and Utah, Indian Territory, and the public lands in Florida and Louisiana, we have left about 500,000,000 acres in the desirable Northwest region; but from this we must again subtract the millions of acres of forest, mountain, swamp, desert, isolated flat prairie, watercourses, and sterile land, which as a free gift even would be a poor investment; also the many thousand unsurveyed "claims" of the pioneers. What remains of good land is now being disposed of at the rate of nearly ten million acres per year, and in an increasing ratio. In travelling through the Territories one sees the pioneer close to and among the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains. Where five years ago buffaloes stopped the railroad-trains, now are seen grazing cattle and fields of wheat. The man who went on to the frontier five years ago now has a vanguard several hundred miles in advance of his ranch. The picket-lines of the approaching armies of settlers from the East and from the Pacific have met in the middle belt in Colorado and Utah, and the vast territories to the northward are being rapidly overrun by the conquerors. The graziers on the free ranges in New Mexico, Colorado, and the Northern Territories already complain of being crowded, and many of them are acquiring and fencing in large tracts for pasturage, which is a virtual abandonment of the free-grazing system. At the present rate of settlement the desirable free "homestead" lands will probably all be occupied before this decade has ended. There will still be many million acres of good land in the market at low prices, for, unfortunately, the railroads possess a large portion of the best lands in the Northwest; but even ten or five dollars per acre is very different from a free range over thousands of acres, and the land will necessarily more rapidly increase in value after the free lands are disposed of. Then there will be a corresponding advance in the cost of production. It matters little, under the free-range system, that a bullock requires several acres to graze upon, but on purchased land it is a factor which demands a different system of management and more capital in the business.

Increased cost of production in a great producing country, of course, means expansion of prices in the markets of the world. What this increase will be it is impossible to state, for there are other agencies at work to determine the result. Australia is becoming prominent as a food-producing country, and her position will be enhanced by the better facilities for transporting dead meat which are sure to be discovered soon; her wheat now commands a higher price in London than does American. Southern Russia contains vast tracts of as fertile soil as Kansas can boast, and steps are being taken for its development. India now sends wheat of superior quality to English markets, and her minister of agriculture reports her resources in this line as very great. What position the Continent of Africa, now being opened, is to hold in the world's markets is an important but unknown element in the equation; her immediate influence will be slight.

That our soil products will be greatly augmented as more land is tilled and better systems of culture are adopted may be safely affirmed; but it may be assumed, also, that the increase in amount will in the future, more nearly than in the past, keep pace with the growth of population. Then we shall have, proportionately, a smaller surplus to export. With less to sell abroad, and that at higher prices, our influence in foreign markets would cease to be the evil genius of British and Continental farmers. But even though we lose our agricultural supremacy abroad, the present outlook is that American agriculture will progress quite as rapidly henceforth as it has thus far done. Similar influences operated thus in England up to a few years ago, when the great tide of American competition poured into her markets, reducing prices without a corresponding rebate in the cost of production. The older States will suffer less from Western competition as the cheap lands become more valuable and home consumption increases with the growth of population in the sparsely settled districts. Western farmers will adopt more systematic and scientific and economical methods. Farmers generally will be obliged to use more working capital, which they will be enabled to do by reason of higher prices, and the facilities which will be forthcoming for the readier borrowing of capital on real-estate security. Business principles, with something of the system of manufacturing establishments, will continue to be applied in an increasing ratio. Crops will become more localized. It is rapidly being determined what products are best adapted to particular sections. East, West, and South may compete less with each other. Such products as blooded cattle, horses and sheep; poultry, milk, small fruits and garden crops; tannin-producing, fibrous and other plants used in manufacturing, may become the profitable specialties of the thickly populated districts; cereals, meat, cotton, wool, sugar, etc., of the broader fields and pastures. The sugar-beet rejuvenated the agriculture of Germany and France; the development of the industry for the production of sugar from beet-root and from sorghum is making rapid strides here, and, as we showed a few weeks ago, bids fair to save a large portion of the hundred million dollars now sent out of the country annually for sweetening. Other special crops, among them tea and coffee probably, will assist our agricultural progress. With greater prospective emoluments we may expect that many able young men who now seek commerce and the professions will become farmers, which, with the slowly growing army of educated agriculturists, will tend to elevate the calling to the degree of dignity which it has attained in England and Saxony.

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

THAT singing is one of those arts which the present generation is rapidly losing, is an opinion so often expressed by critics and amateurs that it seems worth while to examine how much truth there is in it. One thing certainly is true: the great age of song has passed away with the musical supremacy of Italy, and been replaced by the instrumental age, with Germany as a centre. And the causes of this change are, in the main, these: insufficient vocal training, the decline of the Italian opera, and the many advantages of instrumental over vocal music. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries schools of song flourished in Rome, Florence, Naples, and other Italian cities compared with which most of our modern conservatories are mere kindergartens. The average young American lady who dreams of cultivating her voice by taking a few lessons a week for a term or two at a music-school, might well heed the account given by Bontempi of the training given to pupils at the papal chapel about the middle of the seventeenth century. One hour a day was devoted to the singing of difficult passages, a second to the practice of the trill, a third to pure intonation—all in presence of the teacher, and with the help of a mirror, to avoid grimaces and observe the motion of tongue and mouth. Besides these, several hours were devoted to the study of expression and literature, several more to practice on the piano, composition, and the theory of music; and frequent opportunity was given to sing in church, while the Monte Mario was visited in order that the pupils might hear the echo of their voices and thereby study their own faults. After such training, and assisted by a climate most favorable to the human voice, one can hardly wonder so much at the feats said to have been performed by many of the prime donne and male soprani of the time. One of the latter could execute in one breath a chain of trills including every note through two chromatic octaves and back again. Another was rewarded by no less than five minutes' applause for the way in which he gradually swelled one note of an aria to the utmost capacity of his lungs and then as gradually returned to the scarcely-audible beginning. He then began to sing so rapidly that the band could hardly keep pace with him! When he was only seven years of age he had completely routed a celebrated trumpeter in Rome in a contest the aim of which was to see which of the two could hold out the longest on a note, pile the greatest number of trills on top of each other, and the like.

Such stories clearly show the prevailing taste of the time. People went to a musical entertainment very much as to a circus, not for artistic enjoyment but to behold a display of carefully-practised tricks. Sensuous beauty and agility of the voice outweighed all other considerations, such as the artistic value of the piece performed or histrionic talent. The composers, accordingly, were mere assistants whose duty it was to furnish a background on which a vocalist could paint his roulades, trills, and other fancy-work. In course of time a change was effected, in so far as the art of embellishing a melody was no longer left to the singer, but was prescribed for him by the composer himself. This period culminated in Rossini and Meyerbeer, whose chief aim in life was to observe what impression certain vocal tricks, such as very high notes and rapid passages, made on the crowd, and then to utilize them at every favorable opportunity, especially at the close of a scene, so as to secure applause and an encore. Rossini has now almost entirely disappeared from the stage, but Meyerbeer, owing to a shadow of dramatic talent which he doubtless did possess, is still popular, if not with people of refined musical taste, yet with those who think it their duty to be "cosmopolitan," and with the crowd of semi-musical people who in all large cities form the majority of an operatic audience. The only full-blooded representative of the old prima-donna type for whom this sort of music was written now living is Madame Patti, although even she has been obliged to yield to altered taste, in so far as she may no longer with impunity alter the notes of melodies contained in her rôles. The sensuous charm of Patti's voice is so great that she not only throws the crowd into convulsions of enthusiasm, but even leads sober critics to ascribe to her characteristics which we have found it difficult to discover in her. What is said of her skill as an actress and her fine mimic display seems in itself doubtful, since she hardly ever appears in a rôle that calls for any of these qualities. When she does appear in a work that has a real dramatic plot her weakness is fully exposed to light. Almost any second-rate prima-donna at a German opera-house gives a more correct notion of the genuine Gretchen one expects to see in "Faust" than Patti. It is positively painful to see her parodying the simple, modest German girl in the scene where Faust offers to escort her home, by appearing in a long, trailing silk robe, just from Paris, and strutting across the stage with the proud air of an offended peacock.

But it is useless to try to make an old-fashioned prima donna in her gigantic self-conceit understand that the first aim of a dramatic singer should be to merge her personality in the part assumed, just as a novelist must of all things beware of intruding his personality on the reader. Patti reminds one of an artist who would insist on painting his own figure in the foreground of every picture he makes. Every tone, every gesture of hers plainly says to the audience: "Behold and hear the great Patti, the adored of all adorers. What would this music be without Patti to sing it?" Such an attitude, combined with sensuous beauty of voice, is sure to impose on the public and bring down the house, because the people of taste who look for something else have always been in a minority. And this enables us to understand why in the days of the famous Italian singers audiences were habitually thrown into such states of wild excitement, compared with which the scant and artificial applause in modern theatres might seem a mere "damning with faint praise." Southern excitability has to be taken into account here; but the main difference lies in the fact that the æsthetic pitch, so to say, has since been considerably raised, and, while more art is expected of a singer than was formerly the case, the growth of emotional culture has tended to repress the extravagant expression of feeling by applause. Although mere beauty of voice and fine personal appearance will still draw a full and enthusiastic audience in very large cities, like London, Paris, and Berlin, where a house can be entirely filled with people belonging to an earlier stage of musical culture, there is at least one city in Europe where these qualities no longer suffice. Patti's complete fiasco in Munich last winter was an event no less intelligible than significant for the future. It is a well-known fact that no vocalist now stands a chance of securing an engagement in a German theatre unless he combines with a good voice a considerable amount of histrionic talent. Niemann, Betz, Vogel, Materna, Brandt, Wekerlin are the leading German vocalists belonging to the class of "fixed stars," and they are all of them Wagner-singers par excellence—i. e., vocalist-actors. It must be admitted that the sensuous beauty of these voices is not comparable to that of the Italians. But a musician does not look for sensuous beauty of tone alone; he would rather have less of it and more expression, more dramatic art. And what we have lost in sensuous beauty of voice is a hundred times atoned for by the quality of the works performed and by the brilliant sensuous colors the orchestra adds to the vocal parts by its symphonic accompaniment.

The extinction of the old species of vocalists need not, therefore, inspire us with despondent thoughts as to the future of the vocal art. A new species is gradually coming into existence better adapted to present circumstances. But there is another apparent enemy to song whose inroads may seem of a more dangerous nature. Since the days of Beethoven instrumental music has been gaining more and more ground on vocal, so that the predilection of artists for the former might naturally raise a doubt as to whether the general notion that vocal music is the highest branch of the art is quite correct. A smooth and well-trained voice indeed has more elementary beauty and is capable of more intense and varied expression than any instrument, the nearest approach to the voice being in the case of the 'cello and horn. But such a voice is scarcely ever to be heard, while good instruments are abundant enough. Again, while an orchestra that can play a difficult composition in perfect time and tune is not an uncommon spectacle, at least in Europe, we have heard few choruses that could, unaided by an orchestra, do the same without flatting half-a-tone or more, and the same is true of individuals. Of course it must not be overlooked here that while the members of an orchestra are almost always professional artists, who devote all their time to their art, choral societies are usually composed of amateurs of all professions, who perhaps seldom sing a note except when they meet for a rehearsal. This, combined with previous insufficient training, accounts for the inferiority of vocal performances. Still more has instrumental music gained over vocal by the fact that its resources are so much greater. A whole evening of pure vocal music is apt to become monotonous, because, even in a mixed chorus of male and female voices, the variety of clang-tints or tone-colors is quite limited; and the modern ear requires a variety in this respect which only a full band with its infinite possibilities of combinations can satisfy. A vocal concert bears the same relation to an instrumental as the unchanging blue sky of a summer day does to the gorgeous hues of a fine sunset. The compass, too, of the human voice is very limited, and its powers of executing difficult and rapid passages still more so. No wonder, therefore, that musical Titans like Beethoven, seeing that the voice did not suffice (in this sense) for the expression of their glowing and varied thoughts, gave the preference to the many-tongued orchestra, whose resources are not so readily exhausted.

It may well be questioned whether vocal music will ever recover its lost supremacy. In this country the unfavorable climate offers another obstacle to the growth of this art which probably the most judicious training and constant practice can never entirely overcome. The harsh and disagreeable voices of our beautiful American women are proverbial, and a source of constant surprise and dismay to admiring foreigners. In our colleges, where young men from all regions and classes congregate, a good tenor voice is so great a rarity that a glee club is frequently brought to the brink of dissolution simply for lack of it. All this seems to hint at the advisability of our paying especial attention to instrumental music in this country rather than to vocal. The great interest taken in some of our larger cities in the latest works of German instrumental composers is in part, no doubt, matter of fashion, and partly also owing to the exotic charms of the new and pleasing tone-color effects heard in them. But much is due to genuine admiration and intelligent appreciation, so that, all things considered, we are inclined to think that the future musical development of America will lie chiefly in the direction of instrumental compositions and concerts.

ROCHEFORT AND GAMBETTA.

PARIS, July 28, 1880.

OUR beautiful national fête of the 14th of July has been but a day's truce to party contention, which was renewed on the morrow with fresh ardor. First of all, the fête itself was the subject of the liveliest and most adverse criticism from the enemies of the Republic. I never better understood to what a degree party spirit disposes men to see things through colored glasses, sometimes black, sometimes rose-tinted. On this occasion the Royalist spectacles were of the deepest black. Although this entirely popular fête passed off brilliantly, untroubled by any vexatious incident, thanks to the spontaneous co-operation of our citizens, it has been depicted in the Clerical and Bonapartist newspapers either as a frigid official ceremony or as a saturnalia. The journals of the embittered Orleanists went so far as to say that Paris that day had given herself up to one of those orgies which prepared the massacre of the hostages. When contemporary facts witnessed by more than a million of people are falsified in this way, we can easily understand the difficulty there is in verifying the testimony of historians about past events. If the interest of any person leads him to believe that two and two are five, or that it is night at noon, he will think that it is so, whatever may be shown to the contrary.

It is not, however, the Royalist contention which has made the most noise lately; that party vented all its wrath when the first of the 29th of March decrees was executed against the Jesuits, whose appeal is pending before the tribunals, and will be brought before the "tribunal des conflits," a special court, called on to decide if such or such an act of a Government agent has been accomplished in conformity with the instruction of his superiors in the administrative hierarchy as to enforcing the laws of the country, or if he is personally responsible for violence committed. In the first case the "tribunal des conflits" will decide that the agent is not responsible and cannot be prosecuted. It is the Government itself which ought to be sued, and that can only be done in parliament, the only power able to modify the law when it has been executed. In the second case a suit can be brought against a Government agent as a private individual for having exceeded his instructions. The "tribunal des conflits," then, will have to determine whether the police commissaries who expelled the Jesuits from their houses have executed the laws of the land or have committed an illegal act. In consequence of the law-court vacations it is not probable that this serious affair will be decided before the autumn, and it appears certain that the Government will wait for the decision before proceeding to execute the second decrees of the 29th of March last, according to which the non-recognized congregations, other than the Jesuits, will not be expelled unless they refuse to ask for authorization by communicating their statutes to the Government. As yet they have persisted in their refusal, upon the ground that in their opinion the laws put in force against them no longer exist. For my part, I ardently hope the Government, before judgment is pronounced by the "tribunal des conflits," will prepare a law on the right of association, which will enable them to sanction such recognized fraternities as have nothing in their statutes contrary to the laws of the country. It cannot be denied that the expulsion of five hundred religious orders, among which are four hundred for women, from their houses will cause dangerous agitation, and will excite religious passions in the highest degree, to the great detriment of public peace and the consolidation of our present institutions.

As I have said, it is not just now the Royalist party who are making the most noise; it is the extreme Radical party, whose hero and chief is the celebrated Rochefort. Since the amnesty he has returned to Paris, where he was welcomed with a frenzied ovation; the mob all but harnessed themselves to his cab. Not a day passes without his presiding over some club, by which he is always enthusiastically greeted. When he arrived he immediately published a morning paper entitled L'Intransigeant ("The Non-compromiser"), in which he overwhelms M. Gambetta with sarcasm, accusing him of being the personification of opportunism—that is to say, of the policy which does not seek to realize at once the democratic programme, deeming it wiser to effect reforms gradually and opportunely. It is truly strange to see any political party taking inopportuneness as a principle of conduct, for until now it had been considered as the surest means of miscarriage for any project of reform. Moreover, the difference between M. Gambetta's party and extreme radicalism rests not only upon the haste needed in carrying out reforms; they differ as to the reforms themselves. M. Gambetta's programme is that of the great majority of Republicans; it is reasonable and aims at progress in all things, but without attacking the fundamental laws of society. The programme of M. Rochefort and his "uncompromising" followers is one of socialistic demagogues, with nothing precise about it, and this very vagueness opens the door to all sorts of folly. His first article was on the rehabilitation of the detestable Commune insurrection of 1871. This is the good news M. Rochefort preaches in our faubourgs, more by his incisive writing than by his speech, for he is no orator, and before a crowd he can only stammer. He is none the less applauded, however.

Whence comes this strange popularity? It arises from two causes—first, from the mortal blows Rochefort dealt Napoleon III., then at the height of his power, in the famous pamphlet La Lanterne, and subsequently to the aureole of the proscribed bold fugitive from New Caledonia. The people of the faubourgs do not enquire whether this proscription was not in its day the just condemnation of the courtier of the Commune, who excited it in his journal to every excess which did not involve the effusion of blood. It must also be acknowledged that Rochefort pleases the workmen of our faubourgs by a certain personal similarity of character. This descendant of the Comtes de Rochefort, aristocratic in his tastes and habits, is by the nature of his intellect a real Parisian gamin; he has their inexhaustible buffoonery, sportive spirit, broad sayings, and impertinent mockery. He produces the effect of a real clown amusing a theatre by his gambols and grimaces. He has thus become, as formerly the Duc de Beaufort during the Fronde, king of the Halles. He will not long remain so, for this kind of work soon uses a man up. Moreover, he has not the strength to contend against Gambetta, as we shall soon see when the lion shakes his mane and sends forth a powerful roar. The French people are too intelligent to approve for long of the great tribune, who personified patriotism during the war, being compared to the perjurer of the 2d of December and the vanquished of Sedan. Rochefort can only hope to please the excessive radicals, but to continue in that vein he must always be ahead of them. Now, in this steeple-chase of revolutionary folly one is certain to be surpassed. At the very moment Rochefort and his friends believed themselves in the vanguard a Communist congress was held at Paris to excommunicate them as vile citizens and unworthy confederates. It is true that one of the programmes unfolded at this congress consisted of but two articles: first, petroleum; second, nitrate of potassium. All these insanities, by being circulated in theory, have the effect of destroying each other. The present moderately republican government having done everything this year to further the material interests of the country, which was never more prosperous, and to reform and ameliorate all branches of public instruction, can present itself fearlessly before the electors of the Councils-General, now about to meet, and will no doubt receive from them a signal confirmation of their policy.

É.

GERMANY AND THE POPE.—I.

BERLIN, July, 1880.

WITH the adjournment of the Prussian Diet and the closing of the Berlin Conference we have entered upon our dull season. Court and courtiers, cabinet ministers and deputies, privy councillors and judges, all have shaken off the dust of the capital and retreated to the sea and the mountains to gather strength for the recommencement of their up-hill work in the fall.

While the success of the diplomatic achievements depends on their acceptance by Turkey, which at present is more than doubtful, the meeting of the foreign diplomatists is already forgotten, as if it had taken place years ago; but the new bill, popularly known as the Canossa Bill, which became a law on July 14, still stands in the foreground of public interest and debate. Instead of finding a quiet corner in the statute-book, it is now argued about and reviewed by all political parties. Although the original draft of the bill was so much amended that in its present shape it is nearly harmless, the circumstances under and views with which it was submitted to the Diet mark an important epoch in our political history. This law was a great political blunder. At a moment when all the resources of our bitterest foe had been exhausted, when France and Belgium appeared on the scene to join us in the battle, it stopped the struggle with Rome, and offered a peace which had been disdainfully rejected by the same adversary for whose benefit it is alleged to have been proposed. Bismarck, it is true, has not yet "gone to Canossa," but he has taken the train for that station. In one word, we are parting with a policy which, when initiated in 1872, was hailed by the great majority of the nation as the harbinger of Germany's firm and final resolution to have done once for all with Roman arrogance, usurpation, and encroachment upon the sovereignty of the Empire.

Several influences have brought about this change. They can partly be traced to court circles. The Emperor is growing older and weaker in mind. His wife, who has always been a fierce opponent of Falk's manly attitude towards Rome, has lately acquired greater influence over her husband. The old gentleman wishes to die in peace with all his subjects, and particularly cherishes the idea of celebrating the completion of the Cologne Cathedral this fall with all the royal and clerical paraphernalia—the archbishop, of course, included. This archbishop, however, for disobedience to the laws, has been sentenced to be deposed, and has taken refuge in Holland. He, therefore, must be recalled and re-established to enable him to assist officially at the festivities. Personal considerations, however, would not amount to much if they did not meet Bismarck's policy half-way, who, as always, is also in this matter the moving and leading spirit. The motives which he gave for bringing in this bill were, in the first place, to fill about a thousand vacancies created by the former removal and deposition of disobedient ministers, parsons, and curates, and thus do away with a state of distress deeply felt by the Catholic population; and, secondly, to prove to the Pope by deeds his conciliatory spirit. In fact, however, Bismarck either wanted to annihilate or to win over to himself the Ultramontanes of the German Reichstag and Prussian Diet. Since the summer of 1878, when he first instituted his protective policy, he has been looking out for a parliamentary party strong enough to carry through his measures. Having abandoned the Liberals he had to rely on the alliance of the Conservatives and the clericals. The latter, by forcing through the Reichstag the Chancellor's tariff bill, had proved a very useful tool in his hands, but they refused to follow his banner indiscriminately, and asked to be rewarded for their services. Bismarck, however, did not see fit to comply with their demands, and bitterly attacked them in the Reichstag. This time he changed his tactics and tried to catch them by holding out the prospect of burying the Kulturkampf, which, had he succeeded, would, of course, have given him more strength at home and abroad; but Rome and its German followers did not swallow the bait.

The history of the transaction can be given in a few words: Leo XIII., in a letter addressed (February 24) to the deposed Archbishop of Cologne, had declared that, although he could not acquiesce in the Prussian laws, he was willing to tolerate at least some of their provisions—for instance, to allow the bishops to comply with the one duty imposed upon them by our Government, viz., to report the names of candidates for clerical appointments (Anzeige-Pflicht). The Pope could the sooner submit to this portion of the Prussian law as in smaller German states—for instance, in Oldenburg, Würtemberg, and others—he had never objected to and still practically acknowledges it. When, however, on March 17, 1880, the Prussian Cabinet solemnly declared that, provided Leo would bind himself to instruct the Prussian bishops to inform the Government of their appointees, it would moderate the Falk Laws, the Pope at first hung back and at last haughtily rejected this demand. Nevertheless, on May 19, the Prussian Government introduced its so-called Canossa Bill in the Diet, thus sacrificing the essential principles of the legislation of 1873, while the Pope, by withdrawing his private assent, declared that the Curia would have nothing to do with the Falk laws, and threatened any Catholic deputy who should vote for the Government with major excommunication. In ordinary life, the man who gives up the claims on the strength of which he opened hostilities, and pleads for peace, is considered as having succumbed and been beaten. Here the whole Protestant world looked at the question from the same point of view, and, with the exception, perhaps, of a few state officials, could not understand why the Government yielded to a Pope who not only rejected its offers but also insisted on the maintenance of his old ground. Every independent man wanted to have the Catholic clergy unconditionally subjected to the laws of the country before negotiations should be entered into, and this was the right way to look at the question.

The Diet struck out the most obnoxious features of the bill and did much to make the defeat of the Government appear less overwhelming; but it was rather the introduction of the bill itself at the present time than the several provisions of the bill which constituted the Government's defeat. The law was finally adopted by only 206 against 202 votes. The majority consisted of the Conservatives of all shades and 49 National-Liberals, while the minority was represented by the undivided Progress party, the whole Centre, and 44 National-Liberals. The latter, therefore, who in the beginning denounced the bill as outrageous, are responsible for its passage. The National-Liberal party, which under Twesten, Forckenbeck, Lasker, Braun, Bamberger, and others for more than fourteen years was the leading parliamentary factor, and to whose influence the country is chiefly indebted for all that is liberal and progressive in the new laws and constitution, has lately, under the leadership of Bennigsen and Miguel, become a too obedient tool of Bismarck. The more he kicks that party the more ardent they become in their devotion and subserviency. When the Chancellor introduces a new reactionary measure in open contrast to his former policy they support it, in order, as they say, to deprive the Centre of the chance of joining the Conservatives. Thus Bismarck has so far regularly played a double game, and by appealing to the National-Liberals in case of need has always gained his point. This time the party justified its yielding to Bismarck's pressure by the same shallow pretexts of compromise, and even declared that although they did not know where the Government was going to lead them, they would nevertheless follow its wise policy. This piece of masterly logic reminds one of the deputy who, hailing from some German Buncombe, once said: "I do not know the Government's views and tendencies, and therefore approve of them." It is of no great importance that the National-Liberals have committed suicide, as other and wiser men of less compromising propensities will and must occupy their places, but their great fault is that by pushing a bad law through the House they have only thrown new obstacles in the road to peace.

Practically, even the law may turn out rather innocent, as its principal features are limited to a short period—viz., to January 1, 1882—and as the Roman clergy in their present haughtiness will, like the Centre, scorn to avail themselves of the benefits offered. It is, on the whole, rather irrelevant whether some Catholic orders and associations for nursing the sick shall extend the field of their usefulness, and whether the priests who are regularly appointed shall henceforth be authorized to administer the holy sacraments to the inhabitants of those parishes which by legal sentence have lost their disobedient curates. It is even more correct, and in keeping with the canon law, that bishops and clergymen in future cannot be removed by the Government, but only be declared unfit to occupy any official position, although this article is of no practical value, for the simple reason that such proceedings are no longer pending. The most important concession of the law, therefore, in my eyes, consists in the permission granted to German clergymen to be educated in institutions of learning over which the Prussian Government has no control, and over which the Jesuits preside. The Government even went so far as to dispense with the oath of allegiance on the part of the clergy, and held out to them a prospect of getting their forfeited salary paid before they had acknowledged the supremacy of the laws of the land. The most obnoxious provision of the original bill, however, was article four, which was rejected by a large majority, including part of the Conservatives, and which granted pardon and return of the bishops before they had solemnly asked forgiveness for their past offences, and promised obedience for the future.

The Ultramontanes are, therefore, perfectly right in considering the but partial success of the measure as a defeat of the Government. They are now holding meetings in all the large cities where they command a majority and praising the policy of the Centre, and insisting upon the divine right of the Church, according to which the control of the schools does not belong to the state. The Falk laws, they declare, are shattered to their foundations, and must be totally abolished; and they consider it the duty of the Government to make peace with the Church at once by giving up its worldly presumptions, and by "reinstating the clergy in its old liberties and inalienable rights." Compliance with these demands on the part of the Government would virtually amount to nothing less than absolute surrender. By the introduction of that lamentable law the hopes and claims of the irreconcilable Ultramontane party have reached such a height that they will double their resistance, and that it will daily become more impossible to arrive at a modus vivendi.

Bismarck, for the present, if I am not mistaken in his character, will make his defeat the occasion for letting the Ultramontanes feel his anger more than ever before; but against his will influences already make themselves felt which as yet work clandestinely, but will in time publicly appear. It is the ultra-orthodox Protestant and Conservative party which, supported by the powerful assistance of members of court circles, is looking out for an alliance with the Catholic clergy, and is preparing for action behind the scenes. Puttkamer, the present Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, is a man as weak as he is frivolous. To-day a tool in the hands of Bismarck, he will to-morrow execute the orders of the court clique, or try to combine the wishes of both. The other day the Reichsanzeiger (the official organ), among new appointments, recorded that a Mr. de la Croix had been given the highest position under Puttkamer. This De la Croix, a mere creature of the "Ober-Kirchenrath," is one of the captains of the campaign which, in the next Reichstag, will be initiated by attacks on the civil-marriage bill, "a work of the devil," as our high-churchmen are wont to characterize it. The death of the Emperor, or some other untoward event, may postpone this clerical scheme, but cannot frustrate the attempt. The German Empire will never be firmly established on a solid foundation until it has defeated the combined efforts of Roman and Protestant ultras. For the last thousand years it has been our sad privilege to fight out the religious struggles of mankind. Since the re-establishment of the Empire we are less than ever willing to surrender to religious conspirators those great intellectual conquests and that political freedom which, emanating from the noblest feelings of human nature, were asserted by the sacrifice of the best blood of the country and of untold treasures. Unfortunately, by Bismarck's rather too shrewd and therefore unsuccessful stratagem, we are, after an eight years' struggle, not at the end, but at a new beginning of the old politico-clerical conflict. ? ?

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF CATHERINE DE MÉDICIS.

PARIS, July 23, 1880.

HISTORY is, in one sense, never written, never definitive. The modern historical school is positivist, in so far as it does not indulge in great theories; it looks into the documents of the time, and especially those documents which, not having been made for publication, are thought to be the most sincere. I know the method has its defects; the documents which are now thought the most important, the most genuine, are not necessarily infallible. People can lie in writing as they do in speaking. Original documents are necessarily fragmentary, and it is necessary that the historian should not only accumulate fragments, but that he should reconstruct a whole, as a palæontologist reconstructs a lost organic form from fossil remains. How can the palæontologist do so? Because there is a plan in the creation, because nothing in it is quite arbitrary. If you give to the naturalist a part he can safely reconstruct the whole. No fossil is found in New Zealand or in the Rocky Mountains which does not find, as it were, a place all ready for it in this long and gradual succession which marks the development of the same creative form.

It is so with history: the historian can reconstitute a time, a race, a character out of fragmentary documents, a few treaties, letters, anecdotes, genealogical notes; but he can only do so on one condition—he must be a moralist. He must be a great analyzer of human thought, he must have dived into the dark abyss of human depravity. Documents, as mere documents, are nothing; they are like the uncut stones spread over an area before the building is erected. Give us the architect, the man who will take all these stones and suspend them in the air, and unite them in one great, huge, harmonic whole. We are very apt to mistake the means for the end, and there are now in Germany, France, and England men who love documentary history for its own sake, without any regard for the actors of history or the ends of history. This reaction was a necessity. We have had too many systematic histories written without any regard to facts, often with perverted facts, for the amusement of the mind, for the glorification of some religious or political theory. But there is danger also in the mere accumulation of documents if these are never to be worked out, for the human mind would soon grow tired of historical science if it never gave any satisfaction to its profounder instincts. The most pressing duty is to collect all valuable documents; then comes the duty of classifying them and extracting from them something real, something which has some resemblance to life.

Many years ago we began in France a colossal publication of 'Inedited Documents for the History of France.' In this great collection, which is published by the state, and at its expense, there are some volumes which are not very important; some others of the very highest importance. It will be enough to say that the collection comprises all the known correspondence of Henry IV. (ten volumes quarto), and the enormous correspondence of Richelieu (six volumes quarto). Some volumes are on the point of appearing which contain the correspondence of Catherine de Médicis. The correspondence of Mazarin will, I hope, be published some day, but it is so long that I hardly dare say how many volumes it would fill. The correspondence of Catherine de Médicis was entrusted to M. Hector de la Ferrière, who has written a long preface to his great publication accompanying the first volume, which is printed but not yet distributed. Catherine de Médicis, though Italian—of the great family of the Medici—had a Frenchwoman for her mother, Madeleine de la Tour d'Auvergne. The Italian influence was, however, the strongest in the formation of her character. She was educated at Rome, and was a great favorite of Clement VII., who was her uncle. She learned there the art of dissimulation, in which the Italians of the time were the greatest masters. She was admired in her earliest youth for her calmness and dignity, her power over herself and her emotions. She is said to have fallen in love at Rome with her cousin Ippolito de' Medici, the natural son of Giuliano de' Medici, who was very handsome (Titian has left us his portrait); but the Pope had higher views for her, and gave her to the first king in Christendom, the King of France. She was affianced to the second son of Francis I. Her Roman education explains almost all her life; she always remained in communication with the nuns of a convent where she had spent many hours; she had breathed the artistic air of Florence, of Rome, seen or known the greatest artists the world ever saw, had become a Christian of the Renaissance type, of the Medici and Leo X. type—her Catholicism had a tinge of paganism; she was well disposed towards what were called then the novelties in every sense of the word, but Protestantism could not well suit her in its stern and Puritanic form. It has often been said by historians that Catherine was completely indifferent in matters of religion; that she was an unbeliever, a sceptic; that it was the same to her to go to mass or to aller au prêche; she herself said many things which tended to produce this impression. She was not a theologian, and political necessities as well as personal considerations often inclined her towards some of the Protestant leaders; but instinct is stronger than everything, and after having read many documents of the time, I have no doubt that she remained throughout a Roman, if not a Roman Catholic; that she liked what was called the old religion, if she did not much care about its dogmas. She had a strong leaning towards some of the Protestants, not towards Protestantism. The Protestant leaders whom she knew and liked were men like Soubise, the first gentlemen in the country; she was fond of poetry and literature, and in the beginning Marot was on the side of the Protestants as well as the learned bishops of the kingdom.

Catherine was almost a child in years when she arrived in France; but her character was completely formed—she had all the precocity of her race. She was married at Marseilles by Clement VII. himself, who gave the ring to the young couple. The Duchess of Orleans (such became her name) wore a crown so laden with diamonds that it was "worth a kingdom," to use the words of a contemporary. Her pearls were the finest known in the world; she afterwards made a necklace of them, which she gave to Queen Mary Stuart, and they finally came into the possession of Queen Elizabeth. Splendid presents were exchanged at Marseilles, for Francis I. would be surpassed by nobody in generosity. When the dower of Catherine was counted in the hands of the French treasurer-general, "It is larger than it appears," said Philip Strozzi; "you forget three jewels which are added to it: Milan, Genoa, and Naples." Francis I. had his mind always turned toward Italy, and the alliance with the Medici family was a card in his play against the house of Spain. As France did not much like the perpetual wars on the other side of the Alps, the young Italian princess was coldly received by the people. The first years which Catherine spent in France were not happy. She lost her beloved uncle, the pope; she lost her cousin, whom she had loved, who had gone with her as far as Marseilles, and who had proudly refused the presents of Francis I. She was living as a stranger at the French court—very reticent, very silent. Nobody cared much for her except the astute Charles V. "Write to me," says he to his ambassador, "what sort of treatment is shown the Duchess of Orleans; what people she has with her; if they have as much credit and receive as much respect as they did in the time of Pope Clement VII. . . . Write to me all you can hear about her." Charles V. had wished to marry Catherine to Francis Sforza, the Duke of Milan.

The death of the dauphin suddenly justified the curiosity of Charles V., as Catherine was now the future queen of France. She had very carefully put herself in the good graces of the king. Her own husband, who was now the dauphin, neglected her; he was under the influence of the famous Diane de Poitiers. Catherine understood fully the character of Francis. The king was in the habit of being adored; he was like a spoiled child; he had been everything at first to his mother, Louise of Savoy; he was the idol of his sister, Margaret of Angoulême, the most charming and learned princess of her time. Catherine became the intimate of the old king; she amused him with Italian manuscripts, Italian poets; she rode with him, hunted with him. "She never left the king," says Brantôme, her great admirer, "and always could follow him, as she was a very good rider and very bold, and had a good seat, having been the first to put her leg on the saddle" (before her, ladies had what was called a planchette). But Catherine had no child, and for many years it was thought that she could give no heir to the crown. Diane de Poitiers even advised the dauphin to repudiate her. Francis, fond as he was of the young Italian princess, had some thoughts of a divorce. After a few years Catherine had her first child, and her position became more assured. From that moment she changed her manner; the old king died, and Catherine became the Queen of France.

She had a rival, and a most insolent rival, in the person of Diane de Poitiers. Diane was, in fact, the real queen; Henry II. could refuse nothing to her. Wherever the court went all eyes were drawn to the famous Diane much more than to Catherine; she received the presents of the cities. At the ceremony of the entrance into Lyons, for instance—Lyons, which owed so much to the Medici, seemed to forget Catherine. A forest was improvised at the gate of the city, and out of it came a Diana with a silver crescent, with a black gown, spread with silver stars, followed by nymphs who held young dogs with leashes of black and white silk, the colors of the king. The fine bindings of Henry II., kept at the National Library, show us everywhere the crescent of Diana; it is seen everywhere on the Louvre. Diane was the acknowledged sovereign. She was in communication with all the courts, with Charles V., with the Pope. Old as she was now, her charm was irresistible. She interested the king in great constructions, in the adornment of Anet. She received enormous sums of money, and the legitimate queen was reduced to a slender portion. We have the accounts of Catherine's expenses, kept with the greatest care. In the year 1558, for instance, the receipts amount to 57,421 livres, the expenses to 59,331; nothing is omitted. Catherine had the expensive tastes of her race, but she could not yet indulge them; she had also the orderly habits of a family of "mercanti."

Henry II. was a good father, if he was not a good husband. Catherine gave him now a child every year, leading the life of a nurse, and her correspondence is full of small medical details about the children. She had no other means for preserving, in a certain degree, the cold affection of the king. She was jealous of her rival, but she shut her eyes. She never acknowledged the Duchess of Valentinois as the mistress of the king. She lived with her in apparent ignorance. "She is wise and prudent," says the Venetian Contarini; "no doubt she is fit to govern." There is no doubt that she hated Diane with a bitter hatred, so much so that afterwards she would not even look at Anet, the place adorned by Diane; but she concealed her feelings as long as Henry II. lived. Her dissimulation was, so to speak, intense and farseeing. "Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare." If this axiom be true, she was well-prepared to rule when Henry II. fell accidentally in a tournament. What were her sentiments towards Henry? It would be difficult to say. Her manifestations of sorrow when he died were rather too dramatic. She took for her device with a mountain of chalk, on which drops of water fall. Everywhere she had embroidered trophies, broken glasses, broken chains, and so on. These symbols were the fashion of the time. She never left off her mourning, and she had also for device a broken lance, with these words:

"Ardorem extinctâ testantur vivere flammâ,"

"Lacrymæ hinc, hinc dolor."

We must observe her now as a queen, coming to an almost absolute power after years of dissimulation, of a careful study of men and things; with no profound sentiment except her maternal love, which was ardent; selfish in so far as the rule of her children was her own rule; despotic—sincere at the same time, as maternal love always is. She cared not for France; she cared more for the Catholic religion; she cared chiefly for her race and for the race to which she was allied—for the Medici and the Valois.

THE MOMMSEN TRIBUTE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I see with interest, in the letter of one of your correspondents, a proposal to start a subscription to be sent to Professor Mommsen in token of the sympathy of some Americans in his great loss. I am one of those who earnestly hope such a scheme may be carried out, and that in doing so modest sums may not be despised, for those are all that many of us can give.

THE DE GOLYER BUSINESS ONCE MORE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your defence of Garfield's De Golyer transaction you lay stress on the assertions that "the money to pay for this work was not to come from appropriations by Congress," that "it seems impossible that it could have been contemplated . . . that appropriations would be asked from Congress," and that "no appropriation by Congress could have been in contemplation." It is very natural that so much stress should be laid on this point in a defence of Garfield, because, if true, it is of momentous importance to his case. But is it true? Is it not the fact that all of the De Golyer pavement laid in front of the public buildings (a very important portion of the whole) had to be paid for by an appropriation from Congress, and that such appropriation was afterwards actually made upon the recommendation of Garfield's Appropriation Committee? If this was the case, it would fully account for the exultation shown in the letters written by the chief agent of the De Golyer paving job when he had secured the influence of Garfield.

Let us suppose, however, that you are right on this point, and then see how the case stands for Garfield. The admitted facts are that he accepted a payment of five thousand dollars for advocating a corrupt job. That the job was corrupt is not only admitted by its promoters, but is obvious from the terms on which the contracts were let. As you say, the Board of Works fixed in advance the prices (admittedly exorbitant) which they would pay for the different kinds of pavement, and the only question was which kinds should be used at the fixed prices. You seem to think that, because this condition applied equally to all the different kinds of pavement, it shows that the "impression that there was something fraudulent" in the De Golyer contract is "wholly without foundation." This is a most astounding inference. To my mind, the fact that this rotten plan was to be applied to all the contracts does nothing toward relieving the De Golyer contract of the taint of fraud. It merely shows that the entire scheme was so framed as to rob the District of Columbia and the United States Government. It is obvious that in order to avoid what an honest Board would have desired, namely, such competition as would give the best pavements at the lowest price, this Board took the plainly fraudulent course of fixing the prices in advance, and fixing them, too, at figures so high as to allow ample margin for "commissions," "fees," and "divvies." But it is a waste of time and words to argue as to the fraudulent nature of the De Golyer contract, since its corrupt character has been publicly admitted by its promoters.

The De Golyer job, then, was unquestionably corrupt, and Garfield's exertions in its favor were secured by the payment of $5,000. If he could not discover its fraudulent character by a mere inspection of the terms of award, it seems to me that the only conclusion is that nature has wholly unfitted him for the transaction of any administrative business.

Now, I am (for the moment) arguing as if Garfield's position on the Appropriation Committee of Congress had nothing to do with the case. I will therefore confine myself to the enquiry, In what capacity did he advocate the job—as a lawyer, or as a public man of influence? What he did in the premises was to write a "brief" (at least, so he swore; but when cross-examined by the Committee he betrayed grave doubts respecting the "brief") and to confer with "Boss Shepherd," asking him "to give those Western men a chance." Now, these were not legal services, for, as you say, the question was wholly as to the merits of the pavement, which was not a legal question; and, as there were no professional legal services in the case, it only remains to ask what proper services were there which Garfield rendered, or could render, consistently with an honorable record. The answer seems to me plain. A man in Garfield's position as chairman of the Appropriation Committee of the House of Representatives could not decently accept a fee for advocating any paving job before a local board; he could not decently ask Shepherd to "give those Western men a chance"; he could not decently accept a heavy fee for such a service. When the employment was proposed to him he should have said at once that the question of the merits of pavements was a matter to be determined by experts and engineers—not by "briefs" and interviews with bosses; and, as I have previously said, one glance at the terms of award would show him that the question was not to be settled on the usual basis of an open competition to determine who would give the public the best work at the lowest price, but that things were arranged on the unheard-of system of fixing a high price in advance, and leaving it to the conscience of the Board to determine who should be permitted to "pick out the plums." If Garfield did not discover this at first glance (as he should have done, if fit to be a public officer) he must have found out how it was before the time when he asked Shepherd to "give those Western men a chance," and before he took his enormous fee for this discreditable service.

By the bye, what does your article mean by speaking of "the hearing before the Board as to the merits of these various patents," Garfield's being retained "as attorney to argue the merits," and his making "his presentation of the case to the Board"? Such phrases would lead your readers to suppose that Garfield took a regular legal retainer as a lawyer for a lawyer's argument before a board; whereas the service was not a legal one, there was no argument or presentation of the case to the Board, and when Garfield was pressed before the Committee by the enquiry whether there was even a "brief" filed, he replied that he "could not say there was." The only proved service was the conversation with "Boss Shepherd" to which I have referred before. Surely the words I have quoted above in this paragraph, from your article, are calculated to give a very false impression.

I have now been arguing on the supposition that you are right in asserting that "no appropriation from Congress could have been in contemplation"; but the admissions of the promoters of the De Golyer job, in the suit brought against them by Chittenden, prove that they did have in contemplation an appropriation from Congress at the time that they retained the services of Garfield, and that it was with the view to such appropriation that his services to them were secured. Is it not likewise true that Garfield, on his examination before the Committee, at first rested on your ground, that there was no appropriation—the job being all paid for by local assessments; but afterwards, on cross-examination, was forced to admit that there was a large appropriation? If it be true that he made these two contradictory statements, much light is thrown on this whole business, and also on the conflict of testimony in the Crédit-Mobilier transaction, and I am at a loss to know how he can find a defender in your editorial columns.

Critic.

[Congress appropriated money to pay the assessment imposed on the United States, in common with all other property-holders in the City of Washington, for the cost of the pavement in front of its own buildings. It does this in every city in the Union. In other words, it appropriated the money not as a legislature but as a taxpayer. This was a necessary and legal consequence of its having, by the act of February, 1871, turned over the "legislative power and authority" in the District to the Legislative Assembly of the District. An appropriation to pay the taxes imposed on United States property, in common with other property, was a matter of course. "Garfield's Appropriation Committee," therefore, recommended the appropriation as properly and naturally as it recommended an appropriation to pay for the gas consumed in the Capitol. It could not have avoided doing so without swindling the other taxpayers. Who was to pay for the pavement in front of the public buildings if not the United States? The "exultation of the chief agent in the De Golyer paving job" cannot, then, have been due to his expectation that Congress would pay its share of the municipal taxes. It must have been due to his expectation that it would pay more than its share some time or other. The only question which concerns us here is whether General Garfield, when he took his fee, knew that the "chief agent" entertained this expectation, and furnished him with any reason for entertaining it. There is not a particle of proof of this.

We have already, in commenting on General Garfield's action in the matter, admitted his great indiscretion in taking the De Golyer fee, and in not perceiving the objections to the De Golyer contract. Our correspondent maintains that even if he was only indiscreet his indiscretion was so great as to show his unfitness for high administrative office. To which we reply that our correspondent judges the Board of Works and its doings by the aid of what somebody has called "hindsight," which is a good thing, but cannot for a moment be compared to foresight. General Garfield doubtless sees his folly to-day as clearly as "Critic" sees it, and has as sound a judgment with regard to all rascalities, like those of the District, which have been fully exposed. As to his taking a large fee for work which was not in his line, we have condemned this too in strong terms. But we are bound to add, in palliation of the offence, that, according to our experience of human nature, lawyers, even the acutest, are not usually alarmed by the offer of a tolerably large fee. We are not now speaking of enormous fees, such as Fisk paid in his railroad litigation. The ordinary effect of a promise of a good fee for services, even in a field in which a man is not an expert, is to tickle his self-love. Instead of being startled by it, and looking on it as an attempt to corrupt him, he is apt to think it a gratifying acknowledgment of his remarkable capacity. Consequently, there is a great deal more perspicacity available for criticism of other people's fees than for that of one's own. The difference between our position and "Critic's" lies mainly in the fact that he thinks that by showing that De Golyer was a bad man and his wickedness very plain, he proves that General Garfield, in advocating the adoption of his contract, became his confederate. We, on the other hand, acknowledge that General Garfield was very indiscreet indeed, but in judging him take into account that he had to rely on foresight while we have the benefit of hindsight, and that the fee was large enough to flatter but not large enough to frighten a man of ordinary self-esteem. But this is not all. Where two explanations of a wrongful act are possible, we hold that we must, in trying to get at the motives of the doer, take his previous character into account. If General Garfield were knowingly corrupt in the De Golyer case, is it likely that this would be the only charge of the kind that could be made against him? As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he must have been exposed to constant temptation. Hundreds besides the "chief agent" must, during the whole of his Congressional career, have been very eager to secure his favor for scores of doubtful schemes and very willing to secure it by payment of heavy fees. If General Garfield were the kind of man "Critic" would have us believe he is, does any one suppose that the De Golyer charge would possess the value for his enemies that it now possesses; that there would not be a dozen such; that he would not have been known throughout the Union long ago as a purchasable person; that he would not now be rich instead of poor; and that there would not be fifty speculators boasting that they "owned" him? We do not desire to strain a point in his favor because he is a Presidential candidate whom we wish to see elected; but we insist that a Presidential candidate is entitled to the benefit of such rules of probability as we apply to the conduct of men in private life.—Ed. Nation.]

REPUBLICAN THREATS OF REBELLION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Despite the condonement of the fraud of 1877 by the Nation, and the attempt to rehabilitate the badly-damaged character of candidate Garfield, there are still some of us—Independent voters now, but steady-going Republicans up to the election of 1868—who are still convinced not only that it is not our duty to vote the Republican ticket in November next, but to vote the Democratic, and that despite the fact that we are cordially in accord with the Nation in not hankering after another professional soldier for President. As a slight hint as to the reason why of the determination of very many Independents hereabouts to vote the Democratic ticket next November, I enclose for your candid consideration the following editorial from yesterday's Evening Bulletin, and respectfully commend to your notice the concluding paragraph. The editor of the Nation knows as well as I do that this fairly represents the temper of a very considerable and very influential portion of the Republican party. The event of 1876-77 furnishes abundant evidence on this point.—Very respectfully,

J. B. S.

Philadelphia, August 11, 1880.

[The following is the paragraph from the Bulletin to which our correspondent refers:

"11. Finally, can any intelligent man seriously suppose that the majority of the people of this country, the people of the great Northern communities, who not only have their business interests at stake, but who desire that the liberties of their country shall be preserved for their children, are going to submit quietly and tamely while Southern Democrats secure their hold of power by carrying successive elections through disfranchisement of the whole mass of Republicans in the South? That, after all, is the great question. It will be an amazing manifestation of self-control if the Republicans in the North shall accept the result of the very first election which shall secure a fraudulent victory to the Democratic party through 138 Southern electoral votes. But repetition of such a crime, which will surely come if the first attempt is successful, will probably plunge this nation into a fierce struggle which will differ from the last in this: the South will wield the authority of the Government, and we shall be the rebels."

We agree entirely with our correspondent in condemning these threats of rebellion and armed violence in which a portion of the Republican party occasionally indulge, and have for some time indulged, with regard to the Presidential election. Nothing can be more useful to the Democrats. They were helped greatly by the Republican predictions so freely uttered during the Grant "boom" that General Grant would, if not satisfied with the Congressional count of the votes, revise it himself, and then, if he awarded himself the Presidency, seize it by force. But, on the other hand, we presume that there is no Independent who denies the perpetration of enormous frauds at the Southern elections; and the first question which every real Independent ought to ask himself about them is not, "How shall I best show the disgust with which the nonsense talked about these frauds by Republican organs fills me?" but "How shall I most effectively contribute to their rational and peaceful prevention?" To vote for the Democratic candidate, it seems to us, according to such light as we now have, is to vote for a party which either denies the existence of the frauds altogether or proposes to do nothing about them, and even to live on them, and which, at all events, totally ignores them in its authorized utterances. We are far from liking the spirit in which a great many Republicans treat them, or the means by which they propose to remedy them; but it is quite plain to us that it is in the Republican party only that any sober and rational discussion of them now goes on, or in which there seems to be any chance at present for some legal treatment of them. For instance, we should go to General Garfield with a statement of the horrible dilemma in which we have placed the Southern whites, with strong confidence that we could get him to look at both sides of the question, and make some impression on him as to the necessity of approaching it, not with guns and drums, but with the same instruments of statesmanship by which all the great pacifications of history have been effected. We think it likely that we could get him to laugh over the Stalwart theory that there is no use in trying statesmanship on the Southern malcontents, because they are such bad men. He is probably familiar with the story of the Irish priest who, deploring the wickedness of his flock, and being asked if he had tried the Gospel on them, answered that he wasn't going to "waste good Gospel on the likes of 'em." We feel that this confidence is justified by what we know of his training, experience, and habits of thought. But we have no such confidence with regard to General Hancock. We fear he would meet us with some gaudy generality about "State rights," and "divided powers," and habeas corpus, and trial by jury, and other little rudiments of politics. We should expect to fare still worse with the great lights who do the political thinking of his party. We cannot recall at this moment a single attempt on the Democratic side to provide by legislation for the fact that the negroes are now free, very ignorant, and liable to great oppression. We do not ask that such an attempt should be what we like or could commend, but simply that it should furnish evidence of interest in the subject, and of a desire to reduce the mischief caused at the South by the presence on the soil of a large population in a state of physical and moral degradation. We can see very well, for instance, why the party should be opposed to negro suffrage; but the failure to suggest or show any concern about other means of furnishing that protection and education which most respectable advocates of negro suffrage expected from it, is a sign of fatal weakness or inadequacy.—ED. NATION.]

MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The points made by "B. T. J.," on p. 93 of the Nation of August 5, will doubtless take more prominence in the pending canvass than their real importance entitles them to. Two or three things may help your readers to make a just estimate of them.

In the matter of General Hancock and Mrs. Surratt, it will be remembered that on the 3d of March, 1863, Congress passed an act in reference to the writ of habeas corpus, which also prescribed the powers and duties of various officers in the premises, intended to protect the rights of subjects in the cases of otherwise arbitrary arrests. The first section authorized the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in any case throughout the United States. The fourth section made his order a sufficient justification in all the courts where an arrest made under it was called in question (12 U. S. Stats. p. 755).

On the 15th of September, 1863, the President issued his proclamation suspending the writ in all cases where military, naval, or civil officers of the United States by the authority of the President held persons in custody as prisoners of war, spies, aiders and abettors of the enemy, or officers, soldiers, or seamen of the United States, or deserters therefrom, or amenable to military law or the rules and articles of war or regulations made by authority of the President, or for resisting a draft, or for any other offence against the military or naval service (13 U. S. Stats. p. 734).

On the morning of the day for the execution of Mrs. Surratt and others Judge Wylie, one of the supreme judges of the District of Columbia, allowed a writ of habeas corpus to issue to General Hancock, commander of the department, including the District of Columbia (with his headquarters at Washington), commanding him to produce the body of Mrs. Surratt, with the cause of her detention, forthwith before him. The writ was served on the general at eight o'clock A.M. His return shows an order (the original) of the President of the United States of that same day suspending the writ of habeas corpus in that case, and having the signature of the President thereto. Those who have examined the handwriting of the body of this order say that it is the same as that of the report to the President of the execution and other papers, thus showing that it was written at the general's headquarters. Passing that by, the time of the service of the writ and the date of the President's order are conclusive that when the general was served with the writ, instead of obeying it he procured a suspension of the writ itself. That the proclamation of September 15, 1863, did not suspend it in this case is obvious, and so it was holden both by the judge who issued it in this case, the general to whom it was issued, and the President and his advisers who suspended it. That the Executive did not make the order till the necessity for it to ensure the execution of the condemned arose, is perfectly apparent.

In reference to General Garfield, it should be remembered also that the second and third sections of the act above referred to required the Secretaries of War and State to furnish lists of the names of all persons held in arrest under their orders and the causes of arrest, so that judicial action could be had in their cases. It may also be recalled that the "old Capitol" and the "Carroll Row" had been turned into prisons and were crowded with inmates arrested and held by the order of the Secretary of War in disregard of these provisions of the law; that during the first term of General Garfield's service in Congress a resolution was by arrangement referred to his committee (the military) authorizing an investigation of the arrests, causes therefor, and the reasons why charges and trials were delayed. Garfield, accompanied by Schenck, the chairman of the committee, made a personal examination of the prisons and prisoners and found ample cause for a searching enquiry, which was entered upon with vigor. This was in January, 1865; a day or two later a similar resolution was referred to the same committee, enlarging its powers. During the day of its reference Thaddeus Stevens moved to rescind it, and a debate arose, pending which Mr. Garfield entered the House and took a decisive part in it. The information secured by his personal interview with the prisoners enabled him to do this. He related in his speech the story of a Union colonel, wounded at the second battle of Bull Run, who had been imprisoned five months on no charge. On his motion the resolution to rescind was tabled. This action of the House, and Garfield's bold condemnation of the course pursued, produced an immediate correction of the abuses. His course also led to his appearance in the Milligan case, for which not even the thanks of the liberated ever reached him, but plenty of Republican denunciation instead.

As to the later military commissions, they were directly authorized by act of Congress, while the former were without color of law, and in violation of its spirit and intent. This, as it seems to me, is an important distinction to be kept in mind. The United States elected, in the interest of humanity, to regard the civil as a public war, governed by the laws and usages of war. The rebels were enemies to be dealt with as such. The war ended with their entire subjugation and conquest. There was no treaty of peace, no party was left to negotiate a treaty. The enemy was subdued, and his territory held by conquest. His laws, institutions, and usages subsisted only at the will of the conqueror. All the points and questions involved in this summary have been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States. Among the numerous cases see the Am. Ins. Case, 1 Peters, 511; Brig Warwick, et al., 2 Black, 635; the Venice, 2 Wallace, 258; the Grapeshot, 9 id., 129; Miller v. The United States, 11 id., 268; Tyler v. Defrees, 11 id., 331; M. & T. Bank v. U. Bank, 22 id., 276, and many others. In this condition of things Congress, under the Constitution as expounded by Chief-Justice Marshall in the first of the above cases, passed the act of March 2, 1867, establishing the military governments in the conquered territory. The measure was at the time wise and judicious, so far as the thing government was concerned. There did not then exist the factors or conditions for any other so good. The mistake was in not continuing those governments longer. Under them, through the South generally, life and property were better protected than they have been at any time since. This act did authorize military commissions. There were then many portions of the unhappy country placed under these military governments where those tribunals furnished better facilities for obtaining redress than can now be found in them, or than have at any time since then administered what by fiction of law is called justice in some sections of the South. The times and conditions to which reference is made were abnormal; and, while we deplore them, would it not be wise and just to assume that the two distinguished men mentioned by your correspondent dealt with them, each in his sphere, honestly, under the best light he had? I am sure there is elevation and nobleness enough in their characters and conduct to lift this canvass above the ordinary level of our politics. R.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM AGITATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue for August 5 a correspondent, "F. G. S.," makes a suggestion well worth considering, and which the friends of civil-service reform especially should not let pass unheeded. I mean the idea of a society to agitate the subject, similar to the Loyal Publication Society during the war. I have for some time looked in vain for steps toward organizing such a body, taken by the leaders in the reform movement, and hope for the sake of the cause that something practical may come of the present consideration of the subject.

One needs only to make this topic a subject of general conversation with men of all classes to notice the amazing ignorance, prejudice, and indifference which prevail universally on a question of such vital importance. The state of the public mind on this subject is indeed a curious example of that American conservatism which, as Mr. Dicey has so well pointed out, out-Herods even that of England on the subject of rectifying any error which has once come to be looked upon as part and parcel of our idolized "Constitution." We have so long been taught to look upon that instrument and the ways of the "Fathers" down to the time of the war as the nearest possible approach to perfection that the common people, and, indeed, all but the shrewdest observers and critics, refuse absolutely to believe that we are in our methods of administration to-day cuddling abuses which for nearly a century have been found intolerable in the most enlightened nations of Europe.

The remedy, and the only remedy, for this state of affairs is education and enlightenment. This, again, can only be accomplished by agitation, political, social, and even religious. I verily believe that the abolition of the "spoils" system in politics will be as great a blessing to our country as the abolition of slavery, and I think, moreover, that civil-service reformers can take many valuable hints from the methods of the Abolitionists. Like these, we should put the argument entirely on the question of abstract moral right; there should be no considerations of expediency beyond this, that it is expedient because it is right that both parties should be compelled to make the introduction of the merit system a part of their programme. The evils of the old system and the benefits of the new have been ably and lucidly set forth by Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, in his recent work on the civil service in Great Britain; this work would itself be a mine of information for the writers of a "Civil-Service Reform Publication Society." Extracts from the reports of the British and American Civil-Service Commissions; statistical statements of the results of the method of competition; the views of our great publicists, Lieber, Woolsey, Madison, Hamilton, etc.—all these would be available subjects for tracts and pamphlets. Besides this, a society of this sort should have an organ, which need not appear more frequently than once in three months, in which all gazetted appointments should be noted and every violation of sound principles denounced and proclaimed. In this, as in most other cases of official abuse, publicity is a tremendous weapon in the hands of reformers. Like the Abolitionists, civil-service reformers would commit errors, and, like them, they would almost be overwhelmed for a time by the abuse, sarcasm, and resistance of the whole race of politicians. As Mr. Curtis says, in his introduction to Mr. Eaton's book: "There is no more startling sign of political demoralization than the craft which turns the follies of reformers into blows at reform"; and this very phenomenon would be of daily occurrence. Two great difficulties are in the way of the successful working of such a central body for the purpose of agitating this subject, but neither seems to me to be insurmountable: the one is the necessity of having men from both parties in the organization, and the difficulty of accomplishing this purpose; the other is the want of money.

As to the first point, the difficulty is both real and apparent. It is my individual opinion, as it is that of the Nation, that in the present Presidential campaign the interests of a thorough, radical, and complete reform will best be subserved by the election of General Garfield. Beyond any doubt there are many honest and zealous reformers who hold an opposite view. How can these two elements be harmonized? It seems to me that there is only one method of accomplishing this. The time before a Presidential election is in some respects the best, in some again the least advantageous, for the establishment of a reform society. The latter will then have most influence, but it must for the time being forego its non-partisan character. Thus, any organization which would be established now would have to take sides in the campaign. It would have to favor either Garfield or Hancock. No doubt it would gain a hearing with great ease. Partisans of both candidates are just now in a receptive state for further reasons why their own party should win. The regular organizations and "Machines"—hostile as they are to the very thought of reform—would nevertheless either offer no resistance, or even aid in the circulation of documents the primary end of which is to gain votes which otherwise might be lost. On the other hand, these very advantages would but serve to discredit the cause in the eyes of the other party, and it would be decried with a shadow of reason as a partisan trick and subterfuge designed to help one candidate. The possibility of overcoming these difficulties would depend entirely upon the tact and evident sincerity of the leaders in the movement. If it be not too late to form a society of the above kind this year, I think the sensible men of both parties will have confidence in Messrs. Curtis, Eaton, Lodge, Woolsey, Sumner, C. F. Adams, Jr., and others whom natural selection would point out as the indispensable leaders, and that their names alone would be a guaranty against a possible perversion of the organization into a partisan "machine." After the election, moreover, large accessions in membership from the Democratic party might be expected.

The second and minor difficulty is the lack of funds. A publication society could not work efficiently with less than $5,000 a year. If the basis of organization, however, be the whole country, with a central committee in New York, and auxiliary organizations in the larger centres of population, it seems to me that there would be little difficulty in acquiring a membership of five thousand or more, whose dues, at the rate of one dollar a year (for which they should be supplied with copies of all publications) would be sufficient for the current expense.

If the above plan be approved, nothing would remain but to organize as soon as possible. If several gentlemen, like those above named, will unite in a call for a preliminary meeting either at New York, Saratoga, or Newport the response would, in my opinion, be hearty and general. Perhaps it might be best, however, to ask all those who are willing to attend such a meeting or to join a society like the one spoken of to send their names and addresses to the Independents' Committee rooms, together with their preference as to locality and time of the preliminary meeting. I will here declare my personal willingness and preference for New York. Trusting many more will respond, I am very truly yours, F. W. H.

Notes.

THE Boston Museum of Fine Arts has resolved to assume for that city the function of our New York Academy by holding annual exhibitions of the works of living American artists. The season selected—the autumn—will not interfere with the New York season. This year the exhibition will be opened on Nov. 9 and close on Dec. 20, and will include both oils and water-colors, as well as drawings and statuary. No contributions will be received which have already been publicly exhibited in Boston, or which arrive later than October 30. Circulars will be sent on application to the Museum. ——The eleventh report of the Massachusetts State Board of Health (now merged in the new State Board of Health, Lunacy, and Charity) contains an index to the whole series of volumes by Francis H. Brown, M.D.——From the office of the American Bookseller is published the Monthly Index to current periodical literature, proceedings of learned societies, and Government publications. Fiction is disregarded. The first number was issued in July. ——Part 3 of vol. iii. of the Collections of the Minnesota Historical Society has just been published, six years after the second and ten years after the first part. It relates largely to the Indians, and contains several obituary notices of deceased missionaries among them.——A tourist's manual of more than ordinary substance is Mr. Franklin B. Hough's 'The Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence' (Syracuse: Davis, Bardeen & Co.) It is divided into an historical and legendary portion, and one consisting of the descriptions of travellers and of historical and statistical writers. In the latter are given the French words and the music of two Canadian boat-songs, but the French is shockingly misprinted, and the author's knowledge of the language is so slight that he denies that the first song has any rhyme. ——Harroun & Bierstadt, 58 Reade Street, send us an artotype, from life, of General Garfield, which is one of the best likenesses of him we have thus far seen. It should help conciliate his opponents.——A handbook of unmistakable utility is Mr. George N. Lamphere's 'United States Government: its Organization and Practical Workings' (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.) Nowhere else can one obtain such a systematic exhibit of the constitution of the several departments of the national administration, with their bureaux and complement of officers and clerks, salaries, etc., etc. As examples of the sort of information to be found in it, we may cite, under the War Department, the list of seventy-nine national cemeteries, the list of military posts, the examination-papers for appointees to the Military Academy, and the requisite personal outfit of a cadet. The work deserves to be kept up by fresh editions in accordance with the latest statistics. The blank space on p. 21 would admit of particulars in regard to the date of passage of the foregoing amendments to the U. S. Constitution.——Trübner & Co. send us 'The Cities and Towns of China,' a gazetteer based on Biot's 'Dictionnaire des Villes Chinoises' (1842). The compiler, Mr. G. M. H. Playfair, of the British Consulate at Foochow, has been obliged to rearrange the original material entirely, in order to make it conform to the orthography he has adopted, which is that of the Pekinese dialect, romanized according to Sir Thomas Wade's system. He has, in order to report the changes of a whole generation, as well as to meet the growing needs of commerce, added a large number of places, and located them as well and as scientifically as he was able—if not by a true latitude and longitude, by such a determination as will guide one who consults a map. Each town has its name given in the Chinese character, together with its different names under the several dynasties, with abundant cross-references from the alphabetical order. Particulars as to population, etc., are, of course, wanting. Under each province is given a list of its administrative cities, and, finally, there is a radical index.——L. W. Schmidt has received Part II. of Stacke's 'Deutsche Geschichte,' which we noticed last week. The history is here brought down to the end of the twelfth century. Our expectations in regard to the sustained interest of the illustrations have not been disappointed. They are of the same general character as those already described, with perhaps a larger admixture of royal effigies, seals, coins, etc., and a decided increase in the number of illuminated plates and of colored initial-letters—the latter of singular beauty and delicacy.

—By an act passed last June the Legislature of this State appropriated twenty thousand dollars annually, for two years, for a State experiment-station, for "the purpose of promoting agriculture in its various branches by scientific investigation and experiment." The question of the location of the station is in the hands of a board of control, which will appoint a director also and oversee his work. It is rumored that a somewhat active scramble both for the place and the position is now in progress. One party wishes to have the establishment at or near Cornell University, and to have a university man chosen director; while another is agitating in favor of Long Island, in the vicinity of this city, and in the interest of one or another free lance. There are withal many opinions as to how the money should be spent; and the present condition of the enterprise is not a little interesting and instructive, as showing the inevitable tendency of "spoils" to incite warfare even in the scientific fold. Such conditions are naturally favorable for the advancement of the least scrupulous lambs, and it is to be expected, if political struggles for scientific precedence are to continue, that something very like a wolf will ultimately be evolved in scientific circles.

—When the Brazilian law of September 28, 1871, establishing in the empire the principle of the venter liber, was promulgated it was doubted if it would be honestly enforced. The experience of these nine years proves that the Brazilian authorities not only did not provide the country with the legislation necessary to the carrying out of that law, but have actually deprived the law of some of its essential features, thus frustrating the gradual emancipation of the one million four hundred thousand slaves still existing in the empire. The principal provisions of that law were: first, that every child born after the date of its promulgation was free; second, that the owners of the slave-mother of such a child would be entitled to the services of the child up to its coming of age, the services to be considered as a compensation for the child's maintenance and education; third, that, instead of thus keeping the child ingenuus in that bondage, the master might surrender him to the state, to be educated by it; fourth, that an "emancipation fund" should be created immediately from the product of lotteries (a favorite source of Brazilian income) and of certain imposts, fines, etc., this fund to be divided every year among the provinces for the manumission of slaves, whose names were to be drawn by lot. The Government has never taken effective steps towards bringing up these free-born children of slaves. The fund was indeed formed, but, instead of producing two to three millions of dollars, as was expected, it has yielded only a meagre half a million, and has been divided but once in nine years. Not content with this criminal neglect, the Government has misapplied half a million of dollars of the fund to other purposes, and, as if that were not enough, in 1879 it passed a law authorizing the Treasury to apply to the general budget the fund specially raised and declared to be sacredly held for emancipation purposes. So all there is of the fund now is two millions of dollars. The money that has been diverted from it would be sufficient for the liberation of fourteen hundred slaves, or one-thousandth of the whole slave population of Brazil. Since 1871 only four thousand five hundred slaves have availed themselves of the fund, although four millions and a half have been raised for it, and although the number of private manumissions has exceeded fifty thousand. Considering that that abuse has been going on under the first Liberal Cabinet that Brazil has had for many years, and after two trips, to Europe and the United States, of its Emperor, who has been reputed so liberal and friendly to emancipation, one cannot help questioning the Brazilian progress of which so much was heard here during Dom Pedro's visit. We remark that the new Ministry of Sr. Saraiva promises to make now a second distribution of the fund. This is, indeed, the very least it can do, for there is hardly any difference between wilful reduction of freemen to slavery and the violation of a fund for emancipation of slaves. While the Government has thus shamefully retarded emancipation and misspent the scanty income of half a million of its fund, it has wasted three millions a year on European immigration, which has proved such a failure that it is now trying to import coolies, having already despatched an ambassador to China to treat for that purpose.

—As is natural, the literary losses incurred in the burning of Mommsen's library on the 12th of July cannot be exactly ascertained. Not a book of his own escaped, and his insurance was only 14,000 marks ($3,500). Of the great works upon which he was engaged, vol. viii. (Africa) of the 'Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum' was saved intact, while the 'Instrumentum Domesticum' (Lower Italy, East) of vol. ix., the 'Columnæ Militariæ' (Sicily and Sardinia) of vol. x., the 'Index Auctorum' of vols. ix. and x., and the Helvetic Inscriptions of vol. xiii. were sadly damaged, and the addenda to vol. x., containing Lower Italy, West, were practically destroyed. The critical text of Jordanes prepared for publication in the 'Auctores Antiquissimi' of the 'Monumenta Germaniæ,' was rescued, although the four MSS. on which it was based, and which belonged to the libraries of Heidelberg, Berlin, Vienna, and Breslau, perished in the flames. It is not yet known whether or to what extent their fate was shared by MSS. lent from the Vatican and the Cambridge libraries. Mommsen's 'History of the Empire,' of which nearly three volumes were ready, is among the irreparable losses.

—'Culturbilder aus Griechenland' is a thin volume of one hundred and fifty pages, by Dr. Pervanoglu, formerly librarian of the University of Athens. It is provided with a short preface by Von Rangabé, Grecian minister at Berlin. It is not, as one would suppose at first sight, devoted to classical Greece, but is an attempt by a patriotic Greek to present such a picture, or succession of pictures, of his native land as should aid in winning for it more respect and attention. There are, besides the introduction, nine chapters, upon Land, People, Manners and Customs, Weddings and Burials, Popular Amusements, Athens, Literature and Language, Commerce, etc., and Politics. It is, of course, written in a somewhat apologetic tone, showing that sensitiveness to foreign criticism which we Americans know so well, but it is well worth consulting by all who are interested in this young nation, or who purpose visiting it. Its publication is very timely, now that Greece is being brought so prominently before the eyes of Europe.

—M. Victor Guérin's preface to the second edition of his 'Île de Rhodes' just brought out in Paris by Ernest Leroux—a minute and learned description of that island, first published in 1856, and hardly yet superseded by a similar work in any language, though Berg's 'Die Insel Rhodus" appeared in 1861—contains an interesting statement connecting an explosion of the year 1856 with the struggle of 1522, in which the Knights of St. John succumbed to Sultan Solyman the Magnificent. Contemporary historians ascribe the fall of the Christian power in Rhodes in part to the treachery of D'Amaral, chancellor of the order, who, in the year preceding the fatal contest, had been defeated in the election of a grand-master by Villiers de l'Isle-Adam. Prompted by vindictiveness, it is said, he secretly instigated Solyman to undertake the siege of the great stronghold of the Knights, indicated to him its feeblest points, and buried a portion of the powder needed for its defence. In 1854 M. Guérin, having visited the subterranean vaults of the old ramparts, called the attention of the Pasha to the sudden calamity with which the buried ammunition still menaced the city of Rhodes, and urged him to institute a search. "God alone," the Moslem answered, "can know where the stores are of which you speak; God is great and merciful, and he will care for it." Two years later a terrific explosion shook a part of the city; the former Church of St. John, transformed into a mosque after the Turkish conquest, was blown into ruins, which buried the Moslems who were worshipping there. The ancient palace of the grand-masters and other buildings also suffered by the shock, which, almost as violent as an earthquake, was caused by a large heap of powder previously unknown to the inhabitants. Was not this explosion, M. Guérin asks, a revelation, after more than three centuries, of the infamous treason with which D'Amaral was charged by his contemporaries?

—The formation by the Germans of a vigorous federal government in their new Empire has naturally directed their attention to our Union as the most conspicuous modern example of a federal state, and has called forth an active study of our Constitution and its history. This consideration is presented by Dr. Eugen Schlief as a leading inducement to the preparation of his 'Die Verfassung der Nordamerikanischen Union,' recently published by Brockhaus (New York: L. W. Schmidt). Especial attention is given, therefore, by him to the practical side of our Constitution. One part is devoted to this topic; and the numerous incidental discussions, and the comparison with the institutions or the condition of things in Germany, are a striking feature of the book. The general point of view of the author, developed in chapter iv. (page 54), is that a federal government is, so to speak, in a condition of unstable equilibrium, and tends irresistibly towards either consolidation or dissolution. Our last three amendments, therefore, indispensable enlargements of the national power, and steps in a necessary movement of centralization, he pronounces (p. 452) begriffswidrig from the point of view of the States—that is to say, hostile to the constitutional conception of the reserved powers of the States. The book is in three parts. Part I., Introduction, contains, in six chapters, a very inadequate historical introduction, a sketch of the literature, and an excellent discussion of the theoretical principles of government, and of federal government in particular. Part II., the Constitution, is in five divisions: 1, the Factors of Government; 2, the Executive; 3, Impeachment; 4, the Powers of the Government; 5, Amendments—twenty-five chapters in all. Part III., the practical workings of American Constitutional Law, contains four chapters: one general, and one each upon Equality, Freedom, and "Particularismus und Centralization"—that is, the States-rights controversy. There is no index, but a very good table of contents.

DR. BUSHNELL.*

A GENTLEMAN who had known little of the earlier life of Dr. Bushnell, and became acquainted with him only through his later writings, his lectures and addresses, once drew this imaginary portrait of him:

"Physically a strong man, broad-shouldered, deep-chested, in robust health; his early life refined by culture, and his manners and speech made easy by early association with cultured and refined persons; socially, one who if not wealthy has always been in easy circumstances; professionally, one who has always held an assured position whereby he has acquired an unconscious, authoritative tone; liberal and advanced in his views, but a man who has never developed the partisan character of a reformer, and whose public life has been happily free from the embitterments of controversy."

Yet in every substantial particular this life-picture presents the reverse of the life-record.

That a young man whose entire youth has been passed in poverty and ignorance, like that of George Stephenson and Abraham Lincoln, can grow into eminence in the one thing of his business or profession, carrying along with him his unpolished manners, and homely speech, and simple tastes, we can all understand; but that a man thus circumstanced in youth can be so transformed by his own steady application that the last half of his life shall give no indication of the first half in those elements which make and betray the man, is one of the marvels of human nature. The Dr. Bushnell of the last twenty years, applauded, admired, revered; with the surviving fathers of the Congregational Church rendering him confidence and affection; with a crowd of young clergymen around him intent on the polished sentences of his animated talk—of him our readers have a tolerably clear conception. But the Horace Bushnell of sixty years ago, of forty years ago, what manner of man was he?

* 'Life and Letters of Horace Bushnell.' New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.

In two admirable sketches of two admirable women (his grandmother and his mother) Dr. Bushnell has incidentally drawn the portraiture of his earlier life; and, we may add, has given to us a vivid picture of that heroic rural New England which was, and perhaps is, but which all must regretfully concede will soon have passed away:

"She [his mother] was providing and training her six children, clothing her whole family in linens and woollens, spun, every thread, and made up in the house, to a great extent, also, by herself. She had a farm-and-dairy charge to administer, also the farm workmen to board, and for five or six months in a year the workmen, besides, of a homespun cloth-dressing shop."

"There was always something for the smallest to do—errands to run, berries to pick, weeds to pull, earnings all for the common property in which he thus begins to be a stockholder. So for both sexes and all sizes; and how very close up to the gateway of God is every child brought who is trained to the consenting obedience of industry! Indeed, there is nothing in these early days that I remember with more zest than that I did the full work of a man for at least five years before the manly age; this, too, under no eight-hour law of protective delicacy, but holding fast the astronomic ordinance in a service of from thirteen to fourteen hours."

"Her first offer to me of a liberal education [at the age of sixteen] I peremptorily declined; for how could an awkward country boy think of going in among the great folk of a college? But about five years later, when brought under motives of religion, I asked the opportunity for myself. Now it was too late. The homespun was going rapidly out of use, and the business concerned in its production was growing less and less profitable. But my mother, who in this could hardly submit even to necessity, called a congress of the family, where we drew the calculation close and made up our bill—I to wear homespun to the end, use only second-hand books, and pay the bills of my last year myself; the family to institute a closer economy, for my sake, which they somehow found a place to do, though I never could see where."

"I was brought up in a country family, ignorant of any but country society, where cultivated language in conversation was unknown. I entered college late, at twenty-one years of age, when the vernacular type of language is cast, and will not afterwards commonly be much altered. I came to writing with no stock of speech but this. I had no language, and if I chanced to have an idea nothing came to give it expression."

From this rough New England acorn, tardily planted, grew the beautiful tree of a cultivated, refined, and comprehensive mind. But the contrast of the suppositional with the real picture does not stop here. The bronzed young farmer, with well-developed muscles, when he entered the freshman class at the age of twenty-one, appeared to the younger and weaker youth of the college as the very embodiment of sturdy life and health. But in the severe strain of rebuilding the intellectual he unmade the physical, and as he left behind him the homely speech of the farm-neighborhood he unhappily, perhaps unconsciously, dropped with it the wealth of health wherewith the farm had endowed him. In middle life his form seemed slender, if not fragile. At thirty-seven there crops out in the biography the ominous beginning of the series, "out of health," "ill-health," "serious illness," "constant cough," "completely broken down."

About the same time came the first blasts of the theological gale which beat upon him through the best years of his life. First, one of his own deacons—a deacon of the stern, old New-England stuff, courteous, invincibly firm, and with an eye as quick to mark false doctrine in the sermon of his pastor as to detect short measure in the goods which came into his warehouse—writes a kind and respectful letter, in which, nevertheless, he tells his pastor plainly, "You hold many things which affect and subvert long-established and well-established doctrines and principles, and those in which our churches are at rest and in union." Then came charges of heterodoxy, of heretical teaching, an ecclesiastical trial in which Dr. Bushnell was acquitted not unanimously, and the majority which acquitted went upon no better ground than that the errors of his book were not fundamental. Then came renewed attempts by other Congregational churches to bring him again to trial, and these attempts were defeated not on the merits of the controversy, but upon the technical ground of want of jurisdiction. Then, to evade further proceedings, his own church withdrew from the "consociation" of churches of which it was a member. Finally, after ecclesiastical proceedings had ceased, after Dr. Bushnell had secured the only acquittal he ever obtained from constituted authority, the Congregational clergymen of Hartford would not "exchange" with him nor allow him to preach from their pulpits. Thus, through the score of years wherein a strong man is at his best, the very harvest-time of one's manhood, Dr. Bushnell's purposes were being undermined by his breaking health, and a cold blast of suspicion, dissent, and disapproval was beating down upon him which would have congealed the soul of an ordinary man. Nevertheless, between the ages of thirty-seven and fifty-seven he fought out his battle of life, unwavering, unswerving; and then, recognizing the fact that his physical man was but a wreck, he, with characteristic decision, resigned his pastorate, greatly beloved, greatly esteemed, and all but universally regarded as one of the successful men of this world—as a man who had fought his way up to the highest rank in his branch of the service, whose works would survive his own life, and remain an element in the history of his time and church and faith.

The force which Dr. Bushnell exerted during the controversial period of his life, we think, may be defined as influence. He did not command men; he did not lead them, he did not even convince them. He established no sect, he founded no school, he left no accepted system, and from a doctrinal point of view he had no following. The men who stood by him in his season of trial, such men as Dr. Porter, of Farmington, and Dr. Leonard Bacon, and the men who acquitted him of the charge of heretical teaching, did not reach his conclusions nor acquiesce in his views. Here and there men and bodies of men announced that they adopted the controverted opinions of Dr. Bushnell; but it is manifest that they were actuated chiefly by love and sympathy for him, by the belief that he was a great and good man who had been harshly treated, and by the fact that they found nothing heretical in his books. They adopted his creed, but they cared much more for the man than the creed. Nevertheless, the influence of Dr. Bushnell has been a great power, steadily making its own way, constantly, like water, expanding and permeating. If other men have not adopted his enlarged horizon, they have, in consequence of his teaching, enlarged their own. If his arguments did not storm the intrenched camps of the "schools," his influence gradually levelled their fortifications and brought the defenders out into a broader plain of theologic liberality.

Within the Congregational lines and among those worthy persons who clung tenaciously to the formulated belief of "doctrine," it may be said that Dr. Bushnell never went backward and that his opponents never moved forward. At first many persons supposed that he would go over to the Unitarians, and some doubtless thought that it would be a good riddance of his disturbances. But Dr. Bushnell would not go. Soon it became apparent to them that he was not a Unitarian, nor a Methodist, nor a Presbyterian, nor a Baptist, nor an Episcopalian, nor a Romanist, and gradually they settled down in the belief that he must needs be a Congregationalist after all. From this point the transition was easy to that at which they spoke of him as a man of genius, but erratic and visionary. After a time the qualifying clause dropped off, his brilliancy of intellect and goodness of heart were fully recognized, and when he died the general voice of his denomination classified him with the great clergymen of America, and placed his works among the distinguished teachings of the Christian Church.

In his biography Dr. Bushnell is fortunate. The preface designates it as a composite work, but the burden of it has been borne manifestly by the loving hands of his daughters. Ordinarily a man's nearest relations are not discriminating judges of what it is best to publish or omit; but this book evidently had the benefit of able criticism before it went to the publisher. Great care and much labor must have been bestowed in collecting, arranging, and rejecting material, so that letters and extracts form no inconsiderable part of an intelligible narrative. Portions of it will be interesting, doubtless, to only one class of readers, and other portions only to another class; some "long-deferred" letters "hastily written" by an overworked invalid do not do justice to the real man, others will be interesting only to his personal friends; but as a whole the book brings out Dr. Bushnell in his character, in his struggles, in his work, in all those things that made up his life. It also brings out many of those passages and utterances of the man which do not find their way into his formal writings, and it unfolds many of the views of an able mind that pass unnoticed in the volumes of his works. For illustration, in 1840 Dr. Bushnell made this wonderful forecast of our present political condition, which we commend to all conscientious voters who deem civil-service reform a needless and visionary thing.

"This doctrine, which proposes to give the spoils to the victors, has been imputed mostly to one of our political parties, and, as some suppose, has been avowed by that party. Of this I am willing to doubt. We shall see, perhaps, how far the opposing party will abjure this doctrine of the spoils, and whether it is not yet to be the universal doctrine of politics in the land. If so, then shall we have a scene in this land never before exhibited on earth—one which would destroy the integrity and sink the morality of a nation of angels. It will be as if so many offices, worth so much, together with the seamless robe of our glorious Constitution, were held up to be the price of victory, and as if it were said: 'Look, ye people, here is a premium offered to every discontent you can raise, every combination or faction you can mention, every lie you can invent. Cupidity here is every man's right; try for what you can, and as much as you can get you shall have.' Only conceive such a lure held out to this great people, and all the little offices of the Government thus set up for the price of the victory, without regard to merit or anything but party services, and you have a spectacle of baseness and rapacity such as was never seen before. No preaching of the Gospel in our land, no parental discipline, no schools, not all the machinery of virtue together, can long be a match for the corrupting power of our political strifes, actuated by such a law as this."

There are many points of Dr. Bushnell's life to which we cannot even allude, such as his public spirit, his social character, the wonderful industry of his old age, the dauntless spirit which braved theological seminaries and raised him from beds of sickness to battle for health alone among strangers, and prompted him to climb to the summit of the Giant of the Adirondacks by an unknown route of his own exploring, when men spoke of him as a "retired clergyman," superannuated and broken down. In conclusion, we ought to add that the book contains, what biographers are too apt to omit, a good index and an excellent table of contents. As the exposition of the life of an able man it will well repay the perusal of every intelligent reader.

MR. TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVEL.*

MR. RICHARD GRANT WHITE has recently published a criticism of this novel in which he has been at some pains to show the material difference between the art of novel-writing as managed by Scott and by Trollope. Such a comparison may serve very well to bring out the excellence of Scott, and to exhibit an analysis of the causes which place him at the head of English writers of fiction. Mr. White justly points out that the distinguishing mark separating Scott from all his successors is his masterly management of his plots. But then it must be remembered that his great plots were plots of romances rather than novels properly so called; romances in which there were heroes and heroines, and great passions and profound griefs, and in fact all that a lofty and manly imagination could extract in the way of poetry from that twilight of legend and legendary history which lasted down to the opening of this century, but which modern civilization has since broadened into the full light of garish day. It is safe to say that, although Scott displayed a greater mastery of the art of story-telling than any one who has appeared since, novels like his belong to a bygone day, and, therefore, to compare modern novelists with him is out of place. The romantic school, whether in fiction or poetry, whether in England, America, or France, is as completely dead as if it had never existed, and it is a natural result of this that the art of plot-making should have disappeared. For the construction of a plot, as Scott constructed one, or as Victor Hugo, or even as Dumas père, or Lever constructed one, was essentially dependent upon the romantic conception of the world which produced the romantic school of fiction—a world peopled with heroes and heroines, a world of love, adventure, and war, a world of enthusiasm, unselfishness, and all chivalric sentiments standing out in bold and beautiful relief against a dark background of intrigue and crime; such a world is necessarily a world adapted to the production of plots. In 'Guy Mannering,' the 'Talisman,' and 'Quentin Durward' Scott has elaborated the scheme of adventure and love which forms the basis of the story with the most careful attention to details, giving it an internal development and growth of its own; but could he have done anything else? These romances without their elaborate plots would be impossibilities. Excepting the Scotch characters, whom he drew from life, and the historical personages (like Louis the Eleventh, for instance, or Queen Elizabeth), who are rather wonderful historical portraits, animated like characters in tableaux vivants, than real persons, Scott's characters as such have not much genuine interest. This has always been acknowledged with regard to his heroes, and we fancy will in the end be admitted even of those lovely creatures who fire his heroes' hearts to deeds of daring and devotion. Scott's heroines are fine proofs of the height to which an idealizing imagination can lift the objects of its admiration; but are they real women? Is there not more reality in Thackeray's caricatures of Rebecca and Rowena than in Rebecca and Rowena themselves? The same thing might be said of many of the other persons in 'Ivanhoe.'

The love of reality having supplanted the love of romance, it is but natural that in novel-writing the plot should yield in importance to character. There is, it must be admitted, an antecedent improbability in all plots, strictly so-called. Things do not happen in real life as they do in the Waverley novels. True love may not run smooth, but neither does it invariably triumph over the obstacles in its path. Nor are there always obstacles in its way. Adventure, if piled upon adventure, has an air of unreality of which even the most carefully-concealed and surprising dénouement does not relieve it. You may go even further than this, and say with the Naturalists—who bear to Realists somewhat the same relation which the latter do to the Romanticists—that in real life events do not develop themselves in any coherent order at all; that there is no beginning or ending to anything, and that the function of the novel-writer is to bring out this great fact. But the difficulty with the naturalistic theory, as a theory, is that fiction based on the idea of photographically representing life itself would be a bald series of statements of facts, like those in the columns of a newspaper. The moment it departs from this type, and adopts order, form, and method, it ceases to be naturalistic. Consequently those naturalists who, like Zola, succeed in writing interesting novels, always do so by violating in a degree the canons of their own creed. Naturalism is fortunately a French product, and has never taken a strong hold of the Anglo-Saxon imagination. In England fiction, though it has long since abandoned the paths of romanticism (for even the author of 'Contarini Fleming' and 'Henrietta Temple' does not any longer write romances), has not gone beyond those of realism, and in realistic novel-writing, pace Mr. White, it would be hard to name any one who could be for a moment compared with Trollope. It is said that he holds and has expressed the opinion that novel-writing is a business to which any intelligent man can be brought up, and the ease and rapidity with which he pours forth stories from the press are calculated to produce the impression that the trick could readily be acquired; but, unless we are mistaken, no one ever has written and no one ever will write novels like Trollope, and the art which he possesses could no more be communicated than the art of writing good acting comedies or popular street-songs.

The 'Duke's Children' is, like all Trollope's novels, an extremely simple story. It belongs to the series in which the Duke of Omnium and Phineas Finn and his wife appear, and narrates the fortunes of the duke's eldest son and daughter. Briefly, the duke's eldest son, Lord Silverbridge, is a modern young man who has inherited none of his father's talent or capacity for governing men and particularly the members of the House of Commons, but who is fond of amusing himself, fond of horses and of the society of young ladies. He has adopted, to his father's great regret, Conservative opinions—the Pallisers always having been Liberal—and this, too, merely from having fallen into the society of other young men who hold such opinions. He is amiable, good-looking, and the heir of an immense property. His character is like that of dozens of young Englishmen of the present time, and is really so negative that it is hard to describe. He has two love-affairs, one with Mabel Grex, the fortune-hunting but attractive daughter of a ruined earl, and the second with an American girl, Miss Boncassen, whom he finally marries. Miss Boncassen's father is an American gentleman of good breeding and taste, but her grandfather was a day-laborer, so that in the matter of family there was some reason for the old duke to feel wofully grieved by his son's attachment, particularly as he would have been greatly pleased if Lord Silverbridge had married Mabel. Meanwhile he is disappointed in other things. His daughter, a charming girl, falls in love with Frank Tregear, who, though a gentleman, has no right to dream of such good fortune as marrying the daughter of the Duke of Omnium. This attachment the duke does his best to break up, of course without success. In the end Frank Tregear marries Lady Mary, just as Lord Silverbridge marries Miss Boncassen, and the duke consents. This is the sum and substance of the story, and there could hardly be less. There is besides, however, a full account of the anxiety which the younger son causes the duke by his college escapades, and the trouble caused by Lord Silverbridge's operations on the turf, in the course of which he is swindled by one Major Tifto and made to lose an enormous sum of money, and of Lord Silverbridge's election to the House of Commons and of his public service there, and of a dozen other little episodes in the lives of the duke and his children, which are all natural, all essentially disconnected and incidental, and bear no relation whatever to the main story.

As a whole it is one of Mr. Trollope's most successful novels. It is pitched in the usual quiet key which all readers of his books know so well, and which is maintained with the hand of a master to the end. We have already said that we do not think Mr. Trollope should be found fault with because his plots are faulty when compared with those which made the success of an entirely different school of fiction. If he has not the art of contriving plots he has that of telling stories, and this, after all, is the fundamental and essential thing. What the art of narration is, why some people should have it and others not, why with the same materials one novelist can hold the attention while another cannot, are mysteries of the literary craft which it is difficult or impossible to penetrate. If they could be penetrated it might be possible to teach people to write good novels, and if such teaching were given it is highly probable that the result would be the production of novels like those of Trollope. There is nothing about them which, superficially, it seems difficult to imagine a dozen writers doing equally well. They all seem, as Hawthorne said, like slices cut off the huge English cheese, and presented for our microscopic inspection under a glass case. But the exhibition must be managed by Trollope himself or it is a failure. For bringing a quiet domestic scene before the eye, for ordinary conversation of any kind, for representing the everyday events of life without exaggeration or distortion, we cannot imagine a novelist superior to the author of the 'Duke's Children.' If any one will examine such a chapter as the one which describes the breakfast-table of the duke and his two sons, and ask himself when he has read it how any detail could be altered so as to increase the reality of the scene, he will find that it is almost impossible to change a word without impairing the effect. This is something, too, which can be said of hardly any other novelist, living or dead. Whole pages and chapters might be expunged from Thackeray and Dickens with vast improvement of the general result. George Eliot might in most of her latest novels be greatly improved upon by a sympathetically critical hand. But Trollope cannot be modified any more than he could be successfully parodied. Punch is now attempting this feat, and we are willing to abide the result as a test.

We cannot, then, agree with Mr. White in thinking Mr. Trollope a "naturalistic" writer, though in what he has to say about the naturalistic theory and its tendencies his argument cannot be disputed. It is easily possible to imagine a story-teller who should apply what Zola thinks is his method to English fiction, and who should produce novels in which form should be altogether sacrificed to nature. But the thing has never yet been done, and it is unfair to attempt to fasten such an arrant piece of gallicism upon so English a writer as Mr. Trollope. He is, unless we are greatly mistaken, the last of the realists, and, like a true Englishman, not even that on any theory. He paints the world as he sees it, but he sees it with just that amount of artistic vision which saves his picture from having the dull flatness of every-day life, and yet never makes the light and shade any lighter or any darker than everybody feels to be within the bounds of naturalness. No one ever, we fancy, read a novel of his without wishing that he might soon write another, and it is only born story-tellers who leave us in this frame of mind.

AN AMERICAN WOMAN'S MEMOIRS.*

THIS autobiography was designed, as the preface informs the reader, to correct the idea that the anti-slavery movement "originated in Infidelity, and was a triumph of Scepticism over Christianity"; "to supply one quota of the inside history of the great Abolition war," and to record some characteristic incidents of the Peculiar Institution; "to give an inside history of the hospitals during the war of the rebellion"; to analyze the causes of the woman's rights agitation and of its limited influence; and to trace the author's own growth from shrinking modesty to entire indifference to newspaper notoriety, and freedom from embarrassment in addressing public meetings. These several objects are accomplished in the course of the chronological personal narrative, extending from 1815 to 1865; but the chapters on Mrs. Swisshelm's hospital experience are consecutive, exclude every other topic, and, as they fill the last third of the book, obscure by their more vivid and painful interest the impression produced by the earlier history. They are frank to the verge of self-laudation, and unsparing in their censure of medical neglect and provost-marshal's red tape, of Miss Dix's primness, and of the folly and inefficiency of volunteer nurses in general. Wherever the critic may draw the line, some praise, admiration, and gratitude will remain for this part of the author's career.

It is easier to acquit Mrs. Swisshelm of scepticism than it is to define the present theological status of one who has visions of Christ as "a young man in a grey suit and soft, broad-brimmed hat" (p. 220). She was born of Scotch-Irish Covenanter stock, bearing the grim name of Cannon, and charged to the muzzle with unadulterated Calvinism. She learned to read the Old Testament rapidly before she was three years old, when she was sent to school and showed unusual precocity. She made the great mistake of her life in marrying a rather illiterate Methodist farmer, who wanted her to become a preacher in his church, and whose bigoted mother made her conversion a sine qua non of their living comfortably together under the same roof. It does not appear from anything said in the book that her husband has passed away (he married again in 1870), and it would be curious to know whether the world's progress has had such an effect upon him that he can read with complacency, or at least without a blush or without resentment, this account of the causes of their domestic infelicity. The saddest feature of the long struggle which ended in her desertion of him was that her endurance broke down (at the age of forty) just after the birth of the only child that lived to form a bond between them. "He was," she says, perhaps forestalling his epitaph, "not much better than the average man: knew his rights, and knowing sought to maintain them against me." These rights had special reference to her inherited property, and he enforced them with a closeness which made him threaten to file a claim against her mother's executors for wages for the time spent away from him by his wife, without his permission, while nursing that mother in her last illness. This seems shocking enough to-day, but it reflected the spirit of the law quite as much as the character of an individual, and Mrs. Swisshelm, who had previously written articles for the Pittsburgh Commercial Journal against the Mexican War, began to publish, after legal study, a series of letters on the subject of a married woman's right to hold property, which led, as she believes—not without help from other quarters—to the passage of a law by the Pennsylvania Legislature, in the session of 1847–48, securing that right. At least, some months afterward, "a young lawyer from Steubenville named Stanton," the future Secretary of War, and henceforth her good friend, sought an introduction to her, and said (p. 104): "I called to congratulate you upon the passage of your bill. It is a change I have long desired to see." Doubtless, Mrs. Swisshelm is prouder of this achievement than of her suggestion of the United States Court of Claims (p. 130), or of the rear red-light signal on railway trains (p. 158).

Mrs. Swisshelm was an abolitionist by virtue of her parentage:

"In the year 1800, the Covenanter church of this country said in her synod: 'Slavery and Christianity are incompatible,' and never relaxed her discipline which forbade fellowship with slaveholders—so I was brought up an abolitionist. I was still a child when I went through Wilkins township collecting names to a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Here, in a strictly orthodox Presbyterian community, I was everywhere met by the objection: 'Niggers have no souls,' 'The Jews held slaves,' 'Noah cursed Canaan,'" etc. (p. 34).

The family pastor, too, Dr. Black, was in full accord with the synod:

"In the communion service is a ceremony called 'fencing the tables,' which consists of an appeal to the consciences of intended communicants. Dr. Black began with the first commandment, and forbade those living in its violation to come to the table, and so proceeded through the decalogue. When he came to the eighth, he straightened himself, placed his hands behind him, and with thrilling emphasis said, 'I debar from this holy table of the Lord all slaveholders and horse-thieves and other dishonest persons,' and without another word passed to the ninth commandment."

Slavery still lingered in Pennsylvania in Mrs. Swisshelm's early childhood. After her marriage she went to live in the midst of "woman-whippers" in Louisville, Kentucky, and still later she fought the system in the Territory of Minnesota on the very eve of the civil war. She tells some harrowing tales of Kentucky cruelty, but perhaps nothing better marks the character of slavery than passages like this:

"Jerry Wade, the Gault House barber, was a mulatto, who had bought himself and family, and acquired considerable real estate. In the back of one of his houses lived his son with a wife and little daughter. We rented the front, and mother sent me furniture. This was highly genteel, for it gave us the appearance of owning slaves; and Olivia, young Wade's wife, represented herself as my slave, to bring her and her child security. As a free negro she labored under many disadvantages, so begged me to claim her" (p. 62).

Or this (of earlier date):

"To a white woman in Louisville work was a dire disgrace, and one Sabbath four of us sat suffering from thirst, with the pump across the street, when I learned that for me to go for a pitcher of water would be so great a disgrace to the house as to demand my instant expulsion" (p. 60).

With this, however, it is wholesome to compare the following reflection upon the usages of her own Northern neighborhood and home:

"Pennsylvania customs made it unmanly for a man or boy to aid any woman, even mother or wife, in any hard work with which farms abounded at that time. Dairy-work, candle and sausage-making were done by women, and any innovation was met with sneers. I stubbornly refused to yield altogether to a time-honored code which required women to perform out-door drudgery, often while men sat in the house."

In 1848 Mrs. Swisshelm started the Pittsburgh Saturday Visiter, a Liberty Party paper. She was not the first woman-editor in the country, but in direct participation in politics she perhaps took precedence of all other journalists of her sex. She had a plain and forcible style, sufficient positiveness and impulsiveness, and did her share in fostering the anti-slavery sentiment of the North. In 1850 she became the Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune, and maintained relations with that paper till the close of the war. In 1857 she removed to St. Cloud, Minnesota, where she established a new Visiter, and speedily got into hot water with a wealthy slaveholder and his dependents and tools. Her printing-office was mobbed at night by a vigilance committee, and part of the contents thrown into the Mississippi, as in Lovejoy's case, twenty years before. At an indignation meeting held on the evening of the next day she made her maiden speech, with a mob at the doors, and at the imminent peril of her life, which had been already threatened by her persecutors. She had made her preparations for death:

"James McKelvey, a lawyer, and nephew of my husband, drew my will, and I executed it, settled my business, and wrote a statement of the Visiter trouble, that it might live if I ceased to do so; then went to bed, sent for Miles Brown to come to my room, and saw him alone. He was a Pennsylvanian, who had the reputation of being a dead shot, and had a pair of fine revolvers. He pledged himself solemnly to go with me and keep near me, and shoot me square through the brain if there was no other way of preventing me falling alive into the hands of the mob. My mind was then at ease, and I slept until my mail was brought."

The temporary triumph of free speech did not extinguish the pro-slavery sentiment of the Territory, and few things in this narrative seem more remote, or, being realized as recent, seem more incredible, than the murderous fugitive-slave riot in Minneapolis in 1860.

It remains to say a few words about the Sioux outbreak of 1862, which converted our philanthropist into one of the most unrelenting enemies of the Indians. Singularly enough, her desire to see them exterminated is justified by her abhorrence of their polygamy and the servile condition of their women. It is clear, however, that her nervous system, unstrung by her wretched married life, and still further weakened by her recent conflict in Minnesota, passed altogether out of control in view of the savage atrocities of the Sioux. While these haunt her imagination she finds the Northern sentiment of pity for the aborigines abominable, and writes as wildly about it as any member of an Indian ring might do. "No one pretends," she shrieks rather than exclaims, "that Western settlers have injured Indians; but Eastern philanthropists, through the Government they control, have, according to their own showing, been guilty of no end of frauds; and as they do not and cannot stop the stealing, they pay their debts to the noble red man by licensing him to outrage women, torture infants, and burn homes." She scouts the idea that the Indians had any title to the lands they were occupying when the country was first colonized. Penn's treaty was "one of the greatest swindles on record since that by which Jacob won the birthright of his starving brother"; and apparently the "woman-whippers" of Georgia in their dealings with the Cherokees set a shining example of theory and practice. It is enough, by way of comment upon such incoherency, to remark that one must not turn to this volume for any light on the causes of the Sioux outbreak, on the extent of the massacre, or on the justice of the multiple hangings which succeeded it; nor, either, for an explanation of the failure of our Indian policy, or for one humane or practicable suggestion how to redeem it.

Mountain and Prairie. A Journey from Victoria to Winnipeg. By the Rev. D. M. Gordon, B.D. (Montreal: Dawson Bros. 1880.)—On the 20th of July, 1871, British Columbia joined the Dominion of Canada, one of the articles of confederation stipulating that the Government of the Dominion should begin the construction of a Pacific railway in two years and complete it in ten. The ten years have nearly expired, and at present there are 226 miles of the road in operation near Lake Superior, 505 miles under contract, and 1,225 miles on which nothing has been done except to locate the line. Nearly $4,000,000 have been expended in the surveys, and different routes have been examined which aggregate 46,000 miles in length. The numerous parties which have made these surveys from time to time have rendered their official reports and statistics to the Dominion Parliament, while nearly always there has appeared a narrative in a more popular form from the pen of some one who accompanied the expedition as a volunteer or an amateur. The book before us belongs to the latter class. The writer was one of a party sent out in May, 1879, for the purpose of examining a route from Port Simpson, near the Alaska boundary, through the Peace River and Pine River passes to the plains. He hopes that "the record of his journey across mountain and prairie may be of use in acquainting some of his fellow-countrymen, in a slight degree, with the character and resources of that half of the Dominion that lies between Winnipeg and the Western Sea."

The Peace River and Pine River passes were found to possess but slight obstacles to the construction of a railway, their elevation being less than three thousand feet above the sea, but the Dominion Government has since decided definitively in favor of the southern route by the Fraser River, in order that the trade of the lower portion of British Columbia may not seek its way East by California and the United States road. The resources of the country he traversed are sketched by the author with no hesitating touch. British Columbia is rich in lumber, coal, and mines of precious metals; its climate is mild, its harbors never freeze, and they are connected by an inside route, between the islands and the main shore, whose waters are not disturbed by ocean storms. The plains east of the mountains are still more valuable; here are coal-fields 80,000 to 100,000 miles in extent, future provinces, "larger than Scotland," where the wheat yield is "from 50 to 100 per cent. greater than that of the best wheat-lands of the United States," great rivers navigable for hundreds of miles, peaceful Indians, and all the elements of prosperity except a population—which will come as soon as the railroad is built. As an ardent loyalist the author scouts the idea of Canada ever being anything but a British colony, and he considers that these lands "offer special attractions to immigrants from the mother country, for there the shield of the Empire will still be around them"; and he states that the increasing knowledge of the country tends to confirm rather than to refute the contention that "four-fifths of the wheat-producing belt of North America will be found north of the international boundary." In short, the book is a type with which we were very familiar ten years ago, when the lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad were described in such glowing terms, or compared with the less-favored section through which a road had already been built and proved a success. The little incidents of travel, the character of the Indians and half-breeds met on the route, the life at the Hudson Bay posts, and the success of the missions alternate with descriptions of the latent wealth of the country and predictions of its future prosperity. Many of the predictions about our own Northwest have already proved illusory, not a few of them have been fully verified, and the greater part still remain uncertain. It will probably be the same with the lands across the boundary line. Meanwhile, the importance of the Pacific Railroad to the development of Canada cannot be overlooked, and whatever throws any light on its probable success as a commercial enterprise must be of interest to Canadians, and incidentally to our own Northwestern States also.

A Treatise on the Measure of Damages; or, an Enquiry into the Principles which govern the Amount of Pecuniary Compensation awarded by Courts of Justice. By Theodore Sedgwick. Seventh Edition. By Arthur G. Sedgwick and G. Willett Van Nest. (New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1880.)—'Sedgwick on Damages' needs no introduction to professional readers; it is not merely the best book on the subject, but almost the only book; and the fact that it has thus kept the field to itself for more than thirty years is no small testimony to its merits, for had there been any chance of superseding it, many writers would have been glad to try their hands on a subject so interesting and so abounding in material for a treatise. The rapid increase of this material, indeed, has compelled the present editors to bring out the book in two portly volumes, instead of the single volume of former editions.

It is perhaps surprising that this branch of the law should be so recent in its growth, since in every lawsuit that ever existed, in which the defendant was found liable, the question must have arisen, "To what extent is he liable?" The answer was usually left to the discretion of the jury in each case, and their finding was seldom interfered with by the court; or, again, a measure of damages was already fixed by agreement of the parties, as in case of a promise to pay money, so that there were but few judicial decisions which established any precedent in this class of cases. It is the vast modern increase in the number and variety of contracts, and in the magnitude of the interests involved in them, which has added so many cases to the law of damages, and has given rise to so many attempts to reduce them to a system. It seems not unlikely that this tendency to the establishment of fixed rules of compensation will become less marked in proportion as the trial of facts in civil cases by a jury falls into disuse, and a trial by a judge takes its place. That this latter change is now going on, to a very considerable extent, is certain; and it is certain also that wherever it may stop, it will make a great impression in many ways on our legal system, which is based on the idea that all matters of fact are to be determined by a jury according to rules of law laid down to them by a judge. A system under which the judge not only determines what the law is in the abstract but applies it to the facts proved, must tend to make him lose sight of abstract rules in the endeavor to attain justice in the particular case, and to consider rather what the defendant before him ought to pay than what would be a suitable measure of damages in such cases generally.

However this may be, it will be always a matter of interest to would-be plaintiffs to know what are the chances of getting enough by their suits to pay expenses; and to possible defendants, to learn the extent of the liabilities they have incurred; and on these points, so far as the courts have passed upon them, sufficient advice may be given by the aid of this book, and not otherwise. This legal classic has the great advantage over some others of having had successive editors worthy of the author. New notes to standard law-books are apt to consist of vast conglomerations of cases bearing more or less remotely on the subject of the text to which they are appended, without any but the rudest attempt to classify or distinguish them, or to point out the development of the law. The present editors have done their work with intelligence as well as industry; and some of the longer notes contain useful discussions of the present state of the authorities. The fact that they have extended to a length quite disproportionate to the original text is no fault of the editors. The complaint of the growth of law-books is as old as Lord Coke; and the same answer explains it now as then—"Crescit in orbe dolus." When the time comes, as it must come, for the book to be re-written as a whole, not the least valuable part of it will be the result of the patient and thoughtful labor which has evidently been bestowed on these notes. We wish it had seemed practicable to avoid the double system of reference; the pages of the former editions, noted in the margin, being uniformly referred to in the notes, while the paging of the new edition is used in the index and table of cases.

Dramatic Life as I Found It: A record of personal experience; with an account of the rise and progress of the drama in the West and South, with anecdotes and biographical sketches of the principal actors and actresses who have at times appeared upon the stage of the Mississippi Valley. By N. M. Ludlow, Actor and Manager for Thirty-five Years. (St. Louis: G. I. Jones & Co. 1880. Pp. xix.–733.)—This is a running tale of histrionic adventure for thirty-eight years, mostly in the then only half-settled Mississippi Valley. Born in 1795, in New York, Mr. Ludlow went on the stage in 1813, and four years later he became a manager. He was in the first regular company of comedians which appeared in Louisville (1817), and he was the manager of the first English-speaking company which performed in New Orleans (1817), Nashville (1817), St. Louis (1819), and Mobile (1824). For eighteen years he was the partner of Sol Smith in managing theatres in New Orleans, St. Louis, and Mobile; with the termination of this partnership in May, 1853, Mr. Ludlow left the stage as manager and actor. Parts of this period have been recorded before, with more or less accuracy, by Sol Smith, by Wemyss, and by Joseph Cowell; but Mr. Ludlow's knowledge was earlier and wider than theirs, and he corrects their errors unsparingly. Indeed, it seems as though the desire to dwell on their failings was the exciting cause of his own book. To balance, it may be, these strictures, he praises the writings of W. B. Wood, of Mr. Vandenhoff, and of Mr. Ireland, carrying his admiration of the latter gentleman's 'History of the New York Stage' to the extent of openly borrowing from it something like fifty of his own broad pages. So prone is Mr. Ludlow to censure, that after sprinkling his own work with commonplace Latin quotations, he remarks upon the pedantry of Macready in using French and Latin phrases in his 'Reminiscences.' But these are minor failings. The book makes no pretence to literary merit. It is simply a personal narrative, containing a welcome mass of material for the histrionic biographer, and the future annalist of the local stages of the South and West. Careful editing would have excised the frequent repetitions, together with the many quotations from Mr. Ireland, thus reducing the undue bulk of the book. What the work chiefly needs is an index; the table of contents is full but altogether inadequate.

Mr. Ludlow tells fewer anecdotes than most of his fellow-actor-authors; but some of those he does tell are amusing, particularly the one (p. 169) of the first appearance in a low-comedy part of Sam Houston, then a lieutenant. The manager of the amateur club with which he performed was General John H. Eaton, afterwards the husband of Mrs. Eaton, of Kitchen Cabinet notoriety. It is a tradition that Junius Brutus Booth once acted Oreste in "Andromaque" in New Orleans in French, a tradition hitherto received without question. Mr. Ludlow shatters it (p. 231). At the request of the French citizens of New Orleans, in 1822, that Booth would act in some play more familiar to them than any of Shakspere's, he appeared as Orestes in Ambrose Phillips's "Distressed Mother"—an English version of Racine's tragedy. In the acting of this the French could follow him, although he spoke his own tongue, and his success was as great in Racine as it had been in Shakspere. Among other things to be noted (p. 503) in Mr. Ludlow's pages is the first performance in the United States of the "Lady of Lyons" at St. Louis in June, 1838, with Josephine Clifton as Pauline and an English actor named Barton as Claude. Hitherto the claim of the late "Count Joannes" to have been the original Claude in this country has generally been allowed. Mr. Ludlow also records the first production, in Louisville in 1831, of the earliest dramatization of Irving's "Rip Van Winkle," in which the chief part was played by Charles B. Parsons, an actor who afterwards, perhaps imposed upon by his name, gave up the stage for the pulpit, as Spencer Cone had done before him.

Historical Notes on Shipping. By Percy L. Isaac, Member of the Institution of Naval Architects. (London: J. D. Potter; Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1879.)—This little book of one hundred pages embodies a great many facts connected with the history of shipping, from the time of Noah's ark to the present day, rather loosely put together. The matter was, the author informs us, originally prepared as a lecture, delivered at the Jewish Workingmen's Club and Institute, and in the first few chapters an attempt is made to show that the Hebrews had a more direct connection with shipping in ancient times than writers seem inclined to give them credit for. The succeeding chapters bring the progress of shipping up to the present time, at least half the book being occupied with a very cursory view of modern systems and improvements in shipping and shipbuilding. Almost every subject connected either directly or remotely with shipping which occurs to the author's mind receives some attention. There are some very noticeable blunders. For instance, we are told that Hipparchus made a map on Mercator's projection, and that compound engines came into general use about the year 1856. A complete index ends the volume, and with more frequent reference to the authorities from which the information is derived the book would not be without some value as a very brief compendium of knowledge on a very comprehensive subject.

Little Comedies. By Julian Sturgis. New Handy-Volume Series, No. 59. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.)—At first glance it is somewhat hard to know where to place these 'Little Comedies.' Dramatic in form, and in form only, they wholly lack the action which is the life of the drama. They are but dialogues, almost without movement, and they are not always even so far dramatic, for in "Half-way to Arcady" the dialogue dies away, and in his proper person the poet himself sums up in the regular rhyming tag. Obviously, these are comedies not meant for the use of comedians—even in a parlor. Fortunately the author steps in to help us out; they appeared originally in Blackwood's, and in a later number of that magazine is another little comedy, "A Lay Confessional," evidently from the same hand, and this is preceded by a brief letter, in which the writer calls his work a sketch "thrown into a dramatic form." "Do not be deceived by its form into supposing this to be a play," he adds. "It is only a series of scenes, without beginning, middle, or end, . . . making no pretence to completeness." And this fairly enough characterizes the book before us. Only two of the six pieces are in verse, but in two others the characters drop into fragments of pretty and dainty song. In "Half-way to Arcady" and in "Fireflies" there is a commingling of wit and of fantasy not remotely recalling De Musset; and, as in many of De Musset's plays, the action seems to pass in that Bohemia which is a desert country by the sea. "Apples" we like less; we have heard of its being acted—by main force doubtless, for it is not bright enough for the stage. Indeed, "Picking up the Pieces" is the only play likely to reward the player; this is accidentally dramatic enough to act; it has sufficient story, sufficient climax to hold an audience, and its very clever wit is more robust than the jesting in its more delicate companions.

"MAJOR BUNDY'S LIFE OF GEN. GARFIELD IS THE BEST."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

AN ILLUSTRATED CAMPAIGN LIFE OF General Garfield.

Messrs. A. S. BARNES & CO., of New York, have now ready the LIFE OF GENERAL JAMES A. GARFIELD, by Major J. M. BUNDY, the well-known editor of the New York Evening Mail. The work is issued in the very best style, and is elaborately illustrated. It has been the aim alike of the author and the publisher to present to the American people a biography of the Republican standard-bearer which would have claims to public attention not usually possessed by ephemeral campaign productions. In addition to various other illustrations, it is enriched with a full-length steel portrait by Hall, the eminent engraver, from a recent picture taken at the suggestion of the publishers; a portrait of General Garfield in his youth, and a portrait of him as he appeared when he first entered the Army as Colonel of an Ohio regiment.

Major Bundy, from his intimate personal relations with Mr. Garfield, has enjoyed superior advantages in the preparation of his work. He has taken down from the lips of Mr. Garfield himself the story of his early life and its struggles; he has had free access to Mr. Garfield's private and official correspondence, and has been aided and assisted with the loving zeal of Mr. Garfield's life-long friends and acquaintances in the desire and effort to make this the standard and authoritative record of the great Republican leader.

Major Bundy is recognized all over the country as an able, forcible, and picturesque writer, as well as a profound political student, and his work will undoubtedly take high rank among the best political memoirs of recent times. The story of General Garfield's life is singularly full of romance. It is a life which in itself illustrates the highest possibilities of American citizenship, and should kindle in the heart of every citizen, particularly in the heart of every young man of this generation, a glowing affection for his country and its institutions. This story, as told in the charming narrative of Major Bundy, is as fascinating as any romance.

Mr. Bundy, recognizing the true significance of the approaching contest, has wisely emphasized the statesmanlike qualities of his subject. General Garfield's career in the halls of Congress is accordingly treated here more fully than it can possibly be treated in any other work at the present day; for not only have all the various sources of information already mentioned been fully explored, but the author has had turned over to him for use in the preparation of his work a large number of the General's private letters to his constituents and others (among which appears his correspondence with Mr. B. A. Hinsdale, of Hiram College), covering all the years of his public life, which fully explain and illustrate the position he occupied upon all the great questions that have come before the country during the past fifteen years.

The work is in every respect most complete and authentic. Its value as an assistant in the present campaign cannot be overestimated. It will furnish to voters and to public speakers such a body of facts, such a wealth of incident and anecdote, such an array of noble and elevated sentiments from the public speeches and private letters of Mr. Garfield (material that cannot be found elsewhere), that it may well be called the Republican vade-mecum.

Secrets of the Great Whiskey Ring.

Containing a complete Exposure of the Illicit Whiskey Frauds culminating in 1875, and the connection of Grant, Babcock, Douglas, Chester H. Krum, and other Administration Officers, established by positive and unequivocal documentary proofs, comprising fac-similes of confidential letters and telegrams, emanating from the White House, directing the management of the Ring. Portraits of Gen. Grant, Gen. Babcock, Gen. Garfield, Ex-Sec. Bristow, Gen. John B. Henderson, and the famous "Sylph." To which is added the Missing Links in the chain of evidence of James A. Garfield's implication with the District of Columbia Ring and the Crédit-Mobilier steal. By Gen. John McDonald, formerly Supervisor of Internal Revenue for the District comprising Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Kansas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico.

What the St. Louis press says, after looking at the advance-sheets:

"It is a shameful showing of corruption, rascality, and cupidity. The flood of new light which is here presented to the country may have the effect of reopening the cases of some gentlemen who fancied that they had passed from public view—notably that of Gen. Babcock."

"John McDonald's knowledge of the relations of the party to the Ring, of the Ring to the party, and of both to the Grant Administration in 1875, made his position important then and his revelations of value now."—Springfield Republican, Aug. 9, 1880.

"In the course of his narrative General McDonald abundantly redeems the promise to lay bare the secrets of the Rings. He deals with the names of those who have stood high at Washington and here in St. Louis, but who escaped during the exposures at the time. No such terrible arraignment of leading men ever made its appearance in this country."—St. Louis Daily Times, Aug. 7.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 26, 1880.

The Week.

THE great Republican "find" of the week has been a passage in a speech of Wade Hampton's at Staunton, Va. He is reported by two of the local papers to have requested his hearers to think how Lee and Jackson would have voted at the coming election, and "to remember that the principles they died for are again on trial to-day." On this getting abroad he supplied to the press his own version of his remarks, in which the only allusion to Lee and Jackson is contained in the question, "Will the men who followed Lee and Jackson sacrifice the Democratic party, sacrifice the South, etc.?" Usually a man's own version of what he said is accepted as either a correct report of what he did say, or as a correct account of what he intended to say. In either case it destroys the effect of what he is reported to have said, by showing that he did not think it a true or wise thing to say. It is, however, just now so important that Hampton should have said what he is reported to have said, as supporting the "Solid South" and "secession" cries, that he finds he cannot escape by any correction, and the original report is published daily by the Tribune in leaded type. He very probably did speak as first reported; the evidence on this point seems strong. What he said, too, was in part true: Lee and Jackson if alive to-day would, everybody feels sure, vote for Hancock; and "the principles they died for," so far as known, were the principles that a man's first allegiance is due to his State and that his State has a right to secede from the Union. These principles, however, have been considerably modified by the war, as everybody knows; so far modified that Lee and Jackson would hardly recognize them if they saw them now, and would never think of dying for them. So that when an orator says they "are on trial again" he says a somewhat empty and very rhetorical thing, which political opponents who had a strong case of their own would be very willing to let him withdraw or change as much as he pleased. The frantic eagerness to hold on to it displayed by some of our Republican contemporaries, like the exposure of the English mortgages, has a painful appearance of poverty which cannot but be injurious to their own party. The Hampton speech is a good little thing in its way; but it's a poor thing to go round with as your dearest earthly possession.

There seems to be no limit to the things out of which "political capital" may be made. Some negro voters in this city announced their intention to vote against Garfield because Governor Cornell refused to pardon Cox, while the Italians resolved to avenge the execution of Balbo in the same way. Under an act of the Connecticut Legislature, passed last year, the State Board of Health has ordered an examination of the employees of the State railroads in regard to color-blindness and visual power—a most necessary measure, considering the enormous increase of traffic on all the lines and the extent to which the safety of passengers is dependent on the capacity of the officials to see distinctly and distinguish colors clearly. An examination was accordingly begun last week on the New York and New Haven line by experts of the highest order, and two men, an engineer and conductor, were found defective. Two more were found defective on the Shore line, and then came the mass-meeting, and the petition, and the "intense excitement," and "the pressure," and then an order from the Board of Health to the doctors to stop the examination. The Democrats have now taken the matter up, and declare that as the law was passed by a Republican legislature it must needs help the Democrats this fall, and, in fact, has ensured them the State at the Presidential election. They maintain that the tests applied by the experts are European and monarchical tests devised by rich men, and that they cannot and ought not to be applied to the eyes of poor men in a democratic country. The examination will probably not be resumed until after the election, as otherwise the color-blind vote would all go to Hancock. We think it would in any case. Whittaker's case, which is now before the Secretary of War, has been indefinitely postponed, probably for a similar reason. His friend, Professor Greener, has asked for a court-martial for him, which he certainly ought to have if he wants it, but it would hardly do to have him found guilty either in September or October.

The old story about the payment for the slaves emancipated by the war, and of the man in Georgia and several men in other States who have filed lists of the slaves so emancipated at the county clerk's office, with a view to claiming the value when the Democrats come into power, has come up again this week. This is probably the oldest campaign story now in use, and, considering the service it has rendered, it looks remarkably bright and fresh. The estimated value of the slaves, at an average of $300 a head, is $1,200,000,000, which is to be raised, in case of Hancock's election, either by loan or taxation. The best we can hope for is that the Democrats will not raise it all by taxation in one year. Common humanity suggests that they should borrow a part of it. We ought to add that Democrats will pay none of it themselves. It will be raised exclusively from Republicans, and only in the Northern States. This fact, which has not as yet been mentioned, is important. It accounts for the eagerness to pay for the slaves which Democratic voters now try in vain to conceal. Their own share, if they were honest and decent, would be $600,000,000, and if they had to meet it the ex-slaveholders might whistle for the money; but the plan of putting all on to the Republicans makes them quite restless.

General Butler has at last caused it to be announced that he is going to return to the Democratic party, and the touching ceremony is to take place publicly at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, on Saturday next. In order, however, that he may not be suspected of unworthy motives he has also caused it to be announced that this year he does not seek the nomination for the governorship. and will fill the place of an humble worker in the great cause by taking the stump for Hancock. There appears to be some doubt whether his advocacy will be beneficial or not, but he is said to be going to quiet the committee on that score by paying his own expenses. His oratory must surely be worth something if it costs nothing. His departure will be a considerable relief to the Republicans, as his former high standing in the party and his retention of a certain Republican following, including Simmons, the Grant Collector of the Port, made even his nominal adhesion a source of considerable embarrassment. That a man of mature age, who was at one time so well grounded in Stalwart principles, and had made himself so terrible to rebels and ex-rebels, should deliberately quit the true church, is, however, no matter from what point of view we look at it, a most distressing circumstance. He must be as honest and patriotic now as he was when Senator Dawes was stumping for him on the theory that his election to Congress was necessary to put a stop to the wholesale murder of negroes, which, according to him, was constantly going on at the South. He will, however, be a very amusing Democrat, and thus meet one great want of the Democratic party—that of "a funny man."

The Republican State Committee of Alabama have put forth an address to the country on the subject of frauds at the late election. It is in the main a well-considered document, and its specifications call for categorical disproof by the victorious party. It opens with a statement of the Democratic modifications of the election law made with a view to the greatest laxity in voting and counting, and then passes to details. The law still provides that the board of inspectors shall contain representatives of both parties, but the Republican nominations were disregarded at pleasure, and a colored inspector was generally chosen for his stupidity and the consequent greater ease of cheating. Some of the tricks described, such as putting out the candle and then stuffing the ballot-box, read like a parlor amusement for children, and in this light the whites evidently regarded the colored assistants and voters. When the poll was overwhelmingly against the Democrats, sometimes the majority would be announced to the expectant crowd and then suppressed in the counting; sometimes a white militia company would be sent for to disperse an alleged mob, before the count was undertaken; and again, a trumped-up charge of disorder would be made by the Democratic inspectors, the polls closed, and the election declared invalid. In short, neither conscience nor bodily fear characterized the behavior of the whites, and the report says, no doubt with perfect truth, that "the people are as much opposed to negro suffrage now as they ever were, and, while professedly accepting the Constitutional Amendment, do not regard it as an offence morally to take advantage of the timidity and ignorance of the negro to nullify his vote." A table embodied in the report shows how the Republican majority in Montgomery County is regularly sustained at Federal and reversed at State elections—an argument, as far as it goes, in favor of Federal supervision at the former, but perhaps not a fair measure of fraud and intimidation, considering the fluctuations of "off years."

The arrival of Mr. Thomas Hughes, in company with a number of English gentlemen and ladies, with and without titles, who are interested in a colonization scheme in Tennessee, has recalled the circumstances which led to the Boston "Board of Aid to Land Ownership" being formed in 1877, and to its afterwards passing into the hands of Mr. Hughes and his associates, for quite a different object. The Boston notion was a philanthropic device for relieving the prevailing hard times by facilitating the transfer of population from cities back to the country, in order to earn a subsistence by agriculture. Naturally, this contemplated the improvement of the poorer classes. The Board went so far as to make a thorough examination of all parts of the West and South with reference especially to a New England immigration, and concluded that the high table-land of Eastern Tennessee offered the most healthy and fertile and minerally rich location for the proposed colony. Beyond this nothing was done, and the necessity diminished with the disappearance of the hard times. The Board's English successors have actually secured a large acreage on the Kentucky border, and have begun to lay out, not far from the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, a settlement which is designed to attract struggling English tenant-farmers, and the sons of the gentry and of the well-to-do mercantile and manufacturing class, who find a home career difficult on account of competition. The colony starts, then, under excellent patronage, with a high grade of population, sufficiently homogeneous, and isolated from the social and political influences of the vicinity without being remote from its markets. Its value will clearly be as a nucleus for opening up a much wider region, and drawing thither not only an humbler class from England, but certainly at no distant day as good Northern stock as is to be found in New England. Meantime, the State's casting its vote in favor of honest payment of its debts will do much to encourage the present enterprise and to hasten future similar ones.

We expressed the opinion last week that the Times's Indiana correspondent would, if he were not interfered with, get at the bottom of the Indiana conspiracy. He has done it in less time than we thought he would, and communicates the result in a letter published in the Times last Monday. Some of his inferences we think are erroneous, but the strength of his imagination is a guarantee for the accuracy of his facts. The letter contains a good deal of denunciation of the Nation and of all "ignorant journalists," and asserts that our suggestion of a corrupt combination between the Republicans and Democrats with regard to the Constitutional Amendments is unsound. It gives the history of the litigation as follows: The "test case," it seems, was made up in New Albany. Whether this is of itself a suspicious circumstance or not we do not know, but presume that making up a test case in such a place must be almost a badge of fraud in itself. It was made up as a suit against the Inspector of Elections (a Democrat) by one James V. Kelso (a Democratic lawyer). Kelso "gave the case in charge" to one John H. Stotzenberg (a leading Democratic attorney). In short, as the Times correspondent shows, "it was a Democratic affair throughout." Even before the case was tried a Democratic sheet announced that the amendments would be declared not adopted by the Supreme Court. The lower court, "of course," held the amendments to have been validly adopted, this being "necessary" to allow the other side to appeal—a new fact in the case, showing that political corruption has tainted the lower as well as the higher tribunals in Indiana. This, however, might have been anticipated; it is impossible to keep the lower courts pure if the courts of appeal are once tainted. The case came to the Supreme Court, "and here for the first time the Republican attorneys appear." Why they appeared the correspondent does not state, but he adds a fact which, to our mind, throws a flood of light upon the case: Mr. Stotzenberg "was given the preparation of the appeal papers."

It is almost needless to add that "when the Republican attorneys came to look at the record" it was discovered that Mr. Stotzenberg had submitted to the court as one of the "agreed facts" that at the April election the township trustee vote had been considerably larger than the amendment vote. We cannot agree with the correspondent that this "was a very singular thing for Mr. Stotzenberg to have done," because Mr. Stotzenberg has been shown to be a Democrat, and consequently a bad man. But it was certainly a very strange thing for the Republican counsel to allow their opponent to draw up an agreed statement of facts for them unless there was a corrupt understanding. The motive for such an understanding may be difficult to get at, but the correspondent has laid bare the facts, and they cannot be explained away. Of the petition for the rehearing the correspondent repeats his previous account. In conclusion he calls attention to the fact that "this whole matter has been cooked up and managed in New Albany for some reason"—one of the majority judges even goes so far as to live in New Albany. He points out, too, that the Albany Law Journal's article does not settle the law. We trust he will not allow impatience with our ignorance of the case to prevent his continuing his good work. He is on the spot, and can find out what Stotzenberg is doing if anybody can. All we can do is to draw inferences from the facts as he establishes them, and it occurs to us that the case, as he states it, tends to show a conspiracy between the leaders of the two parties in Indiana—for what purpose, of course, we do not know; otherwise why was Stotzenberg allowed to admit facts which enabled the judges to render their infamous decision? We hope the Times will ultimately make known its correspondent's name; perhaps it would interfere with his usefulness to do so at present. We need not say that meanwhile we shall trust that the unseemly license given to Stotzenberg may be explained away.

Nearly one million and a half dollars of foreign gold arrived here from Europe during the week, and a great deal more is on the way. This has happened, too, when the rates of foreign exchange were not low enough to show a clear profit in buying gold at the ruling price in the foreign markets and selling it at current prices here as a commodity. Foreign exchange has so ruled, however, that there was no loss in using gold rather than bills, and the result is an important present and prospective acquisition of gold by this country. At the close of the week foreign exchange was so "heavy" that a further decline in rates seemed imminent. Notwithstanding the gain of foreign gold, the New York banks continue to lose in reserve. The surplus has gone down to $7,300,000, and in view of the large demands for money incident to the great business activity several schemes have been canvassed for relieving the autumn money market. The most important of these is one by which the Treasury shall substitute "coin" for the $34,000,000 fund of legal-tender notes held in the Treasury for one account and another of the banks. At the Stock Exchange the week has been dull and uneventful, although at the close a ripple of activity was caused in the stock market by the announcement, on good but not official authority, that a new trunk-line is to be created, in the interest of the Wabash system of roads, by extending the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western road from Binghamton to Buffalo. This would make a route from thirty to fifty miles shorter than the Erie and the New York Central, and would practically make the docks at Hoboken the eastern terminus of the Wabash system of roads. The Bank of England did not advance its discount rate (2½ per cent.), but the Imperial Bank of Germany did put its rate up 1 per cent. Silver bullion in London declined to 52½*d.* per ounce; and the bullion value of the silver dollar here fell to 87¾ cents ($0.8778). The scarcity of currency is having the effect of driving these dollars into circulation, and the demand on the Treasury for them has been larger during the last week than for a long time before.

The news from Ireland does not change in character. There are still reports of Fenian drilling and of the landing and distribution of arms, in which there is apparently more or less truth; but some of the stories, such as the placing of gunpowder in a tunnel under the Cork barracks, are clearly sensational, and intended to frighten the authorities. The Government has been asked what it intends to do in any case, owing to the defeat of the Compensation Bill, if landlords in the distressed districts attempt to evict for non-payment of rent. Mr. Forster has answered unhesitatingly that they mean to enforce the law. The constabulary has accordingly been reinforced by a strong regiment of marines. In fact, any hesitation on the part of the Ministry on this point would lead to a general refusal of rent everywhere, and the practical spoliation of the whole landlord class. But strong appeals are being made by the press to the landlords not to insist on their full rights, in the interest of their own class, as well as in that of public peace. Many of them, in fact most, are between the devil and the deep sea, as most estates are saddled with liabilities under wills and marriage settlements which must be met, rent or no rent.

A weighty and most valuable contribution to the literature of the Irish land question has been made in the Fortnightly Review by Judge Longfield, who was for many years, if he is not still, judge of the Encumbered Estates Courts, established after 1847, and whose practical acquaintance with the subject probably surpasses that of any man now living. He acknowledges that the position of the Irish landlords is at present very precarious. They have property without political power to defend it, and that property is an object of envy to electors who in case of spoliation will know exactly what share of the spoils will fall to themselves. He therefore proposes, as a concession to justice, the extension over the whole island of what he calls a "parliamentary tenant-right"—that is, the legal recognition of the interest of the tenant in the land, equivalent to seven years' rent; the rent to be adjusted every ten years by the parties themselves. If at the period of adjustment they could not agree—that is, if the landlord asked a higher rent than the tenant was willing to pay—the landlord could take possession of the land on paying the tenant seven times the amount of the rent demanded. If, on the other hand, the tenant offered a lower rent than the landlord was willing to receive, the tenant on surrendering the farm would only receive seven times the amount he offered. It can be easily seen how this arrangement would work to prevent any wide divergence of views about the rent. Into the other details of the scheme we have not space to enter here, but that it or something like it will be embodied in legislation during the coming winter there can hardly be a doubt.

The state of Mr. Gladstone's health has, of course, a depressing effect on all Ministerial action, and is a serious loss in the matter of the Indian finance, in which a confusion reigns which nobody but himself seems competent to put to rights. But in another way it has helped the Cabinet by the evidence of his immense popularity which it has evoked. This popularity is so great that it has cowed his bitterest enemies into an appearance of concern and even of anxiety. No English statesman since Pitt has been honored and trusted by the mass of the English people as he now is. The recognition of his real greatness is so general that the London feeling about him during the Beaconsfield tenure of office has an almost comic aspect as one looks back on it. There is an aspect of it, however, which is not comic: it seems to indicate a separation in feeling and mental outlook between the wealthy and professional classes in London and the rest of the nation of the most extraordinary and grave kind, considering how much the Government for the time being, as Mr. Gladstone in one of his magazine articles has pointed out, is influenced by the former.

General Roberts, with his ten thousand—exclusive of camp-followers, almost equally numerous—has by this time perhaps ceased to be "in the air": according to a letter from the commander at Kelat-i-Ghilzai he was expected to reach that place on August 24. Amir Abdurrahman, on the 19th, reported favorably concerning the same army's advance in the first ten days. No resistance had been met with in the Logar Valley or at the gates of Ghazni, but the statement is suspicious that the "Sirdar of Ghazni, who was hostile, had fled," and still more so is another report, according to which Mohammed Jan and Hashim Khan, the leaders of the Yakub Khan party in that central region, were hovering around General Roberts's flanks. These chiefs had been acting ostensibly in the interest of the captive ex-Amir's young son Musa, but they and Ayub Khan, Musa's uncle, may easily make common cause or act in concert for the moment, and if Ayub is strong and energetic enough to check Roberts's march in front, a movement in the rear might still become exceedingly perilous to the latter. But it is more probable that Ayub will fritter away his time and forces by simultaneous or successive attempts, without vigor, at reducing Kandahar and attacking both Roberts and Phayre, who advance from different sides against him. At least the meagre and fragmentary accounts which reach Simla from the theatre of the war, chiefly via Quettah, seem to indicate a decidedly desultory course of action on the part of the victor of Kushk-i-Nakhud. The natural difficulties in the way of the relieving enterprises, however, are, as will be seen in our correspondence on another page, great, and Kandahar—blockaded, cannonaded, and poorly provisioned—needs speedy succor. This is best proved by the desperate sortie made on the 16th against a village on the east face of the city, which, though successful, cost the besieged about two hundred men in killed alone, including several officers of high rank. Phayre's movements are as yet more tentative than real, owing to lack of strength and transportation, as well as to the active hostility of the neighboring tribes; but Roberts, having no base, cannot afford to be slow, and the fate of the isolated garrisons—which involves that of his own army—must soon be decided.

The question raised in this country as to the claims of the insurance companies on the money received for the Alabama damages has come before the English courts in the case of Bernard agt. Rodocanachi. The defendant had some tobacco insured which was captured by the Alabama, and he recovered from the United States the amount of the difference between his insurance and the value of his tobacco. For this sum he has been sued by the underwriter, and has been ordered to pay over. We presume he had technically "abandoned" the tobacco when he was paid his insurance, but the English Court of Equity did not, before granting his claim, require the underwriter to show whether he had not on the whole made money by taking war risks, and did not recognize the doctrine that the money paid by the United States was a pure sovereign benevolence, to which the principles of maritime insurance did not apply.

Gambetta has been making another of the speeches which produce a little sensation throughout Europe, not unlike that wrought by the late Emperor's chance sayings to ambassadors at the Imperial Court. He went down to Cherbourg to the local fête, on the 9th inst., in company with M. Grévy, who, though President of the Republic, found himself in the awkward position of being only the second lion of the occasion. Gambetta's utterances were somewhat obscure, but the audience apparently found no difficulty in interpreting such phrases as "There are times in the history of peoples when right undergoes eclipses"; at such times "they should wait in calmness with their hands and arms free at home as abroad. Grand reformation may issue from right. We or our children may hope for it, for the future is forbidden to none." "It is no warlike spirit which inspires this worship [of the army]. It is that we may reckon on the future, and know whether there be in things here below an inevitable justice which comes at its due time." The North German Gazette, while treating these sentiments as those of M. Gambetta himself, and not those of the country, says they have given rise to "a feeling of astonishment and sincere regret" in Germany, as showing that "the war party in France has numerous adherents in the ranks of the Republicans," and adds that if this talk means that France, under the leadership of Gambetta, is going to continue the traditions of the Bourbons and the Bonapartes, the Germans will be obliged to familiarize themselves with the idea that their western frontier remains insecure.

HOW TO ENSURE THE ROTATION OF PARTIES.

THE only fresh contribution to the political thought of the day made either by the Democratic platform or by the letters of the Democratic candidates is Mr. English's proposition that no party ought to remain in power longer than twenty years. We presume that if he had expounded it more fully he would have maintained that even twenty years are too many, and that a still shorter term would be desirable in the interests of that purity of administration to which he says long possession of the Government by one party is fatal. It is a great pity that we are not to hear more from him before the election on this theme, because it is a much more fruitful one than his short discussion of it would lead us to infer. If a party remains in power so long as twenty years, it must be due either to the fact that people like it and think it a good party, or to the fact that although they are convinced of its badness, they have no ready means of turning it out of office. So that Mr. English would have greatly increased the value of his letter if he had explained more fully why it is the Republicans have remained so long in possession of the Government. It cannot be, on his own showing, because they have commended themselves to the country by good administration. According to his account no more dangerous or corrupt organization ever managed the affairs of a free country. He would be the last man, too, to tell his constituents that the Republicans stayed in office because the people could not see their badness. No such explanation would find acceptance for one moment among Democrats. The Republican party must then have been enabled to retain its long hold on power by the absence of any effective means of ousting it, or, in other words, by the difficulty of bringing public opinion into action against it. Now, he was bound to tell us in what this difficulty consists. Why is it that the American people, of all peoples on earth, cannot change its rulers, when it ceases to trust them, inside a quarter of a century? If we took him unawares with this question he would undoubtedly answer that it was owing to the enormous electioneering force exerted in its favor by a huge army of officials who are compelled to "work" for it, not simply as a duty they owe to their superiors, but as a means of keeping their places and earning their bread. Having gone as far as this, he would have to go further, and tell us what he, as a reformer, proposed in order to put a stop, at once and for ever, to an abuse which removed the American Government further away from the operation of popular disapproval than any constitutional government now in existence. But on this point he has not offered a single suggestion.

Nor does he tell us how the Democratic party, if it gets into power next year, is to be got out before 1901. That the Democratic party will become corrupt by that time, at the furthest, he virtually admits. He says long tenure of office corrupts all parties. He ought, therefore, to have given some hint, at least, as to the means by which we are to expel the Democrats from office when we find their virtue giving way. But his letter contains nothing of the kind. What it proposes is simply that we should put in power another set of men, of essentially the same character and antecedents as the Republicans, to run the same course, encounter the same temptations, and yield to them in the same fashion at the end of the same period. If corruption is sure at the end of twenty years, we ought to be supplied with the means of cutting the term down to ten or eight years. The stock of virtue the Democrats now have on hand would probably last for two Presidential terms, but, as they are human, Mr. English will hardly maintain that it will last much longer, under the conditions which have led the Republicans into iniquity.

Now, if the Democratic Convention had produced Mr. English's theory, and proved their sincerity by a bold offer to legislate in support of it by proposing to do away with all laws or usages or practices which prevent the voter from getting directly at the Government, and making his vote tell on it promptly, they would undoubtedly have produced a profound impression. In the presence of such declarations the vagueness and windiness of General Hancock's letter would have done them no harm. If, for instance, after acknowledging and deploring the difficulty of making a clean sweep of the Administration when it has lost the confidence of the country, the Convention had promised to make newly-elected Congresses meet promptly after election instead of a half year or a year after it; had promised to deprive the party in power of the means of corrupting public opinion or foiling its action which lies in the employment of eighty thousand Government officers as electioneering agents; to forbid the taxation of Government employees for the maintenance of a fund to be used in preventing any change, and of the disposition of which no public account is ever rendered; to raise the Government officials above intimidation or corruption by giving them reasonable fixity of tenure; to forbid the restriction of the subordinate Government offices, for whose maintenance all citizens pay, to the members of any one party by the use of any political test or through the influence of the Congressmen of one party exclusively—if it had done all this it would have made a genuine, and we have no doubt exciting, demand at least on the confidence of the 2,000,000 young men who this year will for the first time vote the Presidential ticket. They would have freshened the political stream with new waters, which hundreds of thousands would have drunk and felt cured of the unutterable weariness which party warfare during the last ten years has been breeding. They might in this way have induced people to believe that "a change" was really within their reach; for Mr. English is right in saying that people would like a change. Everybody likes a change now and then, and in no sphere of human activity would a change at this moment be more welcome than in politics. But the misfortune is that our Democratic friends talk of change but offer none. Their platform was a mass of the old verbiage slightly altered in arrangement; General Hancock's letter reads like the opening chapter in a child's political primer; and Mr. English proposes that we shall allow the Democrats to perform before us for twenty years some of the old Republican tricks, which he naïvely admits will at the end of that time convert the Democrats into great rascals and leave the voters in much the same state in which they are now.

The same thing may be said, mutatis mutandis, of the currency question. The Republicans have not made a very remarkable display of statesmanship on that subject. If they had let the silver coinage alone until they had ascertained the drift of opinion and policy with regard to the double standard in other countries, and had withdrawn the greenbacks as fast as they were redeemed, leaving a really elastic currency of gold and national-bank notes to take their place, there would be now no currency question to trouble us at all. As it is we are threatened with a crisis of some kind, no one yet knows exactly what, by the immense accumulation of silver coin, and by the assumption by the Government, in a hap-hazard way, of the functions of a bank of issue. Had the Republican party come to the resumption of specie payments as part of a well-considered financial policy, the act which provided for resumption would have left none of these subsidiary problems to vex us. But the fact is the party had no well-considered financial policy. It drifted into resumption rather than deliberately resumed. An opposition, therefore, which offered the country, instead of this shifting, happy-go-lucky mode of dealing with the public finances, a clean-cut, comprehensible body of financial doctrine, expressed in the language in use among business men, would undoubtedly offer "a change" which, to a large number of voters, would be very attractive. But there is not, either in the Democratic platform or in the letters of acceptance, a trace of anything of the kind. Every knotty question of finance now before the country is successfully evaded by the use of such vague, and, in fact, meaningless, phrases as "honest money" and "sound currency," and Mr. English so far stultifies himself as to pretend that gold and silver are of equal value, and that you can issue paper which will equally well represent both together.

In short, what the Democratic party promises us is, at best, in this field also, not change but a continuance of the lazy confidence in the good luck of the American people and the abundance of the crops, which has done so much to mar the financial administration of the party now in possession of the offices, but most probably without that sense of responsibility for the public credit which the Republican party, as the creator of the national debt, has always shown. We have no doubt whatever that the party which first promises a real change will get possession of the Government and keep it for many years. The Republican party obtained power in this way, by offering to the imagination of the generation then coming on the stage the promise of something new. This promise it has undoubtedly fulfilled. The party which is to succeed it will have to win in the same way.

Its platforms and letters will, like those of the Republican party in its early days, have no juggles, or doubles ententes, or sonorous evasions in them. They will be simple and sincere and plain. They will use about finance and the currency and the tariff the speech of business men. If we do not greatly mistake, they will acknowledge with the utmost boldness that the theory which makes Government employees the servants of the party in power only, and the henchmen of senators and representatives, is neither more nor less than a new form of political dry rot, which threatens the ruin of democratic institutions. We venture to say that Dr. Bushnell's prophecy, uttered now forty years ago, will find a prominent place in its campaign documents, and will furnish the moral enthusiasm without which no party in these days of vast constituencies can hope to triumph. We quoted it last week, but it will bear quoting every week, and here it is again:

"This doctrine, which proposes to give the spoils to the victors, has been imputed mostly to one of our political parties, and, as some suppose, has been avowed by that party. Of this I am willing to doubt. We shall see, perhaps, how far the opposing party will abjure this doctrine of the spoils, and whether it is not yet to be the universal doctrine of politics in the land. If so, then shall we have a scene in this land never before exhibited on earth—one which would destroy the integrity and sink the morality of a nation of angels. It will be as if so many offices, worth so much, together with the seamless robe of our glorious Constitution, were held up to be the price of victory, and as if it were said: 'Look, ye people, here is a premium offered to every discontent you can raise, every combination or faction you can mention, every lie you can invent. Cupidity here is every man's right; try for what you can, and as much as you can get you shall have.' Only conceive such a lure held out to this great people, and all the little offices of the Government thus set up for the price of the victory, without regard to merit or anything but party services, and you have a spectacle of baseness and rapacity such as was never seen before. No preaching of the Gospel in our land, no parental discipline, no schools, not all the machinery of virtue together, can long be a match for the corrupting power of our political strifes, actuated by such a law as this."

DIFFICULTIES OF THE EUROPEAN CONCERT.

THE most serious result of the disaster to the British arms in Afghanistan is probably its effect on the efforts which the Gladstone Ministry is making to secure concert of action between the European Powers for the coercion of Turkey. It is the more serious because the signs are rapidly multiplying that, in default either of united coercion or coercion by some one Power, there will be an outbreak in Turkey itself, which would inevitably bring on a general conflagration. Accordingly, the "Eastern Question" is overshadowing European politics to-day to a degree which has not been witnessed since the Greek Revolution. It is now an undisputed fact that while the Powers are arguing with Turkey the Montenegrins, the Bulgarians, the Macedonians, and the Eastern Rumelians are getting ready to fight, and that in their preparations they have not only the secret sympathy of Russia, but substantial help in the way of officers and arms. It is not likely, and certainly not probable, that any such help is coming from the Russian Government directly; but what happened in Servia in 1876 shows what can be done in this line by enthusiastic individual Russian sympathizers and volunteers. Neither the Bulgarians nor the Rumelians have ever accepted the division imposed on them by the Treaty of Berlin, or have ever concealed their intention of getting rid of it as soon as they were able. It is now openly acknowledged that they think the opportunity for getting rid of it is near at hand, and that the new state they mean to found will consist not simply of Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia, but of the whole or a large part of Macedonia. This opportunity they evidently expect to be offered them by the attempt of Greece, in case the Powers do not compel Turkey to accept the decision of the late Conference, to seize the territory assigned her with her own forces. This would be the signal for a rising all over European Turkey. It might, and even may, be brought on sooner by a precautionary attempt on the part of the Turks, which they seem quite mad enough to make, to exercise the right given them by the Treaty of Berlin to occupy the passes of the Balkans. Should they make it, as they now threaten, it would undoubtedly be resisted furiously by the people both of Rumelia and Bulgaria, and Servia would probably back them up.

Turkey appears likely to hand Dulcigno over to the Montenegrins. She is bound peremptorily by the Treaty of Berlin to do this, and the Powers would, if necessary, join in a "demonstration" of some kind to compel her to do it. But the Treaty does not bind her to change the Greek frontier line. It only recommends her to do so, and she denies the right of the late Supplementary Conference to convert this recommendation into a command, and is still confident apparently that the Powers will not agree in enforcing it as if it were a command. There are now some good reasons for believing that this confidence is not without foundation. Mr. Gladstone has been working hard ever since he came into office to bring about the necessary concert, and he has achieved a certain measure of success as regards Montenegro, but it is pretty plain that he has reached the limits of his powers. There seems to be no doubt of the French refusal to join in any military action on behalf of the Greeks, although France was par excellence the champion of the Greeks at the Berlin Conference. There is more than one reason for this. The French representative at the first Berlin Conference was much hurt by the opposition of Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury to his proposal to make the extension of Greek territory obligatory on the Porte. The mild recommendation which was substituted for it is reported, and not without appearance of truth, to have been contemptuously agreed to by Bismarck as an act of kindness to "poor M. Waddington." If Bismarck felt this it would be characteristic of him to say it, and laugh over it. But this was not all nor the worst. The secret convention concluded by Great Britain with Turkey during the Conference, for the transfer of Cyprus and the protectorate of Asia Minor, gave real offence to the French Government as, in some sense, an act of perfidy, or, at all events, as fatal to a cordial mutual understanding. M. Waddington expressed this feeling in strong terms to the Beaconsfield Ministry, but they concealed the despatch, and, in fact, denied in general terms in the House of Commons that any such sentiments as it contained existed, until they had endeavored to soothe French wounded susceptibilities by a correspondence. It is only within a week or two that this fresh piece of their duplicity has been exposed. They did not succeed, however, in satisfying France, although they apparently got her to accept an apology. If it were not that France is now bent on not taking offence the consequences might have been more serious. Anyhow, enough sting has remained behind to make the French Ministry unwilling to follow or appear to follow England's lead in the East, and they probably chuckle a little over the difficulties which Lord Beaconsfield's great triumph at Berlin has created or left behind. The most powerful motive of all, however, for the French dislike of military intervention in Turkish affairs is the nervousness, some call it, though perhaps timidity would not be too strong a term, about all military adventures, which the late war has caused. Any one who was familiar with the French press before the war, and remembers how constantly it preached the duty, and even necessity, of French intervention and French influence to keep the world in order, and reads now the prosaic and commercial view it takes of the national mission, can hardly believe that it still addresses itself to the same people. There could scarcely be a better evidence of the depth of the impression made by the German invasion on the national imagination, and, we might also add, on the national conscience. In spite of the great size of the army, and the flourishing state of the finances and of trade, there is evidently a deep shrinking from any military enterprise, however trifling, and a deep dread of being led into some sort of serious conflict. The sneers at Mr. Gladstone as an idealist and enthusiast, too, who is carried away by his feelings, with which the Paris newspapers abound, are, to any one who remembers the old French editor who used to claim for France "the glorious privilege of astonishing the world," as curious as anything to be found in recent political literature.

Lord Granville appears to have tried to get France to join him in drawing up another collective note in reply to the answer of the Turks, but France has refused to put herself forward in the matter, and England has had to undertake the task herself. How far Austria, Germany, and Italy will go with her is still uncertain. The latest rumors point to the probability that they also will shrink from coercion. What England will do in that case is an interesting subject of speculation. The present Ministry are virtually pledged to act alone, and were the state of things in Afghanistan more satisfactory, there would be but little doubt that she would do so. That Irish affairs will exercise any real influence on the problem is not at all likely. No Irish disturbance is to be looked for, judging from all recent experience, with which the police cannot deal, and the evident desire and intention of the Government to attempt some radical treatment of the land question must confine any attempt at disturbance to the Fenians, or, in other words, the least formidable body of agitators by which any Government was ever threatened, inasmuch as they do not seem to possess pluck enough for an ordinary street-riot. But the Afghan disaster is really a large cloud on the horizon. It greatly increases the proverbial uncertainty of Afghan affairs, and the effect of it in India, in case it were followed by another check, might be, if not serious, very troublesome. It would not be surprising, therefore, if the Government should hesitate a good deal about laying hold of the Eastern Question in a way likely to make heavy drafts on its military resources, as long as the Afghan trouble is not over. It could hardly undertake to see Greece through her quarrel with the Porte without putting fifteen thousand or twenty thousand men ashore in Thessaly or Epirus; and the difficulty of providing and keeping up such a force in the field when there is any demand for troops elsewhere, in the existing state of the British military organization, has been only too clearly revealed during the last two years of Lord Beaconsfield's mischievous activity. Foreign powers see this, and undoubtedly reckon on it as a reason for thinking that the present show of British enterprise in dealing with Turkey will not result in anything serious, and, therefore, show little readiness to follow England's lead.

That Mr. Gladstone's health has something to do with the suspense of the situation is also very probable. His colleagues would feel reluctant to force on a crisis in the East as long as he was not well enough to take an active part in directing English action in it, and to bear his share in its labors and anxieties. But they are bound by numerous pledges to persist in trying to bring about concerted coercion of the Turk as long as there is the least hope of success—that is, until they have received a categorical denial from every one of the Powers, and that they would not receive one from Russia is very certain. An article in the last Fortnightly, recalling the history of previous attempts at concerted military execution of their joint decisions by the European Powers, is instructive and suggestive as to the future course of events, in showing that in no case in which such coercion has been proposed and exercised have all the Powers concerned agreed to take part in it. In all cases, when the moment came for action, one or more—in some cases all but one—refused to go on. Austria and Prussia refused in this way to join in the coercion of Turkey at the close of the Greek Revolution, and France, England, and Russia acted to put a stop to hostilities. After the fighting had ceased, the Turkish recognition of Greek independence was extracted by Russia alone. The coercion of Holland, on behalf of Belgium, was undertaken by France alone, but with English consent, Austria and Prussia refusing to resort to force. The coercion of Mehemet Ali in like manner, in 1840, was undertaken by England, Russia, Austria, and Prussia; France refusing to join. In 1853, again, the coercion of Russia was participated in at the outset only by France and England, Austria and Prussia first standing aloof, but Austria finally in the second year of the war agreeing to deliver the stroke which compelled Russia to evacuate the Danubian principalities, and transferred the war to the Crimea. What all these cases suggest as now likely to occur is, that the majority of the Powers will hang back from the responsibility of initiating any movement against Turkey; but if one undertakes it alone, others, if not all the others, will speedily join, in order to have a proper share in settling the result. Should England move, and the Turks resist, so as to bring the Sultan's continuance at Constantinople into question, there would undoubtedly be a general and rapid appearance of all the Powers on the scene.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—IV.

THE MORNING ADVERTISER—THE STANDARD.

LONDON, July, 1880.

NEXT in antiquity to the Morning Post is the Morning Advertiser. It shares with it and with the Times the dignity of being a threepenny newspaper. It can hardly be said to appeal to the public in one sense, although it does so very distinctly in the slang meaning which is attached to that term. In other words, the Morning Advertiser is the organ—the barrel-organ, it may be said—of the Licensed Victuallers. It has been so since its first establishment in 1794, and its success depends upon the fact that every member of the Licensed Victuallers' Society—that is to say, nearly every keeper of a hotel or public-house in England—is obliged to subscribe to it. Its career singularly illustrates that combination of beer and Bible, of piety, pugilism, and publicanism, which has been displayed at many general elections. The gentleman whose name has within the past generation been most prominently associated with the Morning Advertiser is the late Mr. James Grant, well known in connection, it cannot be precisely said with literature, but with book-making, as the author of 'Random Recollections' of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords, and of many other things connected with London life; of a work entitled 'The Great Metropolis'; and of two volumes dealing with the history of the newspaper press. The late Mr. Grant's career illustrated the perseverance of Scotchmen, if not the perfervid genius which is sometimes attributed to them. It showed that the determination to succeed is often enough to bring about success without any reference to the intellectual qualities which are usually supposed essential to it. Mr. Grant, before he was editor of the Morning Advertiser, had been assistant editor to Bell's Life in London—a journal of the prize-ring. He was remarkable for his stern Evangelicism in religious opinion, and in this way illustrated that connection of pugilism, publicanism, and piety which has always been the characteristic of the Morning Advertiser. Mr. Grant had such knowledge of politics as is implied in a familiarity with the Reporters' Gallery, but his ignorance of all that lay outside the range of the lobby of the House of Commons and the vestry of the Presbyterian Church was large and comprehensive. In his day the Morning Advertiser was the selected dupe of the tribe of hoaxers. Indecent and profane inscriptions in Greek, purporting to have been found on newly-discovered tablets and monuments, were a form of ribald academic jesting of which Mr. Grant was the victim. He usually excused himself when the "bite," as it would have been called in Addison's time, was exposed by pleading that he was not well acquainted with "the Lawten," as Mr. Grant called the language of the Romans. Mr. James Grant did not succeed in permanently maintaining his difficult relations with the Committee of Licensed Victuallers who edited the paper over his head, and whose ignorance of men and things made Mr. Grant appear by comparison an accomplished scholar and a well-informed man of the world. On his retiring from the editorship he was succeeded by a gentleman of some note in literature and of a certain bustling power of achieving notoriety, Mr. Alfred Bate Richards. Mr. Richards, who for some reason or other preferred to call himself Colonel Richards, having held a position probably in the reserve forces which entitled him by indulgence to that designation, claimed in competition with some score of others to be the author of the Volunteer movement. He was always nearly succeeding in various enterprises, but never quite succeeded. He wrote a play called "Cromwell," which approached poetry if not closely, yet, as Mr. Gladstone would say, at a measurable distance, and which had some qualifications, but not, as proved on experience, sufficient qualifications for success on the stage. It was probably superior to Lord John Russell's "Don Carlos," a tragedy, and to Mr. Disraeli's "Don Alarcos," and if Mr. Richards had resembled either of those eminent statesmen in their political success his dramatic attempt would have preserved that sort of interest which attaches to the poems of Frederic the Great and to Goethe's speculations on color. The failures in other departments of men who have succeeded in one order of thought or action are always secularly interesting. Mr. Bate Richards wrote letters upon contemporary politics which suggested to you the idea of a man who had an ambition to be a Burke or a Junius, but who unfortunately had only the ambition. The Morning Advertiser in his hands was the organ of a certain premature Jingoism which in its way illustrates the connection of publicanism and pugnacity—in this case taking the form not of pugilism but of an aggressive and alarmed patriotism. On Mr. Richards's death he was succeeded by the present editor of the Morning Advertiser, Captain Hamber, who was formerly editor of the Standard. Captain Hamber is an experienced and able journalist, but political journalism in any legitimate sense of the term is scarcely possible in a newspaper whose motto of necessity must be the Licensed Victuallers first and everything else afterwards. The principal leader-writer of the Morning Advertiser is understood to be Mr. Charles Williams, who unites with this office that of the editor of the Examiner.

The mention of Captain Hamber's name suggests that of the journal which he formerly conducted. The Standard is the oldest of the morning penny papers now in existence. It was established in 1827 as an evening journal in the Protestant interest, then alarmed by the impending removal of Roman Catholic disabilities. It was, in fact, the evening edition of the Morning Herald, a journal which it has survived, and, like it, was the property of Mr. Baldwin. Its first editor was Dr. Gifford, an Irishman, and a Protestant as only Irishmen and Scotchmen can be Protestants. That is to say, he was a man whose whole creed, political and religious, consisted in vehement and passionate negation of everything that the Church of Rome asserted. The Standard under his management was simply a protest and a defiance addressed to every Liberal measure and statesman. Of course it was easy to find literary instruments for any sort of work that had to be done, and Dr. Maginn, who was not troubled with any very strong convictions of his own, had no objection to defending as fiercely as might be the convictions of Dr. Gifford, or whoever his paymaster of the day might be. The Captain Shandon of Thackeray's sketch recalls the conditions of debt, drink, and imprisonment under which the highly moral and conservative articles of Dr. Maginn were composed. The minor poet, who by a sort of mental irony bore the incongruous Christian names and surname of Alaric Attila Watts, was Dr. Gifford's sub-editor. What there was in common between the bard of the Dissenting conventicles who sang "Let dogs delight," etc., and the barbarous marauders whose names were prefixed to his, is a question which it is interesting momentarily to entertain, but which it is not necessary to solve: it suggests pleasant speculations as to the mental characteristics of the humorous and slightly cynical paternal and maternal Watts. Up to the year 1846 the Standard, under Dr. Gifford's editorship, was steady in its support of the successive Conservative administrations of Sir Robert Peel, but when the potato disease in Ireland converted that statesman to free-trade (such are the methods of persuasion which act in England upon what are called practical minds) the Standard refused to follow him. It became the organ of Lord Derby and the Protectionists, and it shared their political decline. Mr. Edwin Baldwin, who had succeeded his father as proprietor of the Standard and of the Morning Herald, found his way into the bankruptcy court, and the Standard was purchased in these favorable circumstances by the late Mr. James Johnson, then one of the officers of the court, in whose family the proprietorship of it still remains. It was presently converted into a morning paper. Published in the first instance at fourpence, the price was reduced by successive stages to twopence and to a penny—this latest, and it may be supposed the final, point having been reached in 1858. Under the editorship of Captain Hamber the paper achieved a considerable political and commercial success, which it has more than maintained under its present editor, Mr. Mudford. It is now one of the great newspaper properties and political powers of England. Mr. Mudford, whose father was a clergyman known to the readers of Blackwood's Magazine a generation ago as a pleasant poet and agreeable essayist, holds upon his paper a position almost unique in journalism. By the will of the late Mr. Johnson the absolute control of it without liability to dismissal was placed in Mr. Mudford's hands on terms which, compared with ordinary newspaper arrangements, may be described as munificent. Mr. Mudford is at liberty without other restraints than his own sense of duty and his perception of the interests of the paper to do what he likes with it, and to spend what he wills upon it. His position being perfectly secure, he can cease to be editor only by his own voluntary act of resignation. It is pleasant to admit that hitherto Mr. Mudford's conduct of the Standard has abundantly justified the confidence placed in him. As the only distinctly and professedly Conservative journal among the morning newspapers of London, Mr. Mudford has had a large field open to him, and he has cultivated that field with success.

The Standard has always been honorably characterized by a certain independence with regard to its own party, and by much fairness of mind in relation to its opponents. This healthy political attitude has been, no doubt, stimulated and preserved by a standing quarrel between it and the leaders of successive Conservative governments. They have always shown a disposition somewhat to underestimate its services to them, and to seek by preference their means of communication with the public through the Times. Those coveted scraps of information as to impending measures, appointments to office, and ministerial changes and resignations, in the possession of which every journal is anxious to forestall its contemporaries, were systematically withheld from Shoe-Lane during Mr. Disraeli's leadership of the Conservative party and despatched to Printing-House Square. The Standard and its readers were reckoned upon as certain. The Times and that large neutral public which it addressed were worth winning over, and information, and hints sometimes more valuable than specific information, were the price at which occasional discriminating and ostensibly candid support was supposed to be purchased. When Mr. Mudford succeeded to the editorship of the Standard it is believed that he brought the leaders of the Conservative party somewhat sharply to book on this subject. His election to the Carlton Club in anticipation of the ordinary and long delay of the regular ballot, and in priority to many notable persons whose names had been down for years, was a recognition of his power and of his determination to exercise it. A similar fight was fought out with not quite equal success for the time being between the Standard and Lord Salisbury when he was special ambassador at the Constantinople Conference. Unfavorable criticism or hesitating support was met by a denial of information, or of facilities for the acquisition of information afforded to journals either more accommodating or more honestly friendly to the foreign policy of which Lord Salisbury was then the representative. When the present Government came into office the Standard, during some weeks, showed a favorable leaning to it which looked like a desertion to the majority, and was interpreted in that sense by the leaders and managers of the Conservative party. There was talk of establishing a new and more thoroughly Tory organ, and the relations of Mr. Mudford and the Carlton Club, of which he had become a member in a manner involving a special compliment to himself, were freely discussed. It is not probable that Mr. Mudford ever deliberately meditated apostasy to Liberalism. He probably wished to try the experiment of converting the Standard into a sort of penny Times, reflecting the changes of political and parliamentary opinion and giving a support more or less qualified to each successive ministry. The attempt was not long persisted in. Either the remonstrances of the old friends and supporters of the Standard, or Mr. Mudford's personal disapproval of the measures by which Mr. Gladstone committed his government to an active and innovating Liberalism, changed his purpose. The Standard is now as thoroughly Conservative as Lord Beaconsfield or Sir William Hart Dyke can desire. Mr. Mudford belongs, it is understood, to the class of managing rather than writing editors, but he is ably seconded in the political and literary departments of his paper by contributors. Among these, Mr. Escott, the author of the work entitled 'England: Its People, Polity, and Pursuits'; Mr. Alfred Austen, the poet and critic; Mr. Robert Williams, an eminent Oxford scholar and crammer, who has transferred himself from academic shades to London newspaper offices and law-courts; Mr. Frederick Boyle, whose agreeable and sketchy books on travel are well known; Mr. Percy Greg, the philosophic and political essayist, and Mr. Kebbel are, perhaps, most conspicuous. The musical and dramatic critic is Mr. Watson, the editor of the Sporting and Dramatic Times. Mr. Mudford is himself practically manager as well as editor, but in the latter capacity he is assisted by Mr. Walter Woods. The most remarkable foreign correspondent is Dr. Abel, who now represents it, as he formerly represented the Times, at Berlin. Mr. Matthew Macfae is the city editor. The Standard, perhaps more than any of its penny contemporaries, has adhered to the traditions of the old threepenny days of newspaper management. Its articles are grave and well-informed, but perhaps they somewhat lack in sprightliness and variety of topic. It continues to report the Parliamentary debates with greater fulness than any of its contemporaries of the same price; and its arrangements for obtaining news and accurate information, foreign and domestic, are very complete. It is, perhaps, rather a newspaper for the newspaper man, for the evening and weekly journalist, than for the general reader, but that it suits the general reader, too, is a fact which its large circulation and commercial success abundantly prove.

IS THE FRENCH REVOLUTION DRAWING TO A CLOSE?

LONDON, July 30, 1880.

"I HAVE," wrote Burke to a French correspondent, "told you candidly my sentiments. I think they are not likely to alter yours. I do not know that they ought. You are young; you cannot guide but must follow the fortune of your country. But hereafter they may be of some use to you in some future form which your commonwealth may take. In the present it can hardly remain; but before its final settlement it may be obliged to pass, as one of our poets says, 'through great varieties of untried being,' and in all its transmigrations to be purified by fire and blood."

These words were written in 1790. No prophecy was ever more fully justified. Sixty years later, 1850, De Tocqueville could speak as follows:

"Those who, like the Duc de Broglie, have firmly believed the Revolution to be finished give themselves up to despair, and join to the evil from which we are already suffering a thousand others still more terrible—the fruits of their disordered minds and terrified imaginations. As for me, who have long been convinced that the social soil of France cannot at present offer a solid and permanent foundation for any government, I suffer from the same depression, but not from the same terrors and despair. I do not believe that all is over (tout soit fini), nor, on the other hand, that all is lost (tout soit perdu). I consider my country as a sick man whom we cannot, it is true, hope to cure at once, but whose malady one may greatly alleviate, whose existence may be rendered extremely prosperous, and whose very sufferings may be productive of great results both for himself and for the whole human race."

Thirty years have passed since De Tocqueville uttered the language recorded by Senior. Once again the belief gains ground that the French commonwealth is approaching a final settlement. Most Englishmen hold this belief ungrounded, and sceptics, who think that France may still pass "through great varieties of untried being," have much to urge in support of their opinion. During a period of ninety-one years there have existed, it is said, fifteen different French constitutions; and if this computation be correct, the average life of political institutions in France does not much exceed six years. The present republic, again, exhibits alarming signs of instability. The republic of Thiers differs from the republic of MacMahon; the republic of MacMahon differs from that of Grévy, which in its turn is certain to be superseded by a very different kind of republic presided over by Gambetta. All the old revolutionary symptoms are making their reappearance. Though the country is moderate, men of moderation cannot hold their own. Gaol-birds of yesterday are to-day amnestied and admired, and to-morrow will be triumphant and in power. We know, indeed, that their triumph will not be long. Rochefort, and fanatics prepared to turn on Rochefort as a conservative and a traitor, will never be the rulers of a great country. The old game will, it is whispered, be soon played out again. Weakness will beget violence. The threatening triumphs of bloodthirsty scoundrels will produce terror, and panic in its turn will produce that cry for order which in France is always the knell of liberty. Add to these reflections, which, as far as they go, are obvious and true, the further consideration that the French nation have not yet shown the capacity for dispensing with the ominous services of a hero, who must be the guide and is apt to be the master of the whole people. I admire Gambetta, but there are few things which seem to me of worse augury than his personal influence. One wonders whether the Republic could stand if fever or apoplexy were to strike down the great Republican leader. Still, in spite of all which may justly enough be urged by those who think that France is still far from attaining anything like that sort of settlement which in England followed the Revolution of 1688, there are valid reasons which I am anxious to state, as simply and shortly as may be, why calm observers may hold, not, indeed, that the Revolution is finished, or even that France may not go through a considerable number of further constitutional changes, but that the era of revolution is visibly, though it may be gradually, approaching its close.

1. Whoever will impartially compare the France of 1789 or 1790 with the France of 1880 must, whatever his political views, admit that the vehemence of the revolutionary spirit has declined. Rochefort and his clique are, it may be admitted, no bad imitation of the men who perorated to excited mobs ninety years ago; the ruffians who murdered the hostages are the worthy descendants of the ruffians who perpetrated the massacres of December. The difference is that ninety years ago the violence of the Parisian mob was tolerated, even when not applauded, by the middle classes of France, whilst the misdeeds of the Commune were punished with stern if not excessive severity by the statesman who more than any other man shared and represented the average sentiment of the French nation.

2. Experience has at last dispersed the mysterious reverence with which a natural misinterpretation of the traditions of the first Revolution had invested all displays of popular violence. Whoever wishes to see how strong was the imaginative effect of the supposed power and authority to be found in the action of a mob, should study the writings of Victor Hugo. This great writer displays under all his rhetoric and exaggeration a keen insight into facts and character, but one can hardly read a few pages of 'Les Misérables' without perceiving that its author is constantly swayed by the idea that there is something sacred in popular violence, and that to repress the action of a mob is in some sense to fight against God. It is, further, pretty clear to any one who studies the history either of 1830 or of 1848 that conservative statesmen themselves immensely overrated the power of the people when rising, as the expression goes, "in their might." It is possible that Charles the Tenth, it is probable that Louis Philippe, and it is certain that other monarchs who, like the King of Prussia, trembled in 1848 at the sound of a street row, might have easily suppressed insurrection by the use of military force. They were victims to the delusion that the people when aroused are irresistible. All mistake on this matter is now at an end. In June, 1848, and again in 1871, the populace of Paris were pitted with every advantage against the army. The fight was fairly fought out, and it was decisively proved that soldiers even of an inferior quality must, if true to their colors, inevitably defeat a mob, even when fighting with all the spirit of which Parisians have again and again made a display. It has further been demonstrated (and this for my present point is of great consequence) that France is, when she chooses, strong enough to curb Paris. In June, 1848, in 1851, in 1871, the country districts fought the capital and won. To say this is not to assert that in France the country is always right and Paris always wrong. The provincial conservatism which on the whole supported the President against the Republic of 1848, has nothing in it to excite keen admiration. What is of importance, in considering whether the Revolution is drawing to a close, is to note the vigor with which the sentiment of the provinces has during the last thirty-two years asserted itself against the feeling of the capital.

3. The great Revolution was in France a social no less than a political movement. There is a general impression that social reform is invariably harder to achieve than political reform. But the fact, whatever be its explanation, is undoubted that the social objects at which Frenchmen consciously or unconsciously aimed in 1789 were in great measure attained, whilst the political efforts of at least two, one might say three, generations have been hitherto marked by conspicuous failure. The social revolutionists were, it must be remarked, nothing like the men known in modern times as Socialists or Communists. The objects sought for by the nation, as by the nation's guides, were the total abolition of class privileges and, what would seem far more difficult of attainment, the transfer of the ownership in land to the cultivators. The first aim was gained almost at a stroke. The second was the result, as has been established by Doniol, of a lengthy process, the details of which must be traced out not only in the debates of assemblies but also in the decisions of the law-courts. The completeness, however, with which the desired end was by one way or another attained is shown by the fact that before 1848 the French country folk had also become the owners of the land, and, as a consequence of this, had also become the most conservative element in French life. In 1848 all the old watchwords of the Revolution, and many cries, such as the "right to labor," unknown to the men of 1790, were again trumpeted forth by democratic leaders and applauded by famished workmen; but to the surprise of Conservatives no less than of Republicans it was found that in the country the revolutionary formulas had lost their spell. Universal suffrage sent up to Paris an assembly whose one mission was to maintain order. The social revolution was, in the country districts at any rate, over. The one desire of a generation descended from the revolutionists of 1790 was to retain the possessions which had been gained for them by their fathers. They did not, it would appear, lament the Constitutional Monarchy; they did not either hate or love the Republic; what they did care for was order. They thought that the Republic menaced property, and they rallied round the President who undertook to make property secure. These notorious facts point to two conclusions: the first is that the social revolution is probably ended; the second, that if the peasantry feel that the existing Republic does not menace their rights as landlords, the mere love of order—i. e., of things as they are—is likely to make them support the Republic.

4. Though every one feels that the efforts of France to secure a political settlement have hitherto failed, the exact nature of the failure has, I think, not been sufficiently considered. It is not true, as Englishmen often think, that the French have shown themselves desirous of change. Compared with England, America, or, one might probably say, Italy or Switzerland, France is a country which very rarely demands or sanctions legislative changes. The most conservative ministry which within the last fifty years has held power in Great Britain has, I will undertake to say, carried measures the very proposal of which would at the present moment drive France mad with the dread of innovation. The real weakness of French political institutions has been the want of any one point so fixed as to be beyond the possibility of change. In England, in America, in Switzerland, in all countries which politically have passed entirely out of the revolutionary stage, there are certain settled foundations to the existing institutions which no man dreams of altering. That President Hayes should not be succeeded by another President, that the Democrats would, in case of success, turn the Republic into a monarchy, are matters, I presume, which enter as little into the dreams of American radicals as does the subversion of the English monarchy into the ideas of the Right Hon. John Bright. In America, again, as in England, no human being dreams that the decisions of the electorate should not, within their sphere, be accepted as final. In France, as we all know, this is otherwise. No one is sure that a fundamental change of institutions is beyond the range of possibility. As a republic has succeeded an empire, so in its turn, think the Bonapartists, an imperial system may succeed the commonwealth. At first sight, therefore, it would certainly seem that the troubled sea of French politics is not settling down into a calm. Yet a closer view gives a different impression. One political institution has now stood unchanged for more than a generation. Ledru-Rollin was, even in his lifetime, a democrat whose name had no weight in England. Even in France he was forgotten long before his death. But the irony of fate has ordered that he should be the author of the one permanent achievement accomplished by the men of 1848. He decreed, or induced his colleagues to decree, the establishment of universal suffrage. His work has stood firm. The Assembly of 1849 attempted to undo it, and the Assembly perished by the Coup d'état made in the name of universal suffrage. The Empire was forced to acknowledge, in name at least, the authority to which it owed such legitimacy as it could claim. The reactionary Assembly of 1870 dared not lay its hands on a power which, after all, was its own source of strength. The mere suspicion that the conspirators of May might tamper with the suffrage threw the whole of France into the arms of the Republic. Universal suffrage, therefore, is the corner-stone of French institutions. It will, one can hardly doubt, remain so; but if this be the fact, France has at last obtained one fixed point in her political arrangements which is beyond change. Of the system which gives every citizen, wise or ignorant, rich or poor, an equal vote, much evil may justly be said. Such a scheme of government has, however, when once firmly adopted, two advantages which, in a country like France, needing above all things to terminate the period of political change, outweigh every defect: it enlists the sympathies of the mass of the people with things as they are; it also corresponds with the prevailing ideas or sentiment of the age. The notion that ultimately the majority of the people ought to be the sovereign power in each state may be erroneous, but it is one which undoubtedly commends itself to general feeling. The loyalty which used to be felt towards kings is dead, or on the way to die. The same feeling, in a somewhat different form, now attaches itself to the sovereignty of the people. To ask the reason for either sentiment from those whom it influences is almost irrational. In the Middle Ages a man was loyal to his king or his emperor just because it was natural to him to be so, and his feeling did not seem to need a reason for its justification. In modern days democrats are loyal to universal suffrage just because such loyalty harmonizes with all their feelings or beliefs, and needs no appeal to reason for its vindication. Neither kind of loyalty is, in times when it is natural, without a ground; but each owes its force to its being natural. The French Republic is now based on an institution commanding the natural loyalty of Frenchmen. In one respect, therefore, it is based on a rock.

My conclusions may be thus summed up: France may probably go through further political transformations. The vehemence, however, of the revolutionary spirit has declined; the influence of the country as compared with Paris has increased; the social movement has been satisfied by the establishment of perfect legal equality and the creation of a body of small landed proprietors, whilst the political movement has at last led to the establishment of at least one permanent institution. France is, I infer, approaching what, to use an expression of the last century, may be called the Revolution settlement. Whether the process of "fire and blood" through which she has gone has ended in her "purification," is a problem left for the solution of a future age.

A. V. Dicey.

THE CLOUD IN THE EAST.

Paris, August 6, 1880.

I DO not remember a time when, under the pacific surface of things, the situation of Europe was in reality more confused. The partition of Poland was prepared by a century of dissensions and troubles, but it was planned in secret and executed with much rapidity. The partition of European Turkey is being prepared every day by the bad government of the Turks, by the financial and political difficulties with which the Porte is no longer able to cope; but it will not be an easy work, and for fifty years perhaps to come the Eastern question will remain a thorn in the flesh of Europe. The "sick man" is on his death-bed, but his heirs are not quietly waiting till his will is read: they are quarreling under his eyes. A dozen little nationalities have sprung up, all ready to devour a portion of the heritage.

We have been for the past few days on the eve of a great demonstration by the Western Powers against Turkey. The demonstration, to be sure, was to be merely naval; a fleet was to sail for the Eastern seas, with vessels of England, France, Italy, Austria, Germany, and Russia, with the object of coercing Turkey into obedience to the wishes expressed at the Conference of Berlin on the subject, first, of Montenegro, and, secondly, of Greece. The demonstration was to be the end of the diplomatic period of the new Eastern Question, and the beginning of a new period which was not quite military, but which was evidently, if Turkey proved too obstinate, to be followed by a common military action. The Porte could not accept the new frontier of Greece which had been proposed at Berlin by France and England, and accepted by all the Powers. This frontier may be discussed theoretically, but practically it is difficult for Greece to claim two provinces without having drawn the sword in the late war between Russia and Turkey. It has always been the habit of diplomacy to shape treaties according to the accomplished facts, to the efforts made in some sort of positive action. The Montenegrins fought, and they have been rewarded by the cession of some few towns. But it is quite a new fashion, and it would be a very dangerous fashion, for diplomats to make themselves geographers from the mere love of art, and to alter frontiers because it would suit some ethnographical views. It is almost inconceivable how much harm would be done if it was possible at any time to unite the representatives of Europe, and to give them some nice problems of redistribution of land to settle. Greece has been what she is for forty years; she has a bad frontier, to be sure, and one not adequate to the pretensions of the Hellenic world; but why has its inadequacy been discovered just now?

The extraordinary character of the Berlin Conference has led many thinking minds to imagine that there was something hidden behind the action of the Powers. Their unanimity was, of course, a mere veil. It is impossible that Russia and Germany should look with the same eyes on the development of the Eastern Question. The alliance of Prussia and of Austria is now so close that it may be said that the unification of Germany is achieved—not in the same form as the unification of Italy was accomplished, but nobody doubts that in case of a general war the two armies of Prussia and of Austria would have the same objective. The unification of Germany has been made without any revolution; the Emperor of Austria has kept his crown and his provinces, but, morally speaking, he has recognized the German Emperor as his over-lord. On what condition? On condition that there should be no return to the narrow views of the old Gotha school, of what was called Klein-Deutschland, but that the new Gross-Deutschland should accept in the East the mission which Austria has always considered as devolved upon her; Germany is bound to take under her patronage, under her hegemony, the various races of the valley of the Danube and of the peninsula of the Balkans. She must dispute Constantinople with Russia, and not allow the Dardanelles to fall into the hands of a race which is adverse to the German race. The old policy of Austria, which you will find so well embodied in the state papers and the memoirs of Metternich and in the letters of Gentz, has now become the policy of Gross-Deutschland. I have been very much struck lately by the depth and sincerity of the fear with which Russia inspires Germany; the cultured German speaks with a sort of horror of this huge, unfathomable, uncontrollable Muscovy, only rising from barbarism, unacquainted with all the Western notions of parliamentary government, and even with civil law. Under the shining surface of a servile aristocracy and a corrupt bureaucracy he will represent to you the great masses of the Russian people as a fearful instrument of invasion and conquest, as a new horde of barbarians threatening the civilization of Europe. There is, on the other side, even among the most intellectual Russians, a curious state of mind with regard to Germany: the Russians consider the German very much in the same light as the Romans used to consider the cunning and learned Greek, who came to Rome to seek for a fortune. The patriots are led to believe that all the corruption of the Russian administration is due to its German elements. You will find this idea in Pushkin, in Ivan Turgeneff. The Russian writer is inclined to look upon the Russian peasant as a model of rough purity and candor, an uncut stone, only waiting for the chisel of civilization.

The personal relations of the two Emperors, of Germany and of Russia, and the convenience of what was called the triple alliance of the Emperors have long prevented the deep-seated sentiments of the two nations from finding expression; lately a great change has taken place, and the reasons of it still remain a secret. Time will show why the German Chancellor turned round on Russia after having used the Russian alliance during so many years as a powerful weapon first against Austria and then against France; the apparent reason given by the official press has been the discovery of some intrigues between Chancellor Gortchakoff and the Duc Decazes. The Russian Chancellor is accused of having coquetted too much with France. I believe firmly that these are only reasons of convenience—apparent reasons; that there has never been any serious design of an effective alliance between Russia and France directed against Germany. Russia may at times have found the friendship of Germany too heavy—"ma funeste amitié pèse à tous mes amis"—but it was impossible for any minister in France in the state of public opinion here to enter into any binding arrangements with any other Power.

The motive-power in the mind of the German Chancellor has not been some bon mot of the Russian Chancellor, some hint thrown out in conversation between French and Russian diplomats or journalists; it has been a studied effort to achieve the unification of Germany under the forms best suited to the historical traditions and the feelings of the various parts of the Fatherland. This unity was, so to speak, completed when Prince Bismarck made his visit to Vienna; his presence there guaranteed at the same time the union of the north and the south of Germany, and the preservation of the curious historical aggregation of states and nationalities which goes now under the name of Austria-Hungary. The question which is now really at issue in the East is this: Which will be the controlling power, the guide of the people and the races so long subjected to the rule of the Turks—will it be Germany, will it be Russia? Will Russia be allowed to work at a great Panslavia, while she draws towards her sphere of influence the Rumanians, the Bulgarians, the Servians, the Montenegrins, the Albanians? Will she finally possess Constantinople, and in that case will she allow Austria to extend herself along the Adriatic, and as far as the Ægean Sea to Salonica? The issue is a momentous one, as the rivalry between Austria and Russia, which is of old standing, assumes new proportions from the moment when Prussia, standing behind Austria, is ready to preserve and defend her, and to impose neutrality on France, in case France should be thinking of offering a helping hand to Russia. The issue is so momentous that already there is a vague feeling that the Polish question may be soon revived. Poland is always debatable land; the Poles can hardly hope now to conquer their old independence and to form again a country, but, having three masters, they can choose one master in preference. There was a time when they were willing to throw themselves on the side of Russia, but their hopes on that side have been sadly disappointed. The heart of Poland is still in Warsaw, and Warsaw might have attracted to itself Posen and Lemberg; now things seem to be reversed: Austria has become a constitutional country. The Emperor Francis Joseph is popular, and a great Polish nobleman is said to have told him some time ago: "Sire, la Pologne est à vos pieds."

The Emperor of Austria is going to Lemberg, the capital of Galicia, a province which he has not seen for several years. Great importance is attached to this demonstration. Even the surviving officers of the insurrection of 1831, who live in Paris, have been invited to go to Lemberg. The visit to Galicia will probably not be without results. The hegemony of Germany will be extended not only to the Slavic provinces of Turkey, but to the old kingdom of Poland and to Cracow. What will Russia do in presence of these dispositions? It is said that even now Loris-Melikoff, who is an intelligent dictator, has approached the chiefs of the Panslavist party; that he has become convinced that Nihilism is only a sort of domestic Panslavism, and that its excesses were partly due to the great discontent caused by the bad results of the last war and the timidity of the Russian diplomacy. Bulgaria is in a state of fermentation; Panslavic emissaries are travelling in all the provinces where Russia means to keep some influence. A great storm is slowly but surely preparing in the East, and the Montenegrin and Greek questions are merely like those little clouds which you see forming in the sky when the heat has become oppressive and the air is charged with electricity.

THE WAR IN AFGHANISTAN.

LONDON, August 10, 1880.

SOME months have elapsed since I wrote to you regarding this seemingly interminable war. For the third time now it may be said to have recommenced in a more disastrous manner than ever, just as the Government fondly hoped that they were about to get into blue water and safe harborage. The defeat of General Burrows at Kushk-i-Nakhud is the direct consequence of the policy of the late Government to set up Kandahar as a (so-called) independent state ruled by a British nominee. This precious scheme was floated just before the late general election expelled Lord Beaconsfield and his sagacious colleagues from office. Like all the foreign policy of the late Government, it is impossible to account for this attempt to dismember Afghanistan except upon the incredible hypothesis that it was entered upon in order to do as much injury as possible to India and Great Britain before being dismissed to impotence and obscurity. A heavy portion, however, of the responsibility for this disaster rests upon Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues. It might have been averted if the policy they have pursued in Afghanistan had not been so vacillating, so feeble, and, to speak plainly, so absurd. There is not a single member of the existing Government who is not pledged, as deeply as words can commit a man, to a policy of absolute withdrawal from Afghanistan. It cannot be questioned that a frank avowal that such was the policy which, now they were in power, they intended to carry out, would have received the enthusiastic support of all Liberals throughout the United Kingdom. Nay, secretly, it would have won the approval of no inconsiderable portion of the Conservatives. The blindest partisan can hardly fail to see, after the events of the past eighteen months, that this war was begun upon calculations which have proved to be entirely erroneous, and was justified by an appeal to fears which are now seen to be groundless. The inability of the Russians to overcome the resistance of the Tekke Turkomans is an evidence impossible to question of their inability to invade, or even so much as to threaten, India. The 60,000 troops we have been compelled to throw into Afghanistan, without either subduing the hostility of the people or obtaining security for ourselves, shows how mistaken were those who declared that we had but a military promenade before us.

Afghanistan itself had been broken up by our operations into three tolerably well defined states. The northern part of the country had accepted the rule of Abdurrahman Khan; all the southern parts, including Kandahar, the country of the Duranis, and Herat, acknowledged the supremacy of Ayub Khan; while central Afghanistan—the country of the Ghilzais, with Kabul as its capital, and where the bulk of our armies was collected—remained true to the deposed Amir, Yakub Khan, and in his absence to his infant son, Musa Jan. The obvious policy for the incoming Government was to recognize this tripartite division of Afghanistan as an accomplished fact, and act accordingly. Abdurrahman had established himself in northern Afghanistan without coming in any way into opposition to us; with him, therefore, we had nothing to do. Instead of setting up a powerless puppet to rule in Kandahar, and thereby converting Ayub Khan into an active enemy, the obvious policy of the Government ought to have been to make Ayub Khan into a firm friend by making Kandahar over to him. In like manner, in central Afghanistan they should have recognized Musa Jan as the Amir elect of the Ghilzais, and all negotiations for peace and withdrawal ought to have been conducted with the great chiefs who had remained true to him from the beginning. Had this been done, every British soldier in Afghanistan would long ere this have been withdrawn within the frontier of our Indian Empire, and Afghanistan itself would have been at peace; for the three sovereigns I have enumerated, though strong enough in all probability successfully to maintain each his own possessions against attacks from the others, are not strong enough to act aggressively. In a strange, haphazard fashion a "balance of power" had in fact been brought about in Afghanistan at the time when the Liberal Government assumed office, and, in order to effect a speedy and dignified evacuation of the country, all that was needed was that the Government should make over those districts occupied by our troops to the men who had the power to rule and maintain them. The elementary sagacity to perceive this was lacking to the new Government, and the consequence is that affairs in Afghanistan are at this moment in greater perplexity and confusion than at any previous moment since we entered the country. They spent months hunting about for that impossible combination, an Amir capable of maintaining order and also a stanch friend of the British—as if any Afghan could be "a stanch friend of the British" who was not also a base and incapable traitor, so far as his own people were concerned. And so, instead of recognizing Musa Jan as the Amir of central Afghanistan, we have conferred that title upon Abdurrahman, who has neither party nor power among the Ghilzais. And instead of negotiating with Ayub Khan in southern Afghanistan, the Government clung to Lord Beaconsfield's puppet Wali of Kandahar, and the result is that twelve hundred British soldiers have fallen in a rout as complete and disastrous as ever overtook a British force.

There are at present two British garrisons in positions of considerable danger. About a thousand men are shut up in Kelat-i-Ghilzai, and between three and four thousand in the citadel of Kandahar. The latter are in the most pressing danger. The citadel, indeed, is too strong to be taken by assault; but it is too small to afford adequate accommodation to three thousand men, and at this season of the year the sick and wounded will suffer severely from the great heat and the innumerable flies. It requires that a man should have been in Kandahar to understand what is meant by a "plague of flies." Worse than these, however, is the scantiness and quality of the water. There is poison in the sparkling rivulets which circulate within and around Kandahar. For centuries the inhabitants have been accustomed to bury their dead immediately beyond the walls of the city, so that all around Kandahar the country is one huge cemetery, and this accumulation of human remains has made the water very impure and dangerous to drink. General Primrose, who commands at Kandahar, has already written, expressing his apprehension lest the supply of water should fail him if he be not promptly relieved. Forces from two different quarters are being hurried up to his relief, and it is to be hoped that they will be far on their way before this letter has appeared in your columns. Nevertheless, from both quarters the operation is a hazardous one, and can hardly be effected without some heavy fighting. One relieving force, under command of General Phayre, is to advance from Quettah; the other, under General Roberts, to march from Kabul. It will, perhaps, be of interest to your readers to have a description of the route which these columns will have to take.

General Phayre is at present calling in his detachments and collecting carriage at Quettah, and does not expect to be able to commence a forward movement until the 20th of this month. The troops holding the line between Kandahar and Sukkur on the Indus number upon paper eleven thousand three hundred and fifty-three men of all arms. But of these one thousand two hundred have fallen at Kushk-i-Nakhud; between four and five thousand are shut up in Kelat-i-Ghilzai and Kandahar; another seven or eight hundred men are besieged in the fort of Chaman; so that if General Phayre strips the entire line of communication he will not have many more than four thousand men with whom to march on Kandahar—a very insufficient force, unless supported by General Roberts, to meet the army of Ayub Khan, which, since the battle of Kushk-i-Nakhud, has certainly swelled to double its original strength. Quettah is not itself in Afghanistan, but stands at the head of the Bolan Pass in the territories of the Khan of Kelat. It is a march of twenty-five miles to the Afghan boundary. Kelat is divided from Afghanistan by a range of barren stony hills, and the actual gateway between the two countries is a narrow, tortuous defile winding through these hills, and affording positions where a handful of resolute men could greatly impede the march of an army. It is not here, however, that General Phayre will encounter resistance. Emerging from these hills his force will debouch on the Pishin Valley. The tribes that dwell in the mountains bordering this valley are already up, and our convoys have been attacked. But General Phayre is not likely to meet with any formidable opposition in traversing the valley. Three marches across the valley will bring his troops to the Khojak Pass, and it is at this point that his difficulties will commence. The ascent from the valley to the summit of the Khojak Hills is at first very gradual, but as the summit is approached the road becomes increasingly precipitous. The road winding in and out among the hills is almost the only part of southern Afghanistan that is not entirely hideous. The hillsides are clothed in verdure and dotted with fruit-trees, while a bright mountain rivulet intersects every grassy valley which on either side of the road runs up between the ridges of the hills.

The Khojak Pass is seven thousand feet above the sea—the highest point in southern Afghanistan. Standing on the summit of these hills the traveller looks down upon the broad plain which stretches away almost to the walls of Kandahar, a vast wilderness of red sand, which the action of the wind has piled into huge ridges. Immediately below him, at a distance of four or five miles, is the British post of Chaman, the great dépôt for supplies for the garrisons at Kandahar and Kelat-i-Ghilzai. The Khojak Pass and Chaman are connected together by a zigzag road cut out of the sides of the hills, the work of British engineers since the commencement of the present war. It is in forcing the Khojak Pass, and in the descent to Chaman, that General Phayre is likely to encounter his chief difficulties. The Khojak Hills are the habitation of the Atchikzais, an Afghan tribe who, in the war of 1838, showed themselves both daring and skilful in the practice of guerilla warfare. Hitherto we have purchased their quiet behavior; but the telegraph informs us that the news of the British defeat has summoned them to arms, and if they can concentrate on the Khojak in any force there will be heavy fighting before they can be dislodged. The descent from the Khojak is likely to prove a still more hazardous operation. The British posts in rear of Kandahar were some days ago driven back to Chaman; that post is besieged, and was yesterday reported to have been taken. Such an event would mean not only that we had lost a large quantity of supplies, but that a force of seven hundred men had been added to the heavy list of casualties sustained at Kushk-i-Nakhud. The report, however, requires confirmation. The Afghans have not yet had time to collect a sufficient force at this point to carry so important a post. But though the fort at Chaman may escape capture, there can be no doubt that long before General Phayre has reached the Khojak Pass a multitude of Afghans will be collected in the plains below to attack him as he descends. Assuming him to have been victorious here, there remains a march of eighty or ninety miles across an open country, where, at any moment, he might find himself confronted by Ayub Khan's victorious army.

General Roberts, meanwhile, at the head of 8,000 picked troops, is hurrying down from Kabul. The distance between that city and Kandahar is 315 miles, and this General Roberts hopes to traverse in 25 days. He may possibly do so if he encounters no opposition. But it is not supposed that he will cross the country between Ghazni and Kelat-i-Ghilzai without having to fight at least one considerable action. The Kelat-i-Ghilzai garrison he will relieve and carry on along with him, and his object, I imagine, will be to unite every available British soldier into a single force before seeking out and attacking Ayub Khan. Supposing him to be successful in this, he would be able to bring about 16,000 men in line. The Afghan army would not be less than 30,000, which, with the recollection of Kushk-i-Nakhud still fresh, would be certain to fight with courage and obstinacy. What, however, the plans of Ayub Khan may be we are entirely ignorant. My own impression is that he will remain in the vicinity of Kandahar until Phayre has passed Chaman and Roberts has relieved Kelat-i-Ghilzai, when he will withdraw in the direction of Herat; and if overtaken it is not improbable that a second action may be fought not far from the scene of our defeat. It is to be hoped that when such a battle has been fought and won, the British Government will recognize the necessity of withdrawing from the country and relinquishing the benevolent intention set forth in the Queen's speech at the opening of Parliament—to bestow "institutions" upon Afghanistan.

Correspondence.

A CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I agree with your correspondent "F. W. H.," in your issue of August 19, that the abolition of the spoils system is second only in importance to the abolition of slavery, and that there is an amazing popular ignorance and indifference on the subject. The formation of a publication society, as he suggests, seems the most feasible and the first step to take. I have always had a liking for the Quaker who "pitied the poor man five dollars," and I venture to follow his example. I shall be glad to be one of five thousand to give one dollar a year, or one of one thousand to give five dollars, or one of one hundred to give fifty dollars to raise the five thousand dollars which "F. W. H." estimates as the annual cost of a publication society.

Yours truly, J. B. M.

New York, August 20, 1880.

[We have received several letters on this subject, for which we hope to find room in our next issue.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago, have in press 'British Thought and Thinkers—Critical, Biographical, and Philosophical,' by Prof. Geo. S. Morris, of Johns Hopkins University; and 'A Manual of Classical Literature,' by Charles Morris.——Harper & Bros. will shortly publish 'Historical Studies of Church Building in the Middle Ages,' by Prof. Charles Eliot Norton; 'Four Centuries of English Letters,' epistolary selections by W. Baptiste Scoones; and the last volume of Green's 'History of the English People.'——'The Political History of Recent Times,' 1816–1875, is the title of a work by Prof. William Müller, of Tübingen, to be issued by Little, Brown & Co.——J. R. Osgood & Co. announce 'New and Old,' a volume of verse by John Addington Symonds.——Mr. Aldrich's 'Stillwater Tragedy' will be brought out next week by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.——The twenty-eighth annual report of the Boston Public Library is chiefly noticeable for its account of the first step taken to connect the use of the Library with instruction in the public schools. We do not feel sure that it is a step in the right direction.——Punctually on the eve of the Boston meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science appears the plump volume of the Proceedings of 1879 at Saratoga. Prof. R. H. Thurston's paper on the strength of American timber, Mr. Warren Upham's on the succession of glacial deposits in New England, and Col. Garrick Mallery's on the sign-language of the North American Indians, are among the more interesting.——Dr. Janeway, of the New York City Board of Health, and Dr. Hunt, Secretary of the New Jersey State Board, have united in pronouncing Princeton College to be "in a thorough sanitary condition," in consequence of the complete overhauling of the drainage system and the introduction of an additional water-supply. There is, therefore, happily no fear of another such outbreak of fever as that near the close of last term, with its well-known fatal results.——In recent numbers of the Newport Mercury (Aug. 7 and 14) Mr. Jas. E. Mauran gives some random jottings on the early importation of China-ware into America. For the most part the old invoices and advertisements he has consulted refer to the trade of Newport. Thus, the first use of the term China occurs in connection with an importation of sixty pieces into that town in July, 1722.——In the August number of the American Art Review Mr. Linton gets upon debatable ground with his "History of Wood-Engraving in America"—namely, the Harper and Scribner competition. But his qualifications, for feelings' sake, are profuse and altogether creditable as well as prudent. Mr. R. Swain Gifford and his works form the subject of the leading article, and the etchings of Mr. John Henry Hill are catalogued and discussed by the editor, with the help of illustrations in both cases. Mr. W. R. Hodges, describing the private collection of Mr. S. A. Coale, Jr., of St. Louis, tells of an Alvarez which "represents an incident in the life of Rousseau, as related in his 'Confessions.' Two bewitching women are standing upon ladders gathering oranges, which they toss to him below." This is an illustration of the cherry-tree incident with a vengeance.——The seventh number of Vapereau's 'Dictionnaire des Contemporains' (New York: F. W. Christern) reaches and breaks off with Napoleon III., and as six and three-quarters pages are already devoted to him, without including the war of 1870, it is clear that the notice he obtains will greatly exceed that bestowed upon any of his contemporaries. MacMahon is allowed four pages; Mazzini a page and a half; Moltke three-quarters of a page. Among Americans, Gen. McClellan figures at greatest length. ——Part 17 of Oncken's 'Allgemeine Geschichte' (New York: B. Westermann & Co.) concludes Dr. Philippson's "Age of Louis XIV." and A. Brückner's "Peter the Great"; while in Part 18 Dr. Hertzberg's "Ancient Rome" advances to within one stage of its conclusion, ending here at the battle of Philippi. The illustrations are of the usual high quality—portraits of the Grand Monarch, of Emperor Joseph I., Emperor Charles VI., Frederic I. and Frederic William of Prussia, etc.; the Tivoli temples, Pyramid of Cestius, Tomb of Cæcilia Metella, busts of Cicero, the young Octavian, Junius Brutus, etc. Most interesting, however, is an authentic view of the Acropolis of Pergamos, showing the site of the great altar of which Berlin now boasts the spoils. In subsequent issues, the publishers announce, will be given cuts of some of the groups of the gigantomachy. Till they appear, the binding of vol. ii. should be postponed.——Seven parts of M. Sarcey's second series of 'Comédiens et Comédiennes' have now appeared, and we have portraits by pen and pencil of MM. Worms, Barré, Coquelin cadet, and Mlle. Samary of the Comédie-Française, of M. Lafontaine, a former associate, and of Mlles. Blanche Pierson and Jane Essler. Encouraged by the success of M. Sarcey's sketches of the stage celebrities of the present time, M. Jouaust has planned a series of the histrionic notabilities of the past. 'Acteurs et Actrices du temps passé,' written by M. Ch. Gueullette and illustrated by the needle of M. Lalauze, is appearing in parts similar to those of M. Sarcey's invaluable volume. The first two on Baron, Molière's pupil, and Mlle. de Champmeslé, Racine's mistress, are ready and will be followed by a third on Armande Béjart.——G. Barbèra, Florence, announces the publication early next year of a volume of 500 pp. 16mo, entitled Annuario della Letteratura italiana, to be edited by Drs. Guido Biagi and Guido Mazzoni. It is intended to make this annual a "useful repertory of biographical, bibliographical, and statistical data, and of whatever best represents the Italian intellectual movement, whether manifested in books or literary periodicals, or in the theatre, the universities, and the academies."——We have received the circular programme of the third International Salvage or Safety (Salvataggio) Congress, to be held in Florence on September 23–29. Accidents by rail, by ordinary conveyance, on rivers and on the high seas, by flood and fire, by wounds and poison—their prevention and cure—are the chief topics announced for discussion.

—A correspondent writes us from Washington:

"Perhaps some of your readers who were interested in reading Mr. Davidson's notice of the Abbé Rosmini, and have never read or heard of Dr. Brownson's profound and exceedingly interesting critical notices of the works and philosophical systems of Gioberti and Rosmini, would be glad to have references to some of his articles, which I have hunted up. See Brownson's Review for April and July, 1864, for two articles on Gioberti. The article in the July number, at pages 304, 309, 310, and 311, incidentally notices Rosmini, and points out what Brownson considers a weak point in his system. See also the number for January, 1874, page 27, and for April, 1874, page 154. One of Brownson's most interesting articles is that on 'The Problem of Causality' in the October number for 1874; and on pages 496 502, and 503 are notices of Rosmini."

—Our readers will have seen in the daily press, since our last issue, Prof. Mommsen's letter to Prof. Nettleship, of Oxford, gratefully declining external offers of assistance, as he had already put aside similar propositions coming from his own countrymen. His personal loss in books he thinks overrated, and that it can nearly be made good by his insurance. He adds:

"I am thankful for the preservation of the materials prepared for our great epigraphical work. They have been heavily damaged, and the restitution will cost much labor already got over and now to be repeated; but I hope and trust still to be able to finish that part of the 'Corpus' which has been confided to my care, and of which I thought to have written the last page the very night of the disaster."

—Mr. E. B. Washburne's paper on "Thomas Paine and the French Revolution" in the September Scribner's is, the continued articles apart, the most substantial contribution to the number. It is but an ordinary performance, from a literary point of view, and marked by a good deal of chronological disorder. This is heightened by an evident misprint of 1793 for 1792 in the date of the Moniteur given on p. 776, and by the writer's assumption on p. 774 that because Paine was elected before the expiration of the Legislative Assembly, he was chosen a delegate to that body and not to the Convention which immediately succeeded it. Generally speaking, however, Mr. Washburne was right in supposing that the story of Paine's career in France would be a novelty to Americans. He supplies, besides a narrative of events, a letter of Hérault de Séchelles' and other inedited documents of interest. Lieut. Greene's "Over the Balkans with Gourko" is supplementary to this writer's elaborate report on the Russo-Turkish war already published in book-form. It is slightly disappointing in its graphic quality, but the imagination may well be left to complete the picture which he draws of Bulgarian and Mohammedan atrocities in the present Rumelia, as the contending armies swayed back and forth over the same territory, and of the awful hegira of the Turkish population from the interior to Constantinople and the seaboard. A beginning is made of a translation of Alfred Sensier's life of Jean François Millet, with fac-simile illustrations; it is of good promise. The Dickens series is continued by tracing pictorially and otherwise the scenes associated with 'Pickwick' and 'Nicholas Nickleby'; Mr. A. R. Macdonough offers a warm and sympathetic estimate of Mr. Richard Henry Stoddard; and, to conclude without exhausting the varied table of contents, Dr. H. C. Wood makes an effective rejoinder to Dr. Leffingwell on the value of vivisection. Perhaps we should mention, among the curious illustrations to Mr. Schuyler's "Peter the Great," two representing a revolver cannon and a circular mitrailleuse of Peter's time.

—Mr. W. H. Bishop's second and apparently last paper, in the September Harper's, on "Fish and Men in the Maine Islands" perhaps surpasses the former in lightness of touch and in a certain poetical felicity of description. But we feel inclined to question the correctness of the "local color" of "the fleet at night, with its numerous lanterns (green to port, and red to starboard)." The illustrations are again of notable excellence. More striking, and in a different way interesting, is the long array of fac-simile portraits of the family of George III. accompanying a sketch of its several characters and fortunes. The subject is difficult to handle within narrow limits, but the writer, K. M. Rowland, has been fairly successful in avoiding confusion and dulness. A cognate theme is treated by Mr. Eugene L. Didier, when tracing the transatlantic career of three Baltimore belles, granddaughters of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, who became Lady Stafford, Marchioness of Wellesley, and Duchess of Leeds, respectively. Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis, besides winding up her "By-Paths in the Mountains" with a love-match, actually uses this last instalment as an apology for the moonshiner. The good-natured North-Carolinian who resorts to illicit stilling in order to earn a little cash for his pretty wife, and something better than a wolfskin covering for his babe, is surprised by "a grim, ill-conditioned fellow" and two assistant revenue officers, and kills one of them. Imprisoned, his wife brings him liberty in the shape of a saw, and nobody in the neighborhood seems surprised or displeased. Mrs. Davis's heroine tartly rebukes an officious admirer who "was outraged at this lax condition of morals," by telling him there is "a great deal to be said on the other side of the question"; and so there is, but whether more is not to be said on the side of law and order is what Mrs. Davis omits to explain. Mr. M. D. Conway, writing of the "Seven Sleepers' Paradise beside the Loire," has something novel to relate of the actual cave-dwellers of the vicinity of Tours, and pokes his usual fun at Catholic saints and miracles. Mr. Curtis, in the Easy Chair, pays an affectionate tribute to the memory of the late George Ripley.

—Mr. Aldrich brings his "Stillwater Tragedy" to a close in the September Atlantic in some not very tragic chapters, and with the good nature which it has all along been plain would not fail him in the crisis. A rather long "short story" by Miss Olney is the only other contribution in fiction, a department in which, by the way, the Atlantic has come to depend too exclusively upon its editor's own work to maintain its old place easily. Mr. Trowbridge has a poem celebrating the fact that he is "Twoscore and Ten," with a simple and wholesome plaintiveness and an excellence of execution equally agreeable and rare in magazine verse; the average character of this is better illustrated by the other poems of the number. Kate Gannett Wells writes of "Women in Organizations," and her article is perhaps the more suggestive for being chiefly statistical. The sixth instalment of "Reminiscences of Washington" gossips about the Harrison Administration, 1841. Of two political articles, an anonymous one on "The Progress of the Presidential Canvass" and Mr. Bowker's on "The Political Responsibility of the Individual," the latter is much the better, and, indeed, deserves higher praise than saying this implies; the other has been written too often in the daily press to render apt its appearance here. The reviews are in no way remarkable, though that on Mr. Richard Grant White's works is worth reading. Mr. White's own paper on "Oxford and Cambridge" and a first article describing the "Intimate Life of a Noble German Family" are perhaps the best prose contributions to the number, measured by the magazine standard of excellence which involves the admixture of interest and value in such proportions as to secure agreeableness first of all. A reference of Mr. Perry's to 'The Bride of Lammermoor' in his article on Scott, too, is worth the reader's attention.

—Lippincott's for September is rather monotonous, a defect not altogether atoned for by the quality of the different papers. Excepting the short stories, which are of the average merit (for some time this has been greater than that of the magazine's rivals, it should be said), and the poetry, there are five articles on allied subjects out of a possible seven. These are the concluding paper on A. H. Siegfried's "Canoeing on the High Mississippi," and "Ekoniah Scrub: Among Florida Lakes," by Louise Seymour Houghton, which lead the number, and are sprightly memoranda of ordinary incidents of travel in the less-explored regions of America; "Short Studies in the Picturesque," by William Sloane Kennedy, which draws attention to the artistic possibilities of New England, the hemlock forests of the Alleghanies, and the canals of Pennsylvania; "Newport a Hundred Years Ago," by Frances Pierrepont North, a historical picture which suggests that the present charms of the watering-place do not rival the past glories of the old sea-port; and fifth and best, "A Villeggiatura in Assisi," a charming description of Assisi and its cathedral by the clever author of 'Signor Monaldini's Niece.' The fifth chapter of Miss Campbell's "Studies in the Slums" is one of the best; the first of two papers by L. Lejeune on "Horse-racing in France" is excellent in its way. The "Monthly Gossip" notices the last Salon, giving the names and addresses of American exhibitors; and the reviews are good enough to induce the wish that there were more of them.

—From the last London Bookseller we glean the following announcements of forthcoming English publications. In biography: 'Life of Colin Campbell, Lord Clyde,' by Lieut.-Gen. Shadwell; 'Early Life of Charles James Fox,' by George Otto Trevelyan; 'Madame de Staël,' by A. Stevens; 'Public Life of the Right Hon. John Charles Herries during the Reigns of George III., George IV., William IV., and Victoria'; 'Life and Letters of John, Lord Campbell,' edited by his daughter, Mrs. Hardcastle; 'Mrs. Grote,' a sketch, by Lady Eastlake; 'Memoir of the Personal Life of David Livingstone,' by Dr. Wm. G. Blaikie; and 'Life and Letters of John T. Delane, late Editor of the Times,' by Sir George W. Dasent. In travels: 'Voyage of the Vega,' by A. E. Nordenskiöld; 'Siberia in Europe,' by Henry Seebohm; 'Eastward Ho!'—a naturalist's journey in Borneo and the Sooloo Archipelago—by F. W. Burbridge; 'Japan: its History, Traditions, and Religions,' by E. J. Reed; 'A Visit to Wazan, the Sacred City of Morocco,' by Robert Spence Watson; 'The Land of Gilead,' by Lawrence Oliphant; and 'A Trip to Manitoba,' by Mary Fitzgibbon. To these we may add 'India in 1880,' by Sir Richard Temple; 'American Food and Farming,' by a Times correspondent; and Mr. E. A. Freeman's 'Historical Geography of Europe.' In science Mr. Darwin leads the list with a work on 'The Power of Movement in Plants,' in which he has been assisted by his son, Mr. Francis Darwin. We also notice Mr. St. George Mivart's 'The Cat: an Introduction to the Study of Backboned Animals, especially Mammals'; a 'Dictionary of Medicine,' edited by Richard Quain; a 'Popular Account of the Introduction of Peruvian Bark from South America into British India and Ceylon,' by Clements R. Markham; and another of Mr. Richard Jefferies's delightful out-door excursions in natural history, 'Round About a Great Estate.' Samuel Smiles continues his well-known series with a volume on 'Duty'; the author of 'Ecce Homo' now writes of 'Natural Religion'; the Rev. John Julian furnishes a 'Dictionary of Hymnology.' We conclude with mention of 'A Popular Introduction to the History of Greek and Roman Sculpture,' by Walter Copland Perry; and 'Lectures on Architecture,' delivered before the Royal Academy by the late Edward Barry.

—Prof. A. Bartoli's important work, 'The First Two Centuries of Italian Literature,' which has been appearing in parts for the last ten years, has just been completed. It forms part of the great encyclopædia entitled, 'L'Italia sotto l'aspetto fisico, storico, artistico, etc.,' published at Milan by Dr. Francesco Vallardi, and noticed in the Nation, No. 464. Bartoli's book forms a volume of about six hundred pages 8vo, and is very unequal in its execution. The earlier part, on the formation of the language, the dialect literature, etc., is excellent, but that referring to Dante is worthless, consisting of a voluminous analysis of the 'Divine Comedy,' which might as well have been printed in full. The concluding portion, devoted to Boccaccio, is also unsatisfactory, being limited exclusively to an examination of the 'Filocopo' and the sources of the 'Decameron,' the author naïvely remarking that "the same study which we have made of the 'Filocopo' should be made of all the other minor works of Boccaccio. But that not being possible in this work, we pass to a rapid examination of the 'Decameron.'" In spite of these faults we have here the first critical history of Italian literature. The later period will be treated by Prof. Bartoli in his 'History of Italian Literature,' the first three volumes of which, covering the same ground as the above-mentioned work but in a more popular manner, have already been published (Florence, 1878–80), and the first volume noticed in the Nation, No. 730.

INGLIS'S AUSTRALIA.*

UNLIKE Mr. Crawford, whose travels we recently had occasion to review (Nation, No. 784), Mr. Inglis is entirely contemporaneous in his accounts. His narrative begins in February, '77, and comes down so late as to be able to be illustrated in passages of peculiar point with quotations from "Pinafore." He has little to tell of wild adventure with aborigines or "bush-rangers," or of the manners and customs of these before they had been reduced to their present comparatively unimportant position. He prefers to deal with manners in the great towns, and problems of the now vigorously developed young civilization, and his work should be to the liking of those who desire a certain amount of information and matter for reflection in their reading together with entertainment. Nor do the two authors conflict even in the actual territory covered, since Mr. Inglis treats mainly of the colony of New South Wales with its capital, Sydney, while Mr. Crawford devotes himself, besides New Zealand, to Victoria and Melbourne.

The occasion of Mr. Inglis's volume was an acute rheumatism, contracted by him while a planter's agent in a malarious district of India. He was obliged to abandon his labors and take steps for the recovery of his health. For this purpose he had recourse to Australia, and in "a few short months of its wonder-working air" found himself for the most part restored. He carries his rheumatism through the volume with him, and we come perforce to take a somewhat intimate interest in it. We are received, too, into his confidence in other ways. He is not the usual traveller who, when not scientific, as a rule is the prosperous and elegant person voyaging for pleasure or philosophical observation. He was obliged to make his own living even during his period of illness. He did so in such a number of ways as show that it is by no means the typical Yankee alone who can be esteemed the "Jack-of-all-trades," the master of ingenious resource in time of need. This writer has been in turn "cadet on a sheep run," manager of estates, gold-digger, travelling agent, newspaper correspondent, and editor. When we take leave of him he is the secretary of a Sydney insurance company. Once he goes by steerage a long journey up the coast. He pronounces this kind of accommodation "unutterably vile," as indeed it must everywhere seem, to one accustomed to a certain scale of consideration. But again he journeys to the Blue Mountains—where there is to be seen a notable piece of railway engineering called the Zigzag, presumably, from the description, somewhat like the great "Horseshoe Bend" in Pennsylvania—on a free pass; and in this case we are not surprised to hear that the road is "splendidly ballasted and the employees civility itself." These hardships should give the book a value of a practical sort to such as may be meditating removal to Australia, since the author looks at life from the point of view of a struggler for subsistence, and can give hints from his actual encounter with obstacles of the minor sort which the mere theorist might pass over. He furnishes details of wages—including the pay of the newspaper profession, which he laments as insufficient and not alluring to first-class talent—prices of food, house-rent, land, and the like. The figures given correspond fairly well to those ruling at the present time in America.

Mr. Inglis is not a profound observer, but he is an intelligent and rather sprightly one, and has grace enough to take an interest in a wide range of topics, so that there are chapters for all tastes. We read of the physical beauty and self-reliance of the women (one would think that it might be a matter of regretful melancholy at times in the mother country to see itself so invariably surpassed in this particular by the first upstart colony named), the architecture of Sydney streets, the prevailing taste for athletic exercises, and the fatally defective character of the land laws. He is in particular a great sportsman. Whoever shares his passion should have in the end a pretty comprehensive idea of whatever game—fish, flesh, or fowl—Australia affords. The kangaroo and wallaby-driving would seem to the uninitiated the most promising in entertainment of the various forms presented. There is in this, too, the virtue of resisting the encroachments of a form of animal life which increases with such rapidity as to threaten in some districts to overwhelm both pastoral pursuits and agriculture. A cordon of whooping drivers is formed, in "the bush," about a wide tract; the dismayed marsupials are urged on to the encounter of a line of marksmen, who bring them down as fast as they can discharge their pieces; and the thing is said to have almost the excitement of a battle, with all its onsets and repulses.

The principal entertainment and profit afforded by the book are in the line of speculation and comparison forcibly suggested with the condition of affairs in the United States. The parallelism is often quite startling. It appears that certain things can only be done, under the domination of Anglo-Saxon blood, in one way; or at any rate that certain phenomena are incidental to its elementary stages of development the world around, irrespective of climate. There are passages, both of description and comment, which make the work half seem no more than one of those ingenious forms of periphrasis, as the 'History of the Kingdom of Lao,' and the like, in which, under the thin disguise of a foreign nomenclature, writers have discoursed of the actual events and appearances about them. The traveller finds the log-cabin, the post-and-rail fence, the self-sufficient and unterrified bearing, and the invitation to the "bar" to partake of alcoholic drinks, as the indigenous form of hospitality in Australia, as in the American West. The servant question is a crying evil. Man and maid pay their employers little deference, and walk off and leave them in critical situations with entire unconcern. Socialistic agitation has begun among the workingmen; and though neither the face of the country nor the varied industries of which it is capable have been developed to any noticeable extent, local Kearneys have arisen, who not only oppose the Chinese but even the coming of further immigrants from the mother country, declaring that the labor market is already overstocked. The claim is supported by strikes against the reduction of wages below a certain nominal high figure, regardless of the fact that, owing to the prohibition of cheap labor, the necessities of life command prices which make the nominally high remuneration actually but very moderate. It is useful to know that the Chinese, who are the market-gardeners and florists of the country, where not interfered with, have made steady and good citizens, become Europeanized in dress, and attained to a considerable prosperity.

In Australia as in America there are "rings." By a "job" of corrupt aldermen the city of Sydney paid something near two millions of dollars for sewers which were planked only with boards, speedily fell to pieces, and emit still, occasionally, effluvia turning jewellers' metal-work blue. The hands employed on this job drank champagne, and the head contractor cleared a round quarter of a million. In Australia, as in America, "the best men" do not get into politics. There remains a tradition of a time when they did, but it is not now. Blatant fellows, mere adventurers, making politics a profession, who can "outswear a bullock-driver and out-drink a distiller's drayman," it is said, secure elections to Parliament, and find the readiest and most serviceable weapons there to be abuse and calumny. The vast dimensions to which the civil service has attained, as a source of danger to free institutions, is an Australian as well as an American complaint. This is the more singular, since there the English system of tenure during good behavior, ostensibly at least, prevails, and the schoolmaster in politics may be called to remark that there may be other evils in a civil service than rotation in office. It would seem that the difficulty of "rotating" has led to the putting in of supernumeraries by interested friends to such an extent that "nearly every tenth man you meet is in some degree or other the recipient of money from the public funds. If not checked, this threatens to menace the very foundations of stable government, and reduce the country to the condition of a vast lucky bag into which every hand shall be dipped to fish up as much as his grasp can hold."

In social life the surly, purse-proud ignoramus, arbiter of his own fortunes, assumes an exceedingly prominent place. The youth are wanting in respect to their elders. Young Australia, in his turn, is pert, impudent, confident in his own superior information—as well he may be in the matter of book-learning at least, since he has good public schools at which to acquire it, whereas it was much if his hard-working immigrant progenitors could read and write. He is perhaps to be the successor in the same field of the typical Young America of the comic cartoonists. At a later stage, when he takes to evil courses, which he does to an extent that "threatens dire consequences," he develops into a social scourge, "devoid of respect for age, sex, or rank, and up to every villany and outrage." As San Francisco has originated the "hoodlum," Sydney gives us the "larrikin," new names for that very old, old product, the mongrel corner-loafer. The suffrage is the freest in the known world, being enjoyed by all of the male sex after a residence of six months, and this "manhood suffrage" is not at all exercised with discretion. Religion of the regular sort is slightingly treated. The sturdy parvenus thanking only themselves for their success, and feeling little need of a Providence, "make a religion of mammon-worship," or, if of another sort, turn to the spiritists, false prophets, and sensation-mongers of all sorts, who abound as plentifully as with ourselves.

Australian society, our informant assures us, is cursed, as with a dry rot, with commercial dishonesty and corrupt government. He does not mince matters, and is not backward in calling things by what he deems their true names. But we are not, after all, hurried along with him at exactly the same pace. His forebodings seem extreme. He has the air of being too close to his subject, and suffering too much from the irritation of actual friction with what are undoubtedly disagreeable circumstances, to make allowances with a sufficiently calm judgment. He finds it hard to realize, perhaps, that everything else is not as permanent as his solidly built city of Sydney, in which there are residences of freestone, for the prosperous of the community, costing one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. At the distance of twelve thousand miles, however, the transitional state of the country, the probably ephemeral character of most of the phenomena now apparent, stand out with a greater distinctness. We see the manners of a period of turmoil and eager effervescence of heterogeneous elements. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are looking at a finality, at a civilization rotten ere it yet be in any manner ripe. Nothing seems clearer than that the society which, sprung from the penal colony of Botany Bay as its starting point, and recruited since from the paupers and incapables of all the earth, has attained to such marvellous heights of prosperity, is not going to be wrecked by the obstacles named, nor wrecked at all till it has reached a certain logical completeness of development. This seems so indisputably the thing to be expected for Australia that a certain retrospective comfort may be taken. It tends to lighten considerably the prospect in our own case to find conditions, which have often been asserted to be peculiarly American and the product of our institutions, springing up at the antipodes under such diverse auspices. The evils reviewed seem those of a rude, exuberant youth, lacking in the kind of prudence that foresees at the start the remote consequences of actions, and too eager in new achievements to guard properly the fruits of the old. And since so definite a progress in refinement and the abatement of these conditions may be noted, in the older portions of the United States at least, an entire victory over them in time may not be so wild an inference. The vast preponderance of the constructive and conservative over the disintegrating forces, even in the rudest society, stands out in this contemplation of our Australian cousins with a decidedly cheerful effect.

FROM GOSHEN TO THE ARNON.*

THE anonymous book before us is a bold attempt to revolutionize the legends and geography of the Exodus and erect a slender structure of facts out of almost pulverized materials. The character of those national legends, according to the author, was this: The Hebrews, on forcing their way into Palestine, carried with them traditions betraying a common origin, but differing, sometimes in the names of individuals or places, and sometimes in the periods to which events were assigned. This confusion was intensified by the amalgamation of Canaanitish traditions, and by the tendency of a later race of story-tellers, among a semi-barbarous people, to associate the old legends with the new abodes of the tribes. Original distinctions were lost, and a heterogeneous mass of apparently disconnected records was collected. For "after the story-teller came the embryo historian," and "there were such men both in Israel and Judah, on the right bank of the Jordan and on the left bank, in Edom and in Canaan." In a still later age the stories of different tribes were welded together, glaring inconsistencies pared down, additions and emendations made, and the whole was shaped to pass for consecutive history. And then, long before the final redaction took place, a variety of causes—such as sectional antagonisms, dynastic requirements, and the necessities of a religious scheme—conspired to distort even these early records. The earliest history was loaded with miracles, for the greater glorification of God and his people, and thus arose the "travesty" of ancient story which we possess in the books of Exodus and Numbers, and "the superstructure of pious romance of which nearly half the Book of Joshua is composed." To disentangle the manifold threads of tradition thus twisted together and woven into tissues "of the grotesque, the repulsive, and the impossible," and to separate the genuine from the false, is the task of the author; and no small task, indeed. Let us hear some of the results of his investigation.

That a Semitic tribe of nomadic habits exchanged a state of servitude in Egypt for the freedom of the wilderness some time between the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries B.C. "may be regarded as an historical fact"; the memory of the occurrence, so generally preserved in the traditions of the people of Israel, must have rested "on a substratum of fact." How did that tribe come to Egypt? The story of Joseph, including his bargains with the Egyptians during the famine—"if we read between the lines"—presents the original form of the tradition: famine forced the nomads to seek food in Egypt; they gave their money and flocks for bread, and bartered their freedom for the privilege of settling in Goshen. The Egyptian governor who received and settled them became in time an ancestral hero of their own—Joseph. How long they sojourned in Goshen cannot be ascertained. Excessive oppression finally made them prefer starvation in the wilderness to life under the taskmaster. They left Goshen, a district adjoining Tanis, to go towards the land of Edom, where kindred tribes of Terahites dwelled. That land was, in fact, the Canaan of the patriarchs: the migration of the earliest Terahites from the East did not take place from the north to the south, through Palestine, as the narratives of Abraham represent. The leadership of Moses may be historical, and it may not. The delivered, runaway, or thrust-out slaves took the direct road towards their objective point. They marched east through the desert plateau of Tih, the Biblical wilderness of Shur. The story of the crossing of the Red Sea is not only a preposterous tradition, but a tradition of very late origin, unknown to the Israelites of the time of the judges, or of the earlier monarchy; it owes its origin to the misunderstanding of a poetical line. The Gulf of Suez was not even touched by the Hebrews; its name was not Yam Suph; these words do not signify Sea of Reeds (or Weeds); the Yam Suph of the Scriptures is the Gulf of Akaba, and the meaning of the name is, sea of storms (suph being = supha). The barren Tih was traversed, as the necessity of the case required, in a number of days, not of years. Marah and Elim were not stations in the direction of what is now known, and falsely known, as the Sinaitic Peninsula. The Amalekites, whose abode was in the Idumæan Mountains, east of the barren valley of Arabah or Ghor, did not proceed to the shores of the Gulf of Suez to fight the Hebrews at Rephidim; they encountered them near their own border. Elim is identical with Elath or Eloth, that is, the classical Ælana, at the head of the Gulf of Akaba. Mount Sinai, where the covenant with Jehovah was concluded, was neither Jebel Serbal nor Jebel Musa, nor any mount or peak in the so-called Sinaitic Peninsula—for the freed people and their leaders could not, without being insane, have ventured to toil in their flight through the rugged intricacies west and south of the Jebel et Tih—but the mountain overhanging the ancient city of Petra on the west, the mountain generally identified with Mount Hor. Hor, Sinai, Horeb, and Paran were names of the same mountain in different legends. And so was the wilderness of Sinai variously called the wilderness of Sin, of Zin, of Kadesh, of Paran—this last name never having designated the Mount Feiran of the peninsula. Kadesh, where the Israelites dwelt so long, is another name for Petra (Sela) itself, which was known also as Rekem. The Ain Musa, which flows through the great cleft of that famous rock-city of the Horites (or Troglodytes), is the stream to which was attached the Mosaic miracle of cleaving the rock for supplying water to the thirsty people. This miracle, like many others, is variously told. To Hor-Sinai the Israelites proceeded from Ælana (Akaba), marching through the inhospitable region of the Southern Araba. It was there that Jethro, a sheikh of a kindred people, the Midianites, received them—on the confines of his own land—and became their guide and ally. Midian is wrongly extended by expositors to the west of the Ælanitic Gulf, to meet the exigencies of misinterpreted traditions. The Zered, which the Hebrews reached after turning the lands of kindred tribes, is not the Wady el Ahsy which formed the southern boundary of Moab, but the Mojeb—that is, the Arnon of other traditions—which separated Moab, on the north, from the land of the Amorites. With the crossing of the Arnon and the conquest of the Amorite territories the "wanderings" of the "Beni Israel" were at an end. When the Jordan was crossed, at a later period, new legends extended the wanderings to the latter river. Judah, a Hebrew but not properly an Israelitish tribe—according to the early usage of the names—effected its settlement in Palestine separately. Each portion of the Hebrew people absorbed considerable non-Hebrew elements. The amalgamation began early, and lasted long.

Most of these, and many other similarly bold and apparently venturesome readjustments of the Biblical traditions concerning the Hebrew migration are closely entwined with each other, and must necessarily stand or fall together. The author propounds them with much force and unusual clearness, and supports them with a great deal of learning, ingenuity, and sound argument; and yet he fails to convince us. It is the negative part of his arguments of which we fully acknowledge the force as against current notions, whether founded on a blind belief in the words of the Hebrew Scriptures or on quasi-critical adaptations of ancient tales to modern historical views: his positive combinations are strongly exposed to attack in his own manner and with similar weapons. It is true, the objections which can be made to these new views do not possess the keenness with which he exposes the incongruities and absurdities of the old, but these are incongruities and absurdities of legends—of legends wild-grown and carelessly woven together—while the weak sides of his critical constructions are those of tradition rectified into plausible history. Were we forced to choose between the narratives of the books of Exodus, Numbers, etc., considered as history—even leaving out all the miracles—and the schemes of the book before us, we should readily incline toward the latter; but no such choice is incumbent upon us. The legends of Scripture betray differences of origin: why should they not? They abound in incongruities as they do in miracles; they are full of discrepancies. Why was the "Mount of God" placed so far out of any natural route which the Hebrews, coming up from Egypt, would have chosen? Probably because the Hebrews only heard of such a mountain; hence also the vagueness in names and locations—none of the poets and narrators had seen Sinai. How did the strange story of a great people wandering for forty years aimlessly through a small desert, and all the time living on manna, arise and gain credence? In the same way as the stories of the crossing of the people through the parted Red Sea, or through the parted Jordan. The false interpretation of a poetical stanza may as naturally have created a wonderfully strange belief in the earlier ages of Israel's history as in the times of the "ignorant scribes."

On the other hand, if, in order to reduce the ancient traditions to sound proportions, we discard the crossing of the Red Sea as a very late amplification of the old stories, reject the march south of the Tih as too preposterous even for a tale, make the Hebrews cross the wilderness in a week or two, and identify the Mount of God with a mountain of western Idumæa—how is it that this Sinai, situated so near the border of Palestine, so completely vanished out of sight, in the history of the Hebrews, after the act of the covenant on which their national existence was believed to rest? According to our author, Saul fought the Amalekites in that very region, and held it with the sword, and David roamed in it—in the wilderness of Paran—while the first husband of his Abigail lived in the adjoining Maon (which he identifies with Maan, east of Petra); David and Solomon—this is not dependent upon new identifications—reigned over Idumæa, Jehoshaphat passed through it with the prophet Elisha, Amaziah captured Petra itself, the Hasmonæans subdued the Idumæans, Herod was himself an Idumæan—all this being so, how is it that Mount Sinai is not once mentioned in connection with one of those reigns, not once mentioned in the history of Judah or of the restored realm? that the prophets are all silent about it—unless Habakkuk's "Mount Paran" implies it? that the rabbis of the Mishnah knew it only, like a myth, from Scriptural accounts? that "all that Paul and Josephus knew about the mountain was that it was somewhere in Arabia"? that "Eusebius was unable to give more specific information"? The only instance in which the Mount of God reappears in the Biblical narratives of the post-Mosaic times is the account of the prophet Elijah's visit to it—"a transparent parable drawn on the lines of the narrative of Moses"—and according to that account the mountain was reached from the Wilderness only after a walk of forty days and forty nights. Our author meets a part of these objections, but with arguments, historico-philosophical and linguistic, which only an à priori conviction that Sinai must be sought near Petra, can possibly find satisfactory. That the Hebrew poets believed Sinai to be somewhere in Seir, or Edom, is clear, but where were to them the southern boundaries of that land? how far stretched its Teman? might not this have extended to the south extremity of the Gulf of Akaba, both west and east? Did the Hebrew poets use their geographical terms with more strictness than modern historians have used the names Savoy, Piedmont or Sardinia, Brandenburg or Prussia, Thuringia, Saxony, and the like?

Although unable to subscribe to the critical reconstructions of the book before us, we cannot refrain from acknowledging that it will prove very useful by clearly exhibiting the yoke under which the strict upholders of the authenticity of the Pentateuch narratives must pass and repass. It does it in a very forcible and at the same time very pleasant way. Its strictures are sharp, but not rude; its sarcasm is pungent, but not offensive. It is to be regretted that the author has entered upon so vast a field of enquiry without an adequate knowledge of Hebrew. This lack many a time betrays him into propping up his arguments with supports worse than flimsy. There can hardly be anything more primitive in philological criticism than to say that the name Etham "seems to have been formed in an early dialect from Eth, near, and would signify the 'near places'" (p. 99); that Jaakan, in Bene-Jaakan, may be "a corruption of Isaac, the Tzade having been transcribed Ain" (p. 336—as if this alone could explain the error); or that it is "at least as likely" that the name of Mount Horeb is derived from 'hōr, a hole or cavern, whence 'hōrī, a Horite or cave-dweller, as that it is identical with 'hōreb, "dry" [sic], as Gesenius has it (p. 193—which is like saying that our herb can at least as well be derived from Ger. Aehre as from Fr. herbe, Lat. herba). The book teems with misprints in Hebrew words; midbar is always spelled midbhar. On the other hand, fine critical remarks of the lighter kind are also abundant, and scholars will not fail to avail themselves of those which may be new to them.

An Essay on the Life and Genius of Calderon. With Translations from his 'Life's a Dream' and 'Great Theatre of the World.' By the Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor of the Order of St. Patrick. Second edition, revised and improved. (London: Macmillan & Co. 1880.)—In noticing Miss Hasell's work on Calderon in the Nation (No. 762) we mentioned Archbishop Trench's admirable monograph, which was republished in this country over twenty years ago, and which has long been out of print both here and in England. Although the book is still asked for, the writer apologizes for its republication on the ground that the interest in the poet is exceedingly faint. We think, however, that the Archbishop is too modest: his little work will not only preserve what interest there is, but will surely increase it, besides forming an admirable supplement to Miss Hasell's pleasant sketch. The present edition has been brought up to the present time by the mention of recent articles in periodicals, etc., and we can heartily commend the volume for its sound literary judgment and the finished translations which it contains.

Gardner's Latin Lexicon.

A Dictionary of the Latin Language, particularly adapted to the Classics usually studied preparatory to a Collegiate Course. By Francis Gardner, A.M. 8vo, sheep, $2 25.

The basis of this work is Leverett's Lexicon, but while all the words have been retained which appear in the larger work, the number of illustrative citations has been abridged, and the authors drawn upon restricted only to those who are usually read previously to the higher college course. The superior compactness secured by this arrangement better adapts the work to the use of beginners.

Leverett's Latin Lexicon.

A Copious Lexicon of the Latin Language. Compiled chiefly from the Magnum Totius Latinitatis Lexicon of Facciolati and Forcellini, and the German Works of Scheller and Luenemann, embracing the Classical Distinctions of Words, and the Etymological Index of Freund's Lexicon. By F. P. Leverett. Large 8vo, sheep, $3 50.

This work contains all the words in the Latin language, embracing those used by authors of the classical, ante-classical, and post-classical periods, with words of modern origin coined for scientific and other purposes. The etymology of every word is given, and all its different shades of meaning are carefully discriminated and illustrated by citations from the standard authors. The work is also intended as a Gradus, and the quantity of the syllables has been marked wherever it could be accurately ascertained.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1880.

The Week.

THERE is nothing particularly new to be said about the Presidential canvass, except that on the Republican side it drifts every day more and more rapidly into denunciation of the South, and predictions of the dreadful things the South will do in case the Democrats come into power. Most of these predictions were used freely in 1872 and 1876, and are very familiar. The only new addition to the old list we have remarked is that the South will divide Texas into five States, and with their aid rule the North with a rod of iron. Few if any outrages have as yet made their appearance, but they will probably be produced during the coming month. There are some signs of them, however, already. A private letter from "a correspondent" says that in Jackson Parish, Louisiana, "the white people whip the colored people just as they did in the days of slavery." It has been brought out, too, that there are seventy-three ex-Confederate officers in Congress—to which, however, the Times says there would be no objection if they would "accept the results of the war, throw their influence on the side of reason and justice," etc.—or, in other words, if they voted with the Republicans. It is a great pity that the South does not send up a solid Republican delegation; but as all its men of any value were in the rebel army, it would have to waive representation if it sent no ex-Confederates. It ought perhaps to do this, too, and confide its interests to Messrs. Blaine and Logan; but then human nature is so queer, even at the South.

"A Republican of South Carolina," who requests that his name may not be mentioned, has written a long letter to the National Committee, informing them that "the war is not ended," and expressing his "firm belief" that unless the Republicans win an overwhelming victory in November "the result will be settled by bloodshed," and that "the South is in a better condition for a fight than ever before." We may be sure this gentleman will be heard from again before November, and that the future will look darker and darker to him as the weeks roll on; but we have no doubt that he is privately perfectly calm and cheerful, and is counting on a good business year in 1881, no matter which party wins. The amount of public alarm and woe which one sees nowadays in combination with private confidence and jollity, is very diverting.

On the Democratic side there is a curious lack of activity, though there may be a change during the coming month. Butler's speech in Boston probably marks the real opening of their canvass, which will apparently consist principally of an "arraignment" of the Republicans for great but undescribed corruption. The existence of this corruption—the details of which have not hitherto been given—is deduced à priori from the length of time the party has been in power. The Democrats are evidently bothered a good deal by the prevailing material prosperity, and their references to it are very pious, and show more recognition of the beneficence of Providence than they have generally received credit for. They take, evidently, a good deal of comfort in the Crédit Mobilier and De Golyer transactions. They suffer greatly, however, from the want of good material for harrowing prophecy, which is the great stand-by of the Republicans, and is far more effective than any exposure of past transgressions can be. In using an opponent's "record" against him you are tied down by the facts, which are mostly very familiar to the audience, and have therefore lost much of their horror; while in predicting what he will do in the future you can draw on your imagination with perfect freedom. Democratic prophecy has, however, thus far been very tame, and frightens very few people, while the Republicans are able to predict bloody fighting and the most frightful load of taxation ever inflicted on any community. If it be made plain that to vote for Hancock is to agree to pay the rebel debt—State and Confederate—rebel claims for war damages, and full compensation for the emancipated slaves, to pension all the rebel officers and soldiers, and besides this make all Southern rivers navigable, no sane man will, of course, think of voting for that officer. The Republicans, also, are "assessing" the officeholders, with the utmost rigor and resolution, for campaign expenses, which excites the mingled horror and envy of the Democrats. They hate to see such things done to secure the retention of power by so corrupt a party, and wish they could get more money themselves—somehow.

General Butler delivered his recantation speech at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, on Saturday night, to an immense and enthusiastic meeting, and is now back in his old party. He showed the tendency of long possession of power to breed corruption, and called for "change" and reform; compared the Republican and Democratic candidates and platforms, to the great advantage of the latter; expressed his deep disappointment with Mr. Hayes, and twitted him, not without force, on his admission that he acted on the Southern question, when he took office, under the advice of Dr. Woolsey, maintaining that this showed that it was Dr. Woolsey who ought to have been made President; vindicated Oakes Ames, and castigated General Garfield; ascribed the present prosperity of the country to bountiful crops and the labor of the murdered negro in raising six million bales of cotton, and castigated the Republican party; pronounced the execution of Mrs. Surratt a judicial murder, and eulogized General Hancock; pronounced himself "a friend of the negro," and gave his love for him and anxiety about him as his chief reason for leaving the Republican party. Whether he will be of any use to the Democrats it is as yet hard to say. The only certain conclusion which can be drawn from his conversion is, that he thinks the Democrats are going to win this time. We ought to add, that while he concedes that the greenbacks ought, perhaps, to be redeemable in gold and silver, he would not keep any coin in the Treasury for that purpose, but thinks "the bullion might quite as well remain in the mines, where it would give less trouble and be a great deal more safe." He is a more amusing and interesting old fellow, and we have no doubt will prove far more useful to his country, than when he was posturing as a Republican strategist and philanthropist.

It already seems clear that one of the most substantial grounds for hoping to carry New York for General Garfield, namely, the discord among the Democrats, will have to be abandoned, as the different factions are evidently "getting together," as they say. The regular State Committee has issued a call for a State Convention to nominate a candidate for Associate Justice of the Court of Appeals, after long deliberation, and upon the assurance that the Kelly party would rescind theirs, issued some time ago. The latter agreed to do this, on the understanding that they should receive as substantial recognition in the regular convention as the Anti-Tammany men got in 1876, when they in turn, though irregular, were well treated for harmony's sake. Moreover, a conference has been reached upon the subject of Assembly and Congressional nominations, and if it results favorably there will be less chance for Republican legislative and congressional candidates than there usually is. So far, Tammany appears to have got all it asked, though no more than it had reason to expect, as such things go, after its show of "strength" last fall. However, it affords the Republican papers a good deal of comfort to point out the fact that the so-called respectable wing of the party has had to come to the terms of the likes of John Kelly. This is as it should be. The better class of New York Democrats have never been able to dispense with the aid of the Canal Ring on one side and Tammany on the other, and they ought to be constantly reminded of it. Of course if they had any moral principle they would refuse to fraternize with the baser sort, and let the Republicans have all the State and local offices as well as the State's electoral vote.

Among the speakers who have taken the stump for General Garfield in Ohio is ex-Governor J. D. Cox, who evidently regards the victory over Grantism at Chicago as a substantial one. In a speech delivered last week at Hamilton, and one of the most rational and serious of the canvass, he addressed himself directly to independent voters, and especially such as were to be found in the Democratic ranks. His argument was directed to showing that the continued existence of the Democratic party is the greatest obstacle to reform and a re-division of public opinion on economic questions of the most pressing character, and that that party "must be dissolved." Mr. Cox even seemed to think this would be the necessary consequence of its defeat in November—a view which is probably derived from considerations of the effect the event would have on Southern hopefulness. On the other hand, he foresaw as a corollary of Republican success a still further improvement in the administration of the Government, so well begun by Mr. Hayes, whereas the Democratic incoming "would be a certainty of utter demoralization." He was prepared to say—in cruel disregard of Mr. English's feelings—that he hoped to be spared the sight of another "rotation in office" "until a President of the United States can be elected upon a distinct pledge to an explicit, well-defined, and radical system of reform in the civil service." As to General Hancock's attitude in this matter and toward reform in general, Mr. Cox said: "The plain question is, Would he cheat the party which nominated him, or would he conduct the administration in accordance with its spirit and character?" Some warm praise of General Garfield, based on long and intimate acquaintance, had all the more significance because the speaker and the candidate had taken opposite sides on "the Ohio idea."

Mr. Sherman has delivered the strongest speech of the campaign since Mr. Schurz's, in Cincinnati. It was in the main what is called "an arraignment" of the Democratic party, but made with more than usual skill and effectiveness. A man in the gallery tried to "corner" him by asking how he came to recommend people to vote for a candidate whom he had himself dismissed from office for cause, offering to vote the Republican ticket if the answer was satisfactory. The answer was that Arthur was not dismissed for anything affecting his personal character, and that, anyhow, he was better than English; but we do not believe it was satisfactory to the propounder of the question, and we fear he will vote for Hancock. Mr. Sherman does not shine when "cornered." He was very strong in his presentation of the claims of the Republican party on popular confidence and gratitude, particularly as regards the management of the finances. Indeed, we doubt if this portion of the party history has ever been so well arranged and skilfully presented. The prophetic part of the speech regarding the probable conduct of the Democrats if they got into power was an awful picture.

Wade Hampton has written a letter to the Virginian, explaining the much-quoted passage in his speech very much as we presumed it might be explained. He says:

"Your reporter misconceived my language. I appealed to the Virginians present to consider before they voted how Lee and Jackson would vote were they alive, and I asked if any one present could for a moment suppose that those devoted Virginians could have done anything which would create dissensions in the State they loved so well. My sole object at Staunton was to appeal to the Democrats of Virginia to forget their local differences and to unite for the success of the Democratic party. The principle involved in the war was the claim made by the South of the right of peaceable secession. This right was denied by the North, Democrats as well as Republicans joining in the denial. On this issue battle was joined. The North triumphed, and the results of her success were embodied in the amendments to the Constitution, settling beyond all question and for ever the right of peaceable secession by the adverse decision of the highest earthly tribunal recognized among mankind."

Of course this explanation wholly destroys the effect of his speech as reported, even if reported truly, and shows that he either does not hold the doctrines imputed to him or does not think them effective doctrines to preach. In private life, and in ordinary times, such a disavowal would be sufficient; but these are not ordinary times, and we cannot give up the passage in his speech as first reported; we must have it for use in this canvass. We shall be glad to hear anything he has to say by way of explanation after the first Tuesday in November, but until then we have to hold that, in a thoughtless moment at Staunton, he revealed his intention and that of his friends to start a "new rebellion" if Hancock is elected, and imitate Lee and Jackson by fighting desperately for secession.

We believe that none of the newspapers which have been so powerfully agitated over the subject of the Southern census have undertaken to estimate the extent and inherent difficulties of the alleged conspiracy between supervisors and enumerators, to say nothing of the checks of the Census Bureau itself. Nor have they, in default of information, been able to state the ascertained proportions of whites and blacks in the suspected States. That these proportions have not changed in favor of the whites may be judged from the anxiety which the whites continue to manifest about maintaining their artificial supremacy at elections. But proof that the negro population was not only not dying out but was rapidly on the increase, would bring a double mortification to the Stalwarts—first, as exposing their exaggeration of the outrages inflicted on the freedmen, and next as accounting for the unexpected census returns. It would have been shrewder to have explained the figures by the well-known fecundity of the blacks, and thus furnished a basis for fresh calculations of the "natural" Republican vote at the South, and for deeper and louder indignation at the suppression of it by intimidation and violence.

One of the first duties of the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society, when organized, will be to send tracts and missionaries into the New Hampshire field. We say missionaries, because we consider public addresses as indispensable as documents; and we mention New Hampshire, because the Republican organ at Concord, the Independent Statesman, has just been giving an answer (which to the editor "seems plain") to the question which now agitates the party in that State: "What shall be the practice in making nominations for Governor, Councillors, Senators, and Representatives, and county and other local offices? Shall we nominate new men, or renominate the candidates who were voted for and elected or defeated in 1878?" In New Hampshire the elections are for two years under the new constitution, and the Statesman holds that the "full honors of the party" consist in one nomination and candidacy; rotation should be the practice, "with no right of complaint for failure of renominations, which should be treated as exceptions to the general rule." Special considerations of fitness may justify an indefinite number of renominations; of this the local constituency must judge. And now for the reason of the general rule. "There is no mystery about our ordinary State offices, nor peculiar skill required in administering any of them. Average citizens can hold them for one term, and give place to others who will administer as well as they. By rotation in office is government by the people preserved [italics ours]; the reverse system is unrepublican and dangerous to liberty." However, the Statesman again excepts Senators and Representatives in Congress. "These we should change or retain on about the system of the other States, so as not to be at a disadvantage with them [italics ours again]. But our State officers do not compete or contend with those of other commonwealths"; hence it is of no consequence what course other States pursue with regard to theirs.

Foreign gold is now flowing freely to this country, the arrivals during the week having somewhat exceeded in value five millions of dollars. The Government officials at Washington have published an estimate that the receipts of foreign gold will average four million dollars each week until November 1 next. If anything like this amount arrives, all apprehension respecting the autumn money market may be dismissed. Although the rates for loans continue low, and loanable funds are still abundant, the surplus reserve of the New York banks continues to fall, and for the last week was as low as about $6,650,000. The public credit, as expressed in 4 per cent. bonds, is still advancing. These bonds sold at 110⅛ to 110¼, or at a price which would make a ready market at par for a 3½ per cent. bond of equal length of time to run. Railroad investments still rule very high, and no class of property at present is yielding better returns than are the leading railroads. The new trunk-line, by way of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, to the West, which was reported last week, appears to be a legitimate business undertaking, although at the Stock Exchange many still regard it as merely an adjunct of a huge stock speculation. The articles of incorporation for building a double-track road from Binghamton to Buffalo, which would form the missing link, have been filed, and the proper cash deposits made. General trade continues very active all over the country. The market for silver has been very steady here and in London.

The House of Lords has done a more foolish thing than rejecting the Irish Disturbance Bill by striking out from the Employers' Liability Bill the section which not only gave it all its value, but furnished the reason for framing it—namely, that which made employers liable to workmen for injuries received through the acts or omissions of fellow-workmen in the same service. The state of the law at present, which exempts employers from the responsibility towards their own workmen which attaches to them towards all the rest of the community, has long been a standing grievance of the trades-unions, which the Liberals had pledged themselves to remedy. The section stricken out by the Lords made the employer liable for injury sustained by one of his workmen through the negligence of a superintendent or foreman, or the negligence of any person in the employer's service whom the injured workman was bound to obey and did obey, or through the acts or omissions of any person done or made in compliance with the employer's rules, or in obedience to particular instructions. The rest of the act is of very little consequence, and yet Lord Beaconsfield moved and carried an amendment limiting its operation to two years. Of course, the incident will give considerable and bitter stimulus to the agitation for some change in the character of the Upper House. The peers appear to have lost heart a little when the bill empowering farmers to kill "ground game" (i.e., hares and rabbits) came up, for that, under Lord Beaconsfield's advice, they passed to a second reading.

The Powers having refused to accept the excuses of Turkey for not delivering Dulcigno to the Montenegrins, and having directed the delivery within three weeks, and the three weeks on a subsequent additional delay having come to an end, "the naval demonstration" is to take place, and the ships which are to comprise it are on their way to the coast of Dalmatia. Turkey is not to be asked, as was at first supposed, to take part in it, but is to be asked to furnish any land force that may be necessary to carry out the decision of the Conference. The Powers have also answered the Porte's remonstrances against the decision concerning the Greek boundary, and have refused to recede from it in any way. There continues to be the same swarm of contradictory rumors as to what they will do in case Turkey holds out on the Greek question; but there is something approaching to an agreement that England and Russia are ready to go any needful length, that France is opposed to going any length at all, and that Germany and Austria have not made up their minds how far they will go. There seems, too, to be a very strong expectation that, in case of a refusal of the Powers to act, Greece will act alone, and that her appearance in the field will be the signal for a rising against the Turks in Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia.

The loss of wine by the French is one of the most striking economical facts of the day. M. Leroy-Beaulieu tells the story in the last number of the Économiste Français, from which it appears that the production in 1869 reached 70,000,000 of hectolitres (the hectolitre is one hundred litres, and the litre is somewhat more than our quart). In 1875, although the ravages of the phylloxera—an insect which attacks the roots of the vine—had already begun, it rose to 84,000,000. It then began to fall steadily, and last year only amounted to 30,000,000. This year, it is expected, it will be smaller still. In 1872 France exported wine of the value of $33,000,000. The amount has since been declining, and this last year only reached $24,000,000; and that it has not gone lower is due to the rise in price of the finer wines. This, however, is not so extraordinary as the rise in the value of the wine imported. Instead of giving up drinking wine when the home supply falls short, the French consumer insists on having it. Accordingly, the imports of wine, which in 1872 were only worth $1,600,000, reached last year the enormous figure of $34,000,000. The imported wines now come from Italy, Spain, Algeria, Hungary, and the United States. All attempts to extirpate the phylloxera have thus far failed. The French Academy of Sciences offered a prize of $60,000 for a preventive, without success. Half the vines, it is estimated, have been already destroyed, and the best judges consider the fate of the remainder as sealed, and the total disappearance of the old French vine as only an affair of five or six years. The only way out of their trouble thus far discovered by the wine-growers is the planting of American varieties. This has been tried by the owners of some of the great vineyards with unfailing success. The American plants defy the phylloxera and are growing luxuriantly; but it will, of course, take some years to get wine from them up to the old standard, and consequently the small growers hope and struggle on with the old vine. The opportunity which this state of things offers for American wine-growers to find a market in Europe and keep it, does not need to be pointed out. They ought to be able to compete at least with most of the coarse Italian, Hungarian, and Spanish wines already, and beat them before long. The difficulty of a complete substitution of the American vine for the native one, even if it were sure to produce as good wine, may be inferred from the fact that it is calculated that it would take 19,335,780 cuttings to replace the existing vines, at four dollars the hundred. At the rate at which the substitution has thus far been affected it will not be completed in less than 128 years.

The Pope has been having a very troublous time with Belgium ever since the present Liberal Ministry came into power. The controversy having ended in the withdrawal of the Belgian Legation from Rome, and the publication of a diplomatic correspondence which seemed to show that the Vatican held one language to the Ministry and another to the bishops, or was at all events capable of some such construction at the hands of the ungodly, the Pope has now published a long memorandum justifying himself; but it is not much of a justification after all, and does not remove the suspicion that he tried hard to keep on good terms both with the bishops and the Government, or else changed his mind frequently in the course of the controversy. His vacillation has now become almost a scandal in the eyes of the extreme Clericals at Rome, who miss much the old uncompromising tenacity and outspokenness of Pius IX. Leo's permission to the faithful to take part in the Italian elections continues to work well. The Clericals seem to carry the municipal elections without much difficulty.

General Roberts's march from Ghazni to Kelat-i-Ghilzai, a distance of about one hundred and forty miles, was achieved in eight days. It ended on August 23. It was entirely unopposed, the troops had plenty of provisions, only a few men died or were missing, and the horses were kept in good condition. The army rested on the 24th, and resumed its march on the following day, General Roberts expecting to reach Kandahar on the 29th. The sick were left in Kelat-i-Ghilzai, which was handed over to Amir Abdurrahman's officers, the British garrison joining the relieving army. A plan for combined action against Ayub Khan was sent to General Phayre, who advanced from Chaman-Choki to Gatai, and was to reach Takht-i-Pul, thirty-five miles south by east of Kandahar, almost simultaneously with Roberts's arrival before the latter city. Takht-i-Pul Pass, however, has in the meanwhile been occupied by a force of the enemy, and, according to the latest telegrams, Phayre's communications are threatened by tribal gatherings, a feverish excitement pervading the country in his rear, down to the Indus. The siege of Kandahar, however, is considered as already raised, Ayub Khan having withdrawn to the Argand-ab. Concerning Ayub's forces and intentions the reports are conflicting, and the question gravely presents itself, What next, if he retires toward Herat? Will the English Government embark now on a venturesome enterprise against that remote city, or leave Burrows's defeat unrevenged, with Kandahar exposed to fresh attacks, and all southern Afghanistan agitated? Lord Hartington, a few days ago, declared in the House of Commons that the decision in regard to the frontier-line "would not be influenced by the mere fact of certain territory having been acquired by the treaty of Gandamak," which "may be regarded as having ceased to exist"; but this declaration contains no clue to the Government's contemplated policy in general, and, least of all, in regard to Kandahar, which is not within the frontier-line of India created by that treaty.

SUPPOSED SPEECH OF A REPUBLICAN EMISSARY AT THE SOUTH.

ONLY two months remain before the November election, and we have yet to see any result of the Fifth-Avenue Conference so far as relates to stumping the South. To all appearances the Republican managers have preferred the advice to strengthen first the weak points at the North with a view to carrying the October elections; and the probability is that if their hopes are realized they will deem it superfluous to undertake a Southern canvass, while, if the October States go Democratic, they will plead the necessity of making a forlorn attempt to redeem these very States in the final struggle. It may, therefore, not be amiss to imagine what a Republican orator of tact and principle might say to an audience of Democratic whites in any considerable city South of Mason and Dixon's line. We assume that his mission would best be fulfilled by openly courting such an audience in place of one composed either of white or black Republicans.

"I stand before you," he would begin by saying, "already a suspected and odious person because wearing the name Republican. Yet I must frankly avow that my object in addressing you is to defend and, if I can, to establish the proposition that your interest lies with the success of the party to which I belong, and not of the party in which you see almost your last hope of salvation. It is clear, therefore, that one or other of us is laboring under an illusion which ought to be dispelled, and which I shall do my best to dispel if you will give me a patient hearing.

"I shall ask you, in the first place, what you will be most unwilling to grant, to draw a line between the Republican party of to-day and the Republican party of five, ten, or twenty years ago. I do this simply because I am ready, on my part, to do the same by the Democratic party in any comparison between the two. It will, too, save us the necessity of raking up issues which, having been settled, had better now be buried out of sight. I must add, however, that I do not shirk an historic retrospect, and that it is a part of my present purpose to maintain that the Republican party, which accepted and carried on the war to your final defeat and the utter extinction of slavery on American soil, was before, during, and after hostilities the real friend and benefactor of the South. I affirm with entire confidence that no one among you whom you would now choose as a natural leader would advocate the re-enslavement of the blacks, even if he thought it could be done; or would pretend that slavery was not a curse, which you have not paid too dearly to be rid of in the only way in which (as was fated) it could be got rid of; or would deny that the South has never been so prosperous as it is to-day, with such bright prospects of material development, and not one-half its resources exposed, or one-half its territory peopled as it might and will be. This condition has been reached in fifteen years under the rule of the Republican party—under the rule, if you please, of leaders tainted with corruption, and certainly in a period four-fifths of which was to be called one neither of war nor of peace. I shall not stop to justify the methods of Reconstruction, still less the abuses to which it gave rise at the North and at the South; but I may challenge the world's statesmanship to point to any social, political, and industrial revolution of anything like the magnitude of ours having been accomplished in so short a time, and, on the whole, with so little friction, bitterness, and hardship.

"To say this is to compliment you in spite of yourselves, for there can be no doubt that if you had promptly accepted the inevitable—the negro as a citizen, with a vote—the friction, bitterness, and hardship would have been vastly diminished; there would have been no room for a foreign element of demagogism and plunder to which an ignorant suffrage is everywhere exposed, and which supported itself among you so long by virtue of a Federal alliance now past for ever, and repudiated by the Republican party itself. But I hear you insisting that this is not so—that the party would to-morrow reinstate the 'carpet-baggers' if it got the opportunity. Herein is one of the illusions of which I spoke. I might point to the deliberate rejection of General Grant at Cincinnati as a proof of the party's change of mind with reference to military government, but I would rather recall the close of his second administration, when it was manifest that he himself was persuaded that he had been undertaking the impossible, and that the course actually adopted by his successor was the only one left. If two terms of President Grant could not win over the party to the constitutional views which you successfully resisted (with ill omen for that party's continuance in power), can you ascribe no influence to four years of Mr. Hayes's administration, against which, on the score of purely Federal relations, you have no cause of complaint? Do you not know, and ought you not to feel, that South Carolina is as free from arbitrary and illegal Federal interference as Massachusetts, and must remain so whoever may occupy the White House? Believe me, of all the phantoms which now haunt either section, this—that reconstruction is not closed—is the thinnest and emptiest. The date of its expiration is known—in April, 1877; there is no prophet bold enough to predict its revival.

"You are, then, even if the Republican party succeeds, absolutely secure against any attempt to set up your governments on a foundation of which the Federal Army and Navy constitute an essential part. But two things you must not reckon upon: that the Republican North will ever be indifferent to State governments maintained only by intimidation and fraud, or will ever cease by lawful means to guard the ballot in the hands of the black voter. I will go further, and assert that you yourselves cannot always, without uneasiness, overcome black majorities as you now do and feel perfectly justified in doing, and that you will end not only by tolerating the colored voter, but by seeking in every way to enlighten and elevate him. As a means of what you deem self-preservation you may wink at ballot-stuffing, but you know as well as anybody what is implied in a community of ballot-stuffers. You had your slave-traders and slave-catchers, in the old times, but you did not look upon them as your first citizens, or invite them to your tables and introduce them to your families; nor can you now regard with respect the men whose business it is to keep voters away from the polls, or to count out an honestly polled majority. You tolerate them as necessary tools, and you voluntarily share in the odium which they incur among all right-thinking men who believe that a republican form of government with doctored ballot-boxes is a farce. But you can see the demoralizing effect of this upon yourselves, and can foresee the time when local dissensions will give occasion for putting these fraudulent devices in practice against one or other of two factions of the same party. What security, let me ask, has Governor Colquitt or ex-Senator Norwood at this moment in Georgia that his vote will come out of the ballot-box exactly as it went in?

"It may well be that you are but copying the example of the 'carpet-baggers' in their last struggles for supremacy, but of one thing be assured, that the Republican party at the North has never sanctioned a resort to such modes of perpetuating its lease of power. I do not say it has not committed frauds, or met fraud with fraud; but I contend that the mass of the voters who call themselves Republican are and always have been ready to accept the results of a fair count, and have erected the only safeguards against cheating at the polls and in making up the returns. On the other hand, the Democratic party has persistently, as it got the chance, torn away these safeguards; so that, believing your encouragement in ways which you yourself must deplore, however necessary they may appear, to be disastrous for you, I again hold up the Republican party as the better friend of the South. The time is coming when it will seem none the less so because of its insisting that, within its own province, the United States shall maintain the purity of elections. The Supreme Court has sanctioned this doctrine, and however it may be questioned by constitutional lawyers, or whatever opportunities there may be for abuse in the application of it, no one can profess opposition to the end sought to be attained by it on grounds that will, morally speaking, bear examination. I myself am free to say that I regard this remnant of the Reconstruction measures as wholly in the line of what used to be called 'manifest destiny'—the gradual but steady enlargement of the Federal powers in keeping with the real growth of the country in unity of feeling and interest.

"Here I seem to confess the Republican party a party of centralization, and if I should defend it upon that ground I might have been much worse engaged. But in spite of the wrangles over the use of United States troops at the polls, over United States jurors, supervisors, and deputy-marshals, the records of the last two Congresses show that both parties and both sections sought to use the power of the Federal Government whenever it suited their purposes. Looking only at measures introduced or supported by eminent Southern men, I might cite Senator Morgan's constitutional amendment recognizing, by implication, the old Whig doctrine of internal improvements; or his Electoral Count Bill, which forbids a State to certify its own Presidential electors, and gives the right to both Houses of Congress—as to which Mr. Garfield said, as a member of the Electoral Commission: 'The preservation of the rights of the States under the Constitution to appoint electors and to declare who has been appointed, is, in my judgment, a matter of much greater importance than the accession of any one man to the Presidency.' I might refer to the refusal of Congress in June, 1878, to authorize the State of New Hampshire to choose a Senator by its existing Legislature; to Mr. Reagan's Inter-State Commerce Bill, to the bill establishing a Board of Health with power to step in and fulfil the functions neglected by State officials, or the bill permitting the Geological Survey to extend its operations into States having local surveys, or the Voorhees resolution to investigate the colored exodus—all supported and carried by Southern votes, and all within the past two years. I conclude, therefore, that honors are easy, and that your fears of centralization are groundless, or have as much relation to the Democratic as to the Republican party.

"There remains the subject of the Federal offices at the South, in which it is probably true there are many unworthy incumbents, but few corrupt or oppressive, unless you have been singularly derelict in making known your grievances. The general administration of President Hayes has been incontestably free from extravagance or peculation; if the Southern branch of it has been an exception to the general purity, the Republican North has yet to hear of it. The election of General Hancock would certainly throw these offices into your hands, and this would probably seem to you an unmixed good. As my business is to deal in paradoxes, I shall venture to assert that the contrary is true; because, unless human nature is different on both sides of the line, the new appointments will be as truly political as those which they replace. Now, it matters little whether the immediate result is an improved corps of officers; they will be no sooner installed than their honors and emoluments will become the envy of others, and their tenure dependent on influences which have no relation to the efficiency or integrity of the public service. Moreover, the revolution which raises them to place will infallibly breed at the North corruption and jobbery in the public offices, and the damage which will thence ensue to the whole country you cannot hope to escape, even if you flatter yourselves that you would avoid corruption among yourselves. You will have purchased a momentary gratification by an alliance with a party which has never given the least sign (outside of its platforms) that it saw any evil in our present civil-service system, or that it repented of its peculiar doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. I admit that the Republican party has not done its duty by this great question, but it has done something in practice to administer by business-like methods, and it contains the only body of intelligent and united workers who are bent on securing reform—through a third party if need be. Remembering that your sufferings from rascality during Reconstruction were not owing to the wilfulness of the Republican party—by which always I mean the rank and file, and not necessarily the leaders—but grew out of the very system of political appointments which I am deprecating, it seems to me that experience should make you eager to throw in your fortunes with that party which alone gives any promise of suppressing the most gigantic and dangerous abuse now threatening our institutions—an abuse both anti-republican and anti-democratic, and the abolition of which will redound to the lasting benefit of every section."

Much more our orator might say if his audience remained tolerant, or the editorial column had no limit. Much more he would have to say if he invited debate.

THE OUTLOOK FOR PEASANT PROPRIETORSHIP IN IRELAND.

THE Irish question continues to harass the Gladstone Ministry probably more than any other with which it has to deal, and in a way of which Lord Beaconsfield and his followers knew nothing. The latter always treated Irish grievances as a dreadful bore, and kept a young "swell" in the office of Irish Secretary to chaff the Irish members and repeat the club conversations about the peasantry. The Disturbance Bill which the Lords have just defeated was confessedly a hasty measure, and was hard to defend on any other ground than that it was a sign of the good intentions of the Ministry. It imposed a serious disability on landlords by depriving them of their legal right to take possession of their land for non-payment of rent; in other words, it belonged to the class of laws which interfere with the obligation of contracts. These laws are, indeed, sometimes excusable and even laudable, but only on condition that they make no distinctions, but are applicable to all persons of a certain class. The Irish Compensation Bill was, however, only applicable to landlords in certain districts, where the distress of the tenantry was supposed to be greatest. But in these districts the landlords were also worse off than any other landlords, yet no provision was made for the diminution of their burdens; they had to meet the charges on their estates whether the rent came in or not. It is not surprising that, under these circumstances, Lord Cairns was able to produce in the debate in the House of Lords a mass of very destructive testimony, showing the injurious effect of the bill on the credit of landlords and on the value of landed property in Ireland. In fact, the bill was not stoutly defended in any quarter. The commercial English Liberals were afraid of it; the philosophical Liberals could say little for it, except that it was absolutely necessary to do something to prevent civil war in Ireland, which Mr. Gladstone said was "measurably" near; and the Irish Home-Rulers and Land-Leaguers treated it as simply a sign that the Government was frightened, and could be made to do a good deal more than they had hoped; so that, beyond establishing the fact that the Liberals would like to do something to regulate the Irish land question, while the Tories would not think of doing anything, the bill has had little importance.

As soon as it was defeated, the Government had to provide for the contingency of the landlords in the distressed districts using their legal right to evict and being resisted—or, in other words, to determine whether it would enforce the law at any cost, even in cases of which it had, by the introduction of the Compensation Bill, acknowledged the injustice. It has, of course, been compelled to announce that it will enforce it, and for this purpose has reinforced the Constabulary, which is essentially a military force, by a regiment of marines. The preservation of peace and quiet now depends much on whether the landlords will or will not assert their legal rights. That they are not men who are easily cowed their history shows clearly enough; but there could not be a more unfortunate time for a display of their courage as against their tenants. They can undoubtedly secure possession of their land, but the land is of little use to them without the prospect of letting it peaceably and getting a fair rent from it, and this prospect is diminished in some degree by every assertion of the extreme landowning rights. As Judge Longfield pointed out in an article of which we gave a summary last week, the landlord's position in Ireland is precarious, and grows more so. Mr. Parnell is laboring for a general refusal to pay rents, and if this could ever be brought about it would be as fatal to the renting of land in large masses as it was in this State. A general refusal to pay rent, if firmly adhered to, no government in our day could overcome. Cromwell would have overcome it very summarily; but Cromwell's processes are not available for any government in our day, except that of Turkey. A whole people could not be evicted from their holdings, and, even if they could be it would do the landlords no good, because they could not farm the whole island. Of course there is little likelihood that any anti-rent combination can be organized that will cover all Ireland; but the anti-tithe agitation, which rose and triumphed in days when the Irish had much less experience of agitation and much less help and encouragement from outside than they have now, does make a combination large enough to defy the law and make land an almost worthless kind of property over large areas, seem not at all impossible, if the popular exasperation should be kept alive by an undue assertion of legal rights by the landlords.

There are several circumstances which favor such a movement at present, and which have not previously existed. In the first place, the English Liberals are committed, as they have never been committed before, to the doctrine that property in land is not property like any other property—that is, that it is and ought to be subject to restrictions and modifications at the hands of the legislator to which personal property is not, and ought not to be, subjected. This doctrine, in fact, the Liberals are now endeavoring to apply to English land-tenures. Moreover, the English system of land-letting, which prevailed everywhere over Europe when Englishmen first introduced it into Ireland, has disappeared from every European country except England and Ireland. In no other is the hold of the bulk of the population on the land so slight. Within a century the greater part of the land in France has passed into the hands of the tillers. In Germany and Russia the land has undergone a similar process. In Switzerland great landlords have been unknown since the Middle Ages. In Italy, if peasant proprietors be not numerous, the interest of the farmer in the soil is comparatively large. It is, in fact, only in Ireland that tenancy-at-will exists in naked literalness. Everywhere else the will of the landlord is restrained by usage, or by sympathy, or some sort of acknowledged community of interest with the tenant.

The effect of all this in discrediting the existing Irish land-tenure, and making some great change in it seem easy, is apparent enough. But in addition to this the peasantry are now in possession of the ballot, which has not only destroyed the political power of the landlords, but greatly diminished the political influence of the priests. There has never been a political agitation in Ireland in which both priests and landlords counted for so little as the one now raging, and Judge Longfield calls attention to this as a very serious aggravation of the pending crisis. The plunder of the landowners is for the first time distinctly offered to the peasantry as an attainable political object, and the agitation derives a great stimulus from the fact that every tenant knows exactly what his share of the booty would be in case the enterprise succeeded. In fact, Parnell offers nearly every man who supports him a determinate quantity of land as the reward of victory, which is a very different thing from the general scramble for the possessions of the rich which is all the communistic chiefs have to promise their followers. Of course success is out of the question. Nothing but the defeat of the Government in a bloody war will ever compel the landlords to absolute surrender of their property. But many things might happen to bring about the transfer of the fee-simple of the soil to the tenantry, encumbered with the amount paid to the landlord for it, either directly by the tenant or by the Government in the shape of a loan to the tenantry.

Would the condition of the tenants be improved rapidly by this? Some approach to an answer to this question has recently been made by an examination of the condition of those farmers who formerly held under the Irish Church and bought the fee of their farms when the Church was disestablished. It appears from this examination that no man whose holding is less than twenty acres gains much by the change in anything but deliverance from what all consider tyranny and vexation in the shape of landlord interference. He is rarely able to live and support a family on less than twenty acres without help from some other quarter, such as keeping a shop, or following a trade, or going to England to work at harvest-time. In short, such a farm seems at best but a help. It seems also to be ascertained that hardship or failure has followed in nearly every case in which the tenant had to borrow the whole of the purchase-money—the rule of the money-lender being generally harder to bear than that of the landlord, as more rigid and less indulgent. The cases of success are those of thrifty men who had holdings above twenty acres, and were able to pay one instalment of the purchase-money out of previous savings. There does not, therefore, seem to be much promise in any change of proprietorship for the very small farmers without a great change in their habits. The untiring, unending industry of the French peasant might enable the Irish peasant to make up for the disadvantages of soil and climate from which he now suffers. If he became a careful, indefatigable, penurious cultivator under the régime of peasant proprietorship, the change would undoubtedly be little greater than that through which the French peasant has passed. We shall probably never see any general agreement of opinion on this point in advance of actual experiment. But the accounts of those who investigated the condition of the holders of the Church property go to show that proprietorship in fee does have an extraordinary effect in soothing and tranquillizing the Irish farmer, and turning his attention away from furious politics. They all, no matter how hard their present lot or hopeless their outlook, agreed that being "rid of the landlords" was sufficient compensation for every present hardship or anxiety. Should this fact become more patent it will furnish a strong temptation to some English ministry, though doubtless a more radical one than Mr. Gladstone's, to make a bid for the devotion of the Irish voters through some process which, even if it does not change the proprietorship of the fee, will destroy the landlord's power over the tenant's manner of life and his management of his farm.

PHILOSOPHY AT CONCORD.—II.

CONCORD, August 14, 1880.

THE evolution and interadjustment of thought natural to the progress of a five-weeks' session have in the end marked for the Concord Summer School a definable issue and attitude, which should be added as a sort of personal equation to the general character of the school sketched in a previous letter. Theism, which was at first implied, has become thoroughly explicit; there is no question now that the title, were it more accurately written, should mention "monotheistic philosophy," or still more accurately, perhaps, "philosophical monotheism," for such an inversion of phrase would mark a true distinction, and probably the one most vital for a critical estimate of the school. This faith in theism is not held, in Concord, under any of the contingencies of investigation, as an issue that may or may not arrive; on the contrary, it is taken to be both the datum and the foregone conclusion of all investigating, somewhat in the way materialism takes matter; its possession is regarded as the essential evidence of mental and moral sanity; and, in general, there is the same basic confidence in the method and inspiration peculiarly theistic that philosophy has in the method and inspiration peculiarly philosophic. The appreciative mind readily divines why theists speak oracularly, making mention rather than explanation; their appeal is to the intuition in fellow-men, and the profundity of emotion that enwraps insight. Logic appears a pedant in this company, and the matching of words a descent; thus, in the social sense, it was a mistake one day early in the course of the School when, to the remark "Fate is but a word," some one replied "Freedom also is but a word." A better comment, and one at the same time sympathetically cogent, would have been, that all names are but words, and highly secondary to what they signify; for the finest office of theistic and kindred belief appears to lie in drawing attention from the mere labelling and classifying of existence peculiar to the analytical mind toward the inner, unwritten verities.

In the matter of ultimate truth even oracular speech has been discouraged. Emerson says: "Of this essence called Spirit he that thinks the most will say the least"—a sentiment impossible of attainment for a faculty committed to instruction; but that its spirit has been largely observed will be evident. It has been said in various lectures: They who think they comprehend the Infinite do not know what it is. Look at it before you, and it is behind your back. . . . All defining confines. . . . God is nowhere unless he is everywhere. . . . Through Nature up to God? Has any one got through? Is God more up than down? Has any ascension left Nature and her wardrobe behind? . . . The "attributes" of God measure not his greatness but our littleness. . . . The abstract is accessible only through the concrete. . . . The real is the surface upon which the potential writes itself. . . . "God-like" and "beastlike" are not superhuman or subhuman terms; they denote the confines of human character. . . . It is not necessary to attach a definite idea of being to our conception of God. . . . Personality is not a product; it is an essence. . . . We say "thou" to the rest of the universe; that is not religious—all is one. . . . He who will look steadfastly out into the world will suddenly perceive himself surveyed by a great eye returning his stare. . . . "The eye whereby I see God is the eye whereby God sees me." . . . The true ritual is the active work of charity.

While the theistic and mystical intuitions arrive at these encouraging generalities by a stroke, it is at a sacrifice of the logical perspective which philosophy in calmness retains. The School owes the cohesion and continuity of its programme to the Hegelian element or view, cheerfully insisted upon at all points by Mr. Harris and Mr. Snider. If the universe were made of glass the mystical mind would write "vitreousness" and be at an end, but Hegelianism has a treatise upon dioptrics. Hegel has sometimes been taken to be pantheistic, but the presentation in Concord, as has been implied, is entirely in the light of, it almost might be said for the purposes of, theism. The position is, that self-determination of the absolute, the Hegelian first-principle, constitutes a divine personality—that is, God; for self-determining, absolute mind and ultimate personality are the same thing.

By discovering that a thorough-going psychology involves ontology, Hegel relieved this latter from the distress into which it had been thrown by Fichte's psychological criticism. The simplest sense-perception, Hegel found, cannot take place without the activities of memory, representation, and inference; so that the past, the future (there being prevision), and reason—in fact, the total round of existence—are already involved in the particular object. It would, therefore, be impossible to find a disconnected lump of existence; the universe is all of one fabric, an inwoven web, or like a dictionary of cross-references where each part exists, with any significance, only in connection with the whole. Here is a concrete unity, the ultimate oneness is discovered in things, not over or beyond them; and by this change from an abstract to a concrete first-principle Hegel rid ontology of what before had been its apparent goal but really its greatest stumbling-block—the empty and impotent abstraction, pure Being. Existence, he discovered, must have its support or vivifying principle from within, not as an addendum; the universal key was in the wards and not to be removed. The conception was a masterful ascent, reaching perhaps the highest northern latitude yet attained in the great philosophical search for a pole. Whether Hegel really stood there, at latitude ninety, and whether, had he done so, he would have arrived at a position any more intrinsically geographical than one at the whirling equator, are questions for the critique of speculative philosophy; it is only to be noticed here, in relation to the Concord School, that any departure towards theism from this principle of universal, progressive oneness, to which Hegel undoubtedly did attain, immediately shows an anthropomorphic tinge; and the further advances to a personal deity and a personal immortality seem to move by an argument clearly contrived for the result. In fact, the misfortune of all very profound systems of thought is the flexibleness essential to profundity, but which will permit warping at almost any extent. Hegelianism, on the strength of its dangerously facile dialectic, has been known to pass beyond theism, to Christianity, to trinitarianism, to items of orthodoxy. In many ways science has similarly suffered misuse; the occurrence of parthenogenesis in the insect world, for instance, has been cited to explain the virgin maternity of Mary, and so one may expect to hear some Monday morning in Boston, possibly, the whole of Hegel's 'Encyklopädie' incorporated with the Nicene Creed. While in Concord nothing like this extremity is in prospect, there are absent the indications of what is at present the surest safeguard against the doctrinal degeneration mentioned by Mr. Stanley Hall, in Mind of last year, as the chief characteristic of philosophy in the United States. This safeguard is a mental bias, or counter-bias, prompted by what might be called a Wordsworthian revulsion in the world of knowledge—a demand for intellectual sanity, simplicity, and faithfulness at any expense. For the type of mind thus characterized, and it is a growing type, the appealing fact is the contrast between the fatal certainty of the near event, flowing continuously, and always modifiable, beneath man's hand, and the distant inconclusiveness of speculative investigation, so variously illustrated by the whole history of philosophy. There is a conviction that philosophy is seeking far off the opportunity which in truth lies at hand, in the ebb and flood of every-day life; and as for optimistic, pessimistic, and all views at large, they seem less relevant to the situation than some working faith such as might find its watchword in the "meliorism" of George Eliot. The programme of this faith is to better, in the light of discoverable law, the situation to which, whatever the occasion or the outcome, human life is committed.

With the formal philosophical substance of the School that has been thus far dwelt upon there has been an intermingling of disconnected lectures, readings, and conversations for the service of relief and variety—an agreeable miscellany, not to be mentioned in detail, but notable in one or two issues. The readings from Thoreau's unpublished manuscripts by his literary executor, Mr. Blake, have, with the accounts of intimate personal acquaintances, thrown new light, or certainly very unfamiliar light, upon the character of this unique author. It appears that the current notion of Thoreau is about as distorted as could be possible. He was the kindest of men, with an acute sense for the rights of others, and in all social relations was guided by a fine instinct of courtesy. This often would compel acquiescence in opinion or action that jarred with his convictions; and, being a man who above all things lived by conviction, he was driven to avoid whatever might thus compromise himself with himself. No one could more highly and choicely value human intercourse, but a certain moral exclusiveness narrowed him to a limited circle of friendship. He often refused to see people because he could not honestly talk to them. Without vanity, he had a large pride and an equal obstinacy; but the pride, it is told, was of the kind which always marks strict moral fidelity to self, and the obstinacy simply expressed intelligent conviction tenaciously held. Perhaps, on the whole, Thoreau lacked flexibility. There was in his mental, as in his physical, build something angular, and this came prominently forth on occasion. For he had more than the courage of his opinion, as is commonly said of strong-willed men; his opinion was himself. And though there is little question as to a certain inflexibility in Thoreau's character, this in the end will more likely be ascribed to an external situation forcing him to the defensive attitude, than to native endowment or misendowment. Nevertheless, it is at present commonly thought that his was a case of village egotism, that he made virtuous living a "fad," and carried adherence to principle from a wise and flexible regard over into a knotty conceit. The most notable evidence in this direction is his refusal to pay taxes during the Mexican War, which he believed a national sin—a course that on one occasion resulted in imprisonment. After release from this he wrote the lecture, "Resistance to Civil Government," which is printed in the 'Æsthetic Papers' of Miss Elizabeth Peabody. This lecture, written when Thoreau was thirty years of age, should be a sufficient answer to all doubt of his intellectual equipoise. The problem is surveyed from all sides in a manner most cool, impersonal, and logical. It is a document fit to go before a high court in session, and the reader, who begins by being shocked, for the first paragraphs appear to deny all rights and offices of government, is led by line and line of serenely vigorous statement to a conclusion that seems the inevitable outcome of penetrating judgment. He writes: "If the injustice is part of the necessary friction of the machine of government, let it go, let it go: perchance it will wear smooth—certainly the machine will wear out. If the injustice has a spring, or a pulley, or a rope, or a crank, exclusively for itself, then perhaps you may consider whether the remedy will not be worse than the evil; but if it is of such a nature that it requires you to be the agent of injustice to another, then, I say, break the law. Let your life be a counter-friction to stop the machine."

There was just one thing Thoreau would not do, and to understand this is probably to understand his life: he would not compromise individual virtue. The notion of anything short of the finest integrity gave life a bad odor, and he would not have it; his sensitiveness was as great here as with most men in the matter of honor and cowardice, and the fine edge of his character did not blunt under the wear of circumstance, as most commonly happens in the world. The story of the journals, as read here in Concord, with the story of his life told by those who long knew him all point very clearly to one solution of Thoreau's attitude toward organized society: it was neither iconoclastic nor whimsical, but simply expressed private incommensurability with the average taste in ethics and character. When in prison he wrote: "I saw that if there was a wall of stone between me and my townsmen, there was a still more difficult one to climb or break through before they could get to be as free as I was."

The current misconception of the poet-naturalist may be largely founded in the overstatement and paradox frequent in his pages; the overstatement probably made a relief for a solitary and almost abnormally vigorous habit of thinking, and the love of paradox is said to have been inherited from his mother, a woman of unusual character. As to the Walden episode, it was never seriously intended for a social experiment or a social demonstration, though Thoreau sometimes chose so to use the event in his pages, but was simply a move to secure for a time an unagitated and inexpensive life. He was meditating his first book, and perhaps was a little disturbed at home, it is said, by the domestic buzz; probably reasons for economy existed, for he never would receive a gift or a loan of money, and would always even pay his mother for board with her. The year at Walden really did illustrate the possibility of plain living and high thinking; it was a protest, intended or unintended, not against society, but against many needless expenses and evils that society is accustomed to impose upon itself. Mr. Blake remarked in a preface to his readings, that it was from an insatiable, persistent thirst for true society that Thoreau avoided the false, and many of the selections from the journals favored this view, which had become prominent in the conversations before the School. Take, for example, the following: "If I do not keep step with my companions, it is because I hear a different drummer. . . . It is not easy to make our life respectable by any course of activity. We must withdraw into the shell of thought. . . . If my curve is large why bend it to a smaller circle? . . . I will not be shipwrecked on a vain reality. . . . It is not that we love to be alone, but that we love to soar. Will you go to glory with me? . . . My thoughts are my best company. They have a certain independence and individuality. It is rare that we use our thinking faculty as resolutely as an Irishman uses his spade." This is the familiar aphoristic style of the Concord "Deacon of Nature," different from the ordinary crackle of aphorism as the springy branch from a bundle of dried twigs. There were read, also, many passages in the delicately lyrical touch genuine to Thoreau's hand, or others that hinted the fine resonant quality of his emotional side, as where he listens to the sonorous buzz of a telegraph wire strummed by the wind, and then, after riding this thought round the world, tells how the piano-playing of his sister always gave him an unrestful happiness.

The lecture by Mr. Emerson, given late in the course, is no less inviting to quotation than the readings from Thoreau. It was a brief essay entitled "Permanent Traits of Aristocracy," apparently written in continuation of the chapters, familiar to all, on "Manners" and "Social Aims"; but to speak of it here at length will be impossible as well as needless, since the text, it may be presumed, will soon appear. The lectures of Prof. Peabody and Dr. Mulford, coming towards the close of the session, have helped in their way to identify the purpose of the School, and sever the essential from the non-essential in the general current of remark, which has not implied anything more definite than a genuine horror of all that is materialistic or in the fashion of materialism. In a word, liberal theism has found its most liberal hearing in Concord; the details that might make friction are serenely neglected, and there is a general intention towards the "lovelier verities." It is only insisted, but to this extent rigorously, that the substance or grain of the universe is mind, and that this universal mind is personal. The insight that announces these highest beliefs cannot be formulated—happily, many will think, who conceive the real force of religious faith. Faith and reason appear fundamentally severed in their offices; and it should be said, in conclusion, that the presentations of religion and philosophy here this summer have failed of being excellent just where either has attempted the labor proper alone to the other.

THE ELECTIONS FOR THE COUNCILS-GENERAL.

PARIS, August 11, 1880.

THE 1st and 8th of August were important dates for the French republic, showing what a deep root the Republic has taken in French soil. The renewable fraction of our councils-general was then re-elected. These elections take place every three years, so that in nine years the entire council-general has been re-elected. The councils-general are the deliberative assemblies of our departments, principally charged with the management of their financial, commercial, and agricultural interests. In these assemblies purely political discussion is prohibited; but as everything concerning public instruction comes within their province, they are compelled to devote their attention to the most important political questions of the day. It must not be forgotten, either, that their members are the principal electors of the Senate, which is itself renewed by thirds every three years. The importance of the councils-general has been much increased by the law passed in August, 1871, called the "Law of Decentralization," which is nearly the only truly liberal law voted by the National Assembly. This law has taken away from the prefect (the representative of the central power) and transferred to the council-general the privileges which permitted him to distribute Government favors to the communes, and by means of which he influenced the elections. This political simony has now become impossible.

For all these reasons the elections for the councils-general have acquired great importance. They have, besides, the very special character of forming a preponderating side in country voting; the numerical preponderance of the towns disappears, now that voting takes place by cantons and not any longer by electoral districts of equal population, as in the elections for deputies. Each canton is composed of a certain number of communes, and it names only one general councillor, whether these communes are small or large. The millions of inhabitants of large towns weigh no more in the balance than the thousands of country communes. Accordingly the small country towns find in the council-general elections the surest means of manifesting their opinions. Now, you know the rural districts are much less easily excited than towns, where the working population predominate, who are so impulsive and so easily roused. They might be compared to the surface of the ocean, which the slightest breath of wind stirs up. The population of our rural districts rather resembles the depths of the sea, stirred only by great currents. Peasants, particularly in Catholic countries where the national religion does not tend to develop an initiative spirit, remain somewhat the pagani of the fifth century. This synonymy of the words pagan (païen) and peasant (paysan) is justified by the fact that while Christianity triumphed in all large centres of civilization, the country people, from a spirit of routine, remained still faithful to their old idols. We have also had our political paganism. The Second Empire had been long disowned and opposed in all large and small towns when it still found in the country many strong battalions for its plébiscites. There was kept up a sort of Napoleonic religion which vowed a true worship to the memory of the great and awful chief of the Bonaparte dynasty. There are few cottages where one may not find an image of this terrible warrior, the most formidable mower of men that the world has ever known.

Our popular song-writer, Béranger, was not mistaken when he said in one of his most famous refrains that Bonaparte would long be talked about under the thatch. By loading the country districts with material benefits the Second Empire omitted nothing to preserve their sympathy. The Second Empire is still remembered even after the frightful disasters which its criminal folly brought upon France. On a certain occasion I heard quoted this humorous saying of a countryman who was answering the criticisms which were being made on Napoleon III.: "He was, perhaps, a bad politician, but he was very skilful and clever for the sale of calves." He paid tribute to the Empire for the ease with which he found a ready sale for his cattle during the materially prosperous years of his reign. It must be admitted that the first years of the Republic, when we were obliged to pay an indemnity of four milliards to Germany, were less favorable to the sale of calves and all other agricultural produce than the beginning of the Second Empire; and the peasants readily forgot that they owed to Napoleon alone the terrible taxes which overwhelmed them. Therefore, they are the chief hope of the Bonapartist and monarchist adversaries of the Republic. Their hopes will be disappointed in the most striking manner. The French country districts have pronounced themselves for the Republic with admirable unanimity. A great number of leaders of the monarchist coalition have not even dared to face the ballot and have disappeared from the struggle. At the 1st of August voting, 900 Republicans were elected and only 382 Conservatives; the Republicans gained 243 seats. There was balloting in 133 cantons. The 8th of August, 99 Republicans were elected, and they gained 55 seats, which almost brings the Republican gain to 300. They have thus reconquered 12 departments, which, joined to the 55 they possessed already, assure them the majority in 67 departments out of 90, without counting that in the others they press hard upon their opponents. These results have considerable importance for the recruiting of the Senate, but they are especially significant as the most irrefragable proof of the consolidation of our present institutions. In vain do our adversaries seek to weaken the import of such a result by pretending that the French country districts always vote for the existing Government. After the kind of coup d'état Marshal MacMahon attempted on the 16th of May, 1877, this opinion can no longer be held. For many months the power belonged to the coalition of the monarchist parties. The Duc de Broglie ministry made use of every means of proceeding by official candidature; he employed intimidation against his enemies and lavished favors on his adherents. Marshal MacMahon himself recommended his candidates. Never was stronger pressure put upon any electoral body, and nevertheless the country returned the 363 deputies who composed the Republican majority of the dissolved Chamber, and the Marshal, unwilling to submit to his defeat, was obliged to resign, according to the famous dilemma of M. Gambetta. The peasantry crowded after President Grévy during his official visit to Cherbourg, and although he is the simplest of citizens, without military prestige, a president worthy to sit in the White House at Washington for his freedom from arrogance, he is as much applauded (even in Normandy, which seemed the citadel of anti-republican reaction) as MacMahon was but little cheered when he went on a similar journey during the régime of the 16th of May.

Not only were the monarchists beaten in these last elections, but the extreme radicals also. Their candidates failed almost everywhere. By multiplying their papers they have produced a disastrous competition. The Intransigeant of M. Rochefort, of which 80,000 copies were issued the first day, has now a daily edition of only 12,000. The other day a rather comical adventure happened to this gentleman, on the occasion of the last arrival of pardoned convicts at the Gare de l'Ouest. Remembering the triumphal manner in which he himself was received, he asked the station-master to show him a side door, so that he might escape the ovation which, doubtless, the population of the faubourg were preparing for him. Besides the relatives of the amnestied, no one came, and M. Rochefort was able to go in by the common entry to wish them welcome, thus estimating the decline of his unwholesome popularity.

É.

GERMANY AND THE POPE.—II.

BERLIN, July, 1880.

I SHOWED in my first letter why and how Bismarck's attempts at peace with Rome have failed. It is not the first time that Prussia has been defeated in her struggle with Rome. The relations of the Prussian Government with the Roman Curia are of comparatively recent origin, dating back only to the treaties of Vienna; nevertheless they form so rich a series of diplomatic negotiations and disappointments, unsuccessful attacks and ill-timed surrenders, sudden changes from indolence and suspicion to energy and self-reliance, that there is hardly a more instructive subject for political students than the history of these days. They teach the great precept how not to do it. As the complications between king and pope are far from being settled, but on the contrary still form a very prominent chapter of modern history, they deserve to be traced in their retrograde and forward movements.

During the greater part of the last century Prussia had only several hundred thousand Catholic subjects in Silesia, Western Prussia, and part of the Lower Rhine. They lived in peace with their Protestant neighbors, the more so as the Prussian laws on all religious matters have been and are tolerant and mild. The favorite saying of Frederic the Great, that in his State every man could save his soul in his own way, was not an empty word, but a reality. The King, however, knew how to punish the clerical arrogance of Protestant parsons as well as of Catholic priests, and how to make his laws obeyed. He laughed at the Pope who, instead of addressing him as king, always insisted upon calling him Margrave of Brandenburg; nor did this childish caprice prevent Frederic from dealing justly with his Catholic subjects. During the last century in general a more liberal current in respect to all ecclesiastical matters prevailed in cabinets and amongst the people. The Jesuits were even driven out of Roman Catholic countries. Enlightened Catholic princes like Joseph II. extended the rights of the Protestants, while at the same time science and the philosophical spirit of the age combined to undermine the authority of Rome. In the summer of 1786, at their meeting at Ems, the German electors and archbishops discussed the question of making themselves independent of the Pope and formed the plan of a National German Church. Their aims were chiefly frustrated by the intrigues of the German bishops, who found it more advantageous for themselves to be dependent on far-off Rome than on their own very near metropolitans.

During the wars of the French Revolution the world was troubled by other sufferings and tribulations than clerical arrogance. Napoleon, who had broken the worldly power of the Pope, reinstated him as the spiritual head of the Roman Catholic world, and even agreed with him on a concordat for the sole purpose of using the ecclesiastical chief as a tool with which to fortify his own position and his ascendency over his subjects. In the spring of 1814 the allied emperors and kings who had dethroned Napoleon, re-enthroned the Pope. To thank them for this favor Pius VII., in his turn, a few months later reinstated the Jesuits, who were welcomed by the ruling reactionary princes as the supporters of the royal thrones and the defenders of religion against revolution. In consequence of the secularizations which followed the peace of Lunéville (1801) the Roman Church in Germany had lost almost all its estates and even charitable institutions, and for its maintenance was dependent upon the good will of the several governments. Frederic William III. of Prussia, by the treaties of Vienna, had obtained from the old clerical territories such large accessions of land that the number of his Roman Catholic subjects increased to about two-fifths of the whole population. Led by the desire of attaching these new subjects to his rule, and of avoiding the remotest suspicion of partiality, he created new archiepiscopal sees and bishoprics, endowed them on the most liberal footing, and hypothecated the income of the higher dignitaries of the church on the public domain. All this was done without any consideration on the part of Rome, and in the expectation that the Pope would help the King in defending and sustaining the so-called conservative interests of throne and altar. The Rhenish Prussians, the King was told by wilful courtiers, were free-thinkers, disciples of Voltaire and French democrats; the best means, he thought, to kill their revolutionary spirit would be to build up a strong orthodox clergy and support it with all the power of the Government. The archbishops and bishops accordingly were allowed free intercourse with the Papal See, enabling the latter to interfere with Prussian ecclesiastical matters. They exclusively controlled the education of the lower clergy, its appointments to curacies and chaplainships, and the superintendence and inspection of the primary schools.

For Prussia there was not the least danger in waiting, but she expected to achieve peace and tranquillity sooner by pressing negotiations with Rome. These the celebrated Niebuhr, who knew very much of the genius of old but very little of the diplomacy of modern Rome, was ordered to conduct. He proved, however, as poor a diplomatist as he was a great historian. Instead of imposing his most essential conditions on the Pope or withdrawing entirely, he negotiated as would become a beaten enemy craving a cessation of hostilities. He yielded all that the Jesuits, then as well as now the rulers of the Roman policy, thought fit at the time to have surrendered. The solemnization of intermarriages between Protestants and Catholics was the principal question on which the parties could not agree. The Prussian law justly determined that, in the absence of previous mutual understanding, the children, if boys, should follow the creed of the father, and, if girls, that of the mother. Rome, however, strictly refused to act in conformity with this law and to permit her priests to perform the marriage ceremonies, unless the future parents bound themselves to have their children indiscriminately baptized as Roman Catholics. Niebuhr was weak enough to leave the matter in suspense, and out of his heedlessness grew all the later difficulties, especially in the Rhenish provinces and Westphalia. The Prussian defeat was complete; the Roman victory was embodied in the papal bull "De salute animarum." As long as Count Spiegel-Desenberg was archbishop of Cologne—the most important metropolitan seat of Prussia—universal peace and good feeling were preserved. Spiegel was a gentleman of refinement and of cultivated mind, of enlightened views and mild, conciliatory manners, in his appearance a grand seigneur, and a dignified and effectual representative of the church. He increased in his diocese the institutes of learning, encouraged a more liberal education of the clergy, limited the celebration of clerical holidays to a smaller number, opposed the too-numerous pilgrimages, and finally, in 1834, perfected an agreement with his bishops which, by meeting the Government views half way on the marriage question and creating a modus vivendi, practically removed the difficulty and satisfied the great majority of Protestants and Catholics.

In 1835, however, Count Spiegel died. A stubborn, fanatical priest, a narrow-minded Westphalian baron, Clemens August von Droste-Vischering, of Münster, one of the most bigoted cities of Europe, became his successor. Under the iron rule of Napoleon he had been a pliant tool, and submitted to the French Emperor. Prussia's forbearance, however, he took for weakness and fear, and acted accordingly. Previous to being chosen to his new office Droste had promised to stick to the agreement of 1834 respecting the intermarriage question; but hardly had he been installed than he entirely disregarded it, removed clergymen and teachers who were under the suspicion of favoring Spiegel's reforms, forbade the students to attend the lectures of the liberal professors at Bonn, especially those of Hermes, and when called upon to justify his arbitrary proceedings pretended that he was not responsible to the Government, and that the Holy Spirit had ordered him to watch over the purity of the Roman Catholic doctrine. It would hardly be possible to account for the appointment of such a man, if it had not been for powers working behind the throne in Berlin, who thought it necessary to appoint this orthodox priest on account of the revolutionary spirit of Belgium. As if religious and political radicalism had not struck an alliance in Belgium and made its revolution! The archbishop's disobedience and open opposition finally ended in his deposition and arrest. In November, 1837, he was confined in the fortress of Minden and kept there till the death of Frederic William III. One of the first acts of the latter's son and successor, Frederic William IV., in 1840, was to pardon and liberate Droste. The same grace was extended to Dunin, archbishop of Posen, who had imitated the example of Droste. The new King, a self-willed and weak, orthodox, and romantic prince, dreamed of a re-establishment of harmonious government by worldly and clerical power alike, which, as in the Middle Ages, would decide the destinies of the world. Full of fancies and whims, he thought it his duty to come to a quick understanding with Rome. In fact, he gave up all that remained of his rights over the Roman Catholic Church. The most fatal measure which he took was the creation, in 1841, of a Catholic department in the ministry of ecclesiastical affairs. This department, backed by a Catholic queen and the ultra-conservative and orthodox party, exercised its influence over all appointments, and, being in constant intercourse with Rome, acted as a spy in a hostile camp. Its proceedings were not as brutal and coarse as Droste's were; it planned its schemes less suspiciously and carried them out more politely. But whatever these Ultramontanes did, they advanced their cause to the great detriment of a liberal development of spiritual affairs. It was, again, the Roman Catholic party which alone, in the revolution of 1848 in Germany, gained real and lasting advantages by extending their independence beyond state control. Instead of meeting with opposition, it received the hearty co-operation of the reactionary Protestant ministers of ecclesiastical affairs, viz., Eichhorn, Raumer, and Mühler, who welcomed it as a valuable ally against the liberal tendencies of the age.

In 1864 the Syllabus reasserted all the mediæval papal assumptions, and claimed the Church's supremacy over all secular power. The doctrine that all Protestants are and must be considered as heretics was renewed by Rome. "Heresy does not at all lessen the discharge of religious duties; the heretic has only one duty more to discharge than a faithful Roman Catholic, viz., to be converted, but not a single one less." In 1870 the Vatican Council perfected the absolute centralization of the papal rule and infallibility. Rome thus reconstructed commenced a clandestine but very bitter war against Prussia, since in 1866 the latter had defeated Austria, one of the most faithful champions of Roman Catholicism. The Pope very well appreciated the consequences of the events of 1866. A state like Prussia, having become by her Protestant character a leading power in Europe, cannot reconcile her existence with hierarchical principles and ideas. Sooner or later she must resume her original task and stand for the autonomy of the individual in religious and political matters. When, therefore, Bismarck's powerful efforts for re-establishing a united Germany proved effectual, it was Rome again which all over Europe collected its forces against the new Empire, and in 1870 it was the same Jesuitical policy, prevailing in the councils of the Pope, which did its best to instigate the French war. After the return of peace in 1871 these same enemies of Germany applied to the Emperor William for the re-establishment of the temporal power of the Pope, viz., by making a campaign against the Kingdom of Italy in the Pope's favor and giving him back the States of the Church. They of course met with a flat refusal, whereupon the Ultramontanes formed a distinct party in the Prussian Diet and the German Reichstag—the Centre. Its sole object consisted in fiercely attacking the policy of the Government, which, of course, was bound to take up the gauntlet.

Its first answer was the Imperial law of July 4, 1872, by which the Jesuits were expelled from the German territory. Then followed the Prussian May Laws (published May 11, 12, 13, 14, 1873) and their appendices, called also the Falk Laws, as Falk, the efficient Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, had introduced them. They radically did away with Prussia's vassalage to Rome, initiated by Niebuhr and fortified by Frederic William IV. and the Protestant orthodox clique. The Government at last prescribed the rules for the education and appointment of clergymen; placed the inspection of the primary schools under state control; prohibited the clerical authorities from inflicting punishment for lighter offences against the laws of the Church; excluded from Prussia all orders and congregations of the Roman Catholic Church; prescribed the oath of the archbishops and bishops; stopped the payment of their salaries in case of disobedience; administered the income of these dignitaries after their removal in consequence of open rebellion; and created a special court for the decision of all matters connected with and emanating from these laws.

When, in 1873, the Pope complained to the Emperor of the new laws, William I., on August 7, replied that to his deep concern a part of his Catholic subjects had formed a political party; that Roman Catholic clergymen of the highest standing had not only approved of this movement, but broken the laws of the State; that the authority of the laws must be preserved and, if need be, enforced by rigorous means; and, finally, that the religion of Jesus Christ and evangelical truth, to which the Pope had appealed, had nothing to do with these intrigues. In a letter addressed, February 18, 1874, to Lord Russell, thanking him for the sympathies of the English people, the Emperor said:

"I am forced to lead my people in a contest which former German emperors for centuries had to carry on against a power whose rule in all countries of the world has proved irreconcilable with the peace and well-being of nations, and whose victory in our day would endanger the blessings of the Reformation, liberty of conscience, and the authority of the law. Imbued with the spirit of my ancestors, I conduct this war with true tolerance and respect for the religious convictions of others. The laws recently passed do not attack the Roman Catholic Church nor the free religious exercise of its members; they only propose to give some guarantees to the independence of my country and of its legislation. These guarantees existed in a great many other countries, and formerly also in Prussia, without having been deemed by Rome incompatible with the free exercise of religion."

In the same way Bismarck repeatedly laid stress upon the one and undivided sovereignty of the Government to which all, high and low, were subjected. "Whoever claims," said he, "that he need not be governed by the laws of the country places himself beyond the pale of the law, tramples on the law, and will be dealt with accordingly." Every German patriot hailed these words and the accompanying deeds with satisfaction and delight; the nation never stood more unanimously by its Government. An old power of a thousand years' standing, like papal Rome, of course does not succumb to the first attack; an edifice which required centuries for building cannot be destroyed in a few years; a long struggle was therefore anticipated. Bismarck was correct in stating, what was also the opinion of the great majority of the people, that the Government had no need of precipitating the contest. Now, however, after eight years' hostilities, this same Government lays down its arms, thereby sanctioning the inference that by the introduction of the May Laws it had done wrong. For this reason public opinion takes the Government's policy as an acknowledgment of having violated the rights of its Roman Catholic subjects, and regards it as a signal defeat. How this change of tactics was brought about is, as you will have seen in my first article, at present only partly explained; how and when the contest will be reopened again I cannot tell; but you may be sure of one thing: that this struggle for life or death must be renewed by Germany if she would live in peace, and that she must beat Rome if she would not be stricken from the roll of independent nations and great powers of the world. There is not room enough for a German Emperor and a sovereign Pope at Rome. One or the other must yield. In Germany's ultimate triumph you, as well as every other civilized country, are deeply concerned. ? ?

PROGRESS OF ARCHÆOLOGY IN GREECE.

ATHENS, July 1, 1880.

THE progress made in bringing to light what is left of old Athens is, to any one accustomed to western ways, surprisingly small. The reasons are many, if not entirely satisfactory. Firstly, no one in the East must be expected to hurry—no one ever does; secondly, the foreign governments which have done so much for archæology in Greece seem to have carried elsewhere their energies; and, thirdly, the narrowness of the feeling of the Greeks themselves checks outside enthusiasm. The Greek is, I judge, of all civilized men the most chauvinist: he willingly allows no foreigner to acquire profit or glory on Hellenic soil. The country is too poor to do much for archæology, but they say it may be rich one of these days, and then Greece farà da se, which is sufficient reason for refusing all concessions to outside archæology except on terms which few localities justify, and few archæological authorities or associations are willing to accept—viz., the entire concession of the results of labor and expenditure to the Greek museums. It may suit the German archæologists to excavate Olympia, where problems of the first importance in the archæology of art were to be solved with tolerable certainty, or an enthusiast like Dr. Schliemann, to connect his name by unrecompensed expenditure with some classic locality; but already the Germans have given up and closed their works at Olympia, and men of the Schliemann stamp are hardly likely to enter into labors which only result in determinations of unobtrusive archæological problems.

The influence of the body of Greek archæologists, backed by a shallow form of patriotic pride, is, therefore, on the whole exerted against the interests of Greek archæology, because everything is done which can be done to discourage foreign associations from entering the field. Archæologists, as individuals, have rarely money to spend, and the men whose funds sustain their work, whether the representatives of government or private capitalists, are not disposed to give their money for the solution of dry problems, however much their patriotic pride might consent to do for their national museums, etc., etc. The Archæological Society of Athens lies, like the dog in the manger, the greatest of the obstacles to the advancement of the interests it represents. Everybody who wants to excavate in Greece must sign a copy of the German Olympian convention, which the Germans themselves will accept no longer. Any attempt to show the impolicy of such obstruction or the illiberality of such a policy is met with the reply: We shall be rich enough one day to do all that is to be done, and our treasures had better lie another thousand years under ground than leave Greece. As if the Elgin marbles in London, and the statues carried away by the Romans, but known wherever found as Greek, had not done more for Greece, made more Philhellenes, than all modern Greece will ever do! As if every noble fragment of Greek work sent to the antipodes was not a missionary for the propaganda of Philhellenism!

Meantime, not only are treasures perishing every day, but every advance in the prosperity of Greece is making archæological research more costly or impossible. The city of Athens of to-day is extending continually over ground which should be sacred to archæology, at least until it has been searched, and the most expensive part of the modern city overlies one of the most interesting cemeteries of the old city. It is only the chance of having to reconstruct a house which can permit certain points of Athenian topography to be elucidated. And that which was merely the work of ignorance in Otho and his time is being consciously repeated wherever a city is being built on an old site: the old work is being irretrievably covered by the new. Science is cosmopolitan, and what it finds is common good; but there is something revolting to the natural man in this scientific chauvinism, something which checks sympathy with Greece, so far as sympathy results from the admiration of a great past, guarded by such narrow-minded trustees. There are monuments of which no liberal man would wish to deprive Greece; but the sweeping, absurd, and suicidal policy which forbids all excavation except for the Greek museums, and any exportation of objects of antiquity whatever, according to the present laws, checks sympathy, deters aid where it would otherwise be given, and is the cause of injury and even destruction to objects maybe of inestimable value, to say nothing of the continual smuggling which is the inevitable result of all prohibitory laws. The world must be content to congratulate itself that the Romans had carried away most of the valuable statues of Greece, and that England had an opportunity to acquire the Elgin marbles and France the trouvaille of Melos, otherwise no one would ever have been able to study Greek art, and probably very little of it would have survived to our day.

No doubt many archæological associations would be glad to assist that of Athens in what ought to be its special and urgent work, the clearing away of all the rubbish accumulated around the Acropolis and such parts of the city as are still unbuilt over; but I sincerely hope that none will do so till that Society, under whose counsel and direction is all the legislation on the subject, adopts a wider and more liberal policy. What the Society has done since I first saw Athens fourteen years ago ought to have been done in three months. Since my last visit, eleven years ago, it has cleared away the rubbish which concealed the ground visited by Pausanias in part of his third day's visit, disclosing to a more or less doubtful identification the tomb of Talos; the sanctuary of Asklepios with its fountain—as to which no doubt can exist, as the fountain still flows, and you are offered its slightly medicinal water to-day from the old channels; the temples of Themis and Aphrodite-Pandemos; the tumulus of Hippolyte, of which nothing seems recognizable; and the sanctuary of Ceres and the Earth, whose location has been so variously conjectured. Several temples are uncovered in these recent researches, and the fragments have very great architectural interest as showing what wide liberty and variety of detail Greek genius allowed itself. The sanctuary of Asklepios reminds one (pardon the vulgarity) of a modern spa with its colonnade for the promenade of the water-takers. But what are of very great interest, even more, artistically, than anything exhumed of late years about the Acropolis, are some of the votive bas-reliefs which had been placed in the sanctuary, and which are of the most admirable art, while at the same time others prove that even in those times there were sculptors as bad as any the backwoods have produced.

The general effect of the Acropolis rock, as it is uncovered by this nearly complete clearing away of the long slopes of rubbish which once disfigured it (and are still intact on the north side) is grandiose, and one appreciates the matchless position of this citadel, which to all the appliances of ancient days was impregnable if properly guarded and provisioned. The picturesqueness is immensely increased by the discovery of the bold and rugged base of the rock springing out of the plain almost without a preface. There is still a good deal of clearing away to be done on the north side, and possibly some interesting remains to be disclosed, and some perhaps still more important on the west and northwest, where the débris forms a sort of col between the Acropolis hill and the Areopagus. It is here, if anywhere, that we must hope to find the solution of the problem of the first fortification of the Acropolis by the Pelasgi, and the indications of the Enneapylæ, the nine-gated approach to the early city of Minerva. To any one who has made a careful study of Pelasgic remains the so-called Pelasgic wall on the Acropolis, behind the southern wing of the Propylæa, has nothing of this character generally attributed to it, nor is there on the Acropolis itself a piece of wall which merits this distinction. The substantial destruction of every structure by the Persians, and the subsequent employment of all the débris and material which did not serve as substructure (as with the foundations of the first Parthenon) as matter for reconstructing fortifications, etc., leave scarcely a possibility of any part of the early walls being still in situ on the Acropolis. But the Pelasgic engineering was in no case that I know of content with a simple circuit of wall defending a crest of rock which in this case hardly needed a wall, and certainly only needed it on the west (the Persian, be it remembered, only succeeded in entering by a subterranean passage, artificial or artificially enlarged, and which the Greeks neglected to guard), and I should be surprised if on uncovering the original surface to the west some indication were not found that the Areopagus had originally been enclosed, as indeed Ovid distinctly says that it was, and that the whole elevated land east of the valley between the Museum hill and the Areopagus was enclosed in the first Athens. The fortifications of that epoch invariably included an upper and a lower city, where the ground permitted it, and sites were very rarely chosen which did not admit it, an isolated peak being often arbitrarily divided when no natural division occurred; and in the case of Athens the complicated defence which we have a right to conclude existed, from the necessity of nine gates to it, could only have been made on the western side of this mass, of which the Areopagus and the Acropolis are only two separate peaks, perfectly conforming by their mutual relation to the conditions required by Pelasgic structure.

The excavation on this side will involve the reconstruction of the road to the Acropolis, probably by a viaduct, if people must go up by a carriage-road, which the ancients evidently did not, as Pausanias particularizes the road by which he entered the lower city of his time (a very different thing from the lower Pelasgic city) as one which was available for carriages; and in his time, moreover, the Enneapylæ had probably utterly disappeared, as he mentions no fortifications whatever. There is, therefore, even with the occasional help of the French and German academies, use for all the funds of the Greek Archæological Society for a long time on this point of the first importance, viz., the restoration of the Acropolis to its ancient condition. So that one would say that the Society would be disposed rather to attract explorers and stimulate excavation all over Greece than to suppress it by its absurd policy.

A glimpse of the statues just discovered at Melos, though still in their packing-boxes, shows them to be really valuable acquisitions to our knowledge of Greek art, though far from the elevation of the "Venus." They are a Neptune and a female figure draped—possibly a Ceres, but the head and extremities still lacking leave room for conjecture. The new museum is filling up; and though there is little hope that it will ever contain many of the masterpieces of Greek art, unless Italy should be more liberal than Greece and permit the re-exportation of them, there will be enough to make it worth a visit to Athens.

The Mycenæ collection is well arranged and of very great and perplexing interest. I am disposed to side with those who give to it a comparatively modern date, and one utterly inconsistent with the Agamemnonian theory. What is beyond all question is that there are works of widely different epochs, and amongst the engraved stones are two nearly three-fourths of an inch in diameter, of lentoid shape, which are most certainly, if there is any certainty attainable in such questions, of workmanship not anterior to the Roman epoch, and distinctly in the manner of cutting of which we know no example in archaic art, known as such. One of them, a common amethyst—a stone I have never known of archaic use—is not only cut in the Roman manner, with the wheel, but is in unmistakable imitation of an archaic design. This was found in one of the tombs; the other, not less characteristic in technique, but original and late in the spirit of its design, was found outside the tomb; but in both cases not only the cutting but the form and design indicate work done after the best period of gem-cutting. With them were, however, some admirable archaic gems, unquestionable and closely resembling the earliest Etruscan work (if that can be distinguished from Pelasgic). In support of the extreme antiquity of the find, the destructive oxidation of the silver vases is brought forward, but this is more than offset by the fact that the bronze articles are in very good state and far less corroded than the silver, while fragments of wood and cloth remain. A little sulphur in the soil, or lead in the silver, would perhaps account for the condition of the silverware. Taking, however, the gems as the indications, I should be inclined to dispute an antiquity so great as the period of Alexander the Great. There are some gold intaglii which I should be inclined to consider as of Asiatic origin, and later than that period by a century or two at least; but, though I am not so confident of this, certain it is that they belong to a decadence of art. The Hissarlik treasures are said to be in the vaults of the Bank, and awaiting the completion of Schliemann's three-story Pompeian villa to be seen by the general public.

It may interest the admirers of the latest discovered form of Greek art, the so-called figurines of Tanagra, to know that they are so extensively and successfully counterfeited that there are probably not more than three persons in Athens whose judgment is absolutely trustworthy in regard to them. The most experienced amateurs have been deceived by demonstrated forgeries, and the law has already been successfully invoked to reclaim guarantees of the dealers. In one case a figurine sold to a well-known collector for 2,000 francs was discovered to be a copy of an Apollo found at Pompeii; and what is even more glaring, an entirely new type of ornamented terra-cotta has been introduced, fabricated in Crete, and successfully palmed off on collectors as a novelty for considerable sums—in one case I know of as much as £30 for one broken vase, broken intentionally to give it an air of unquestionable genuineness. I was offered in Crete a pair of them in perfect condition for £50, and the owner did not seem in the least surprised when I told him I would not give him ten shillings for them, but put them back laughingly in his basket as if he thought it a good joke between us. In Athens the usual mode of taking in the stranger is to send to the hotel a peasant—an apparently unmistakable rustic—who pretends to have found a couple of figurines in his own field and to be anxious to sell them secretly, as the Government claims the half of all the antiquities found, and to escape this tax he is willing to sell them for a small price. Or perhaps the valet de place informs you with great secrecy that a peasant has been about the hotel with some figurines or vases which he wants to get out of the way of official attention, etc. The result is, in general, that in no city I have ever been in are there so many forgeries of antique objects of all kinds as in Athens. It would seem as if something of the old Greek art-feeling had broken out in this vein. Neither coins nor terra-cottas can be bought with any kind of certainty here except by the most capable experts, and for genuine articles the prices are enormously higher than in Italy for the same class of articles, the excavations in Magna Græcia affording much more abundant results than those in Greece proper.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CENSUS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the matter of the census it will be well to consider other figures besides the enumerations of 1870 and 1880. In South Carolina, for example, a State census was taken in 1869, and another in 1875—both, it will be seen, by Republican officials. Now, e. g., Kershaw County presents a stock grievance, as having nearly doubled its population since 1870, from 11,754 to 21,181; but the State census of 1875 gives 20,992. Orangeburg County had in 1860 24,896; 1869, 26,842; 1875, 34,070; 1880, 41,000. Is it not self-evident that the figures of 1870, only 16,865 for the county (the town of Orangeburg only 246!), were grossly incorrect? We had better possess our souls in patience until General Walker gives us the official returns.

GEORGIA POLITICS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Democratic Convention at Atlanta, which adjourned without a nomination, was packed, as far as possible, in the interest of Governor Colquitt, and I believe that the election will prove that he was in no sense a proper candidate, and would not have been nominated had the people generally been properly represented at the convention. Whether he is in any way responsible for the disgraceful plundering of the State which was not so long ago exposed, may be a question of opinion, but he is at all events closely allied to the corrupt ring which now controls the Democratic party, and consequently the State, and benefits by its power. I regret to see that the Nation, in its review of "The Week," advises the colored people to vote for Colquitt because he did a simple act of justice and his duty to one of their race. The outrage you mention was received with the greatest indignation by all classes in the community, and the comment thereon by the Atlanta Constitution—which, by the way, is one of the most bitter partisan journals—well illustrates the general feeling. There are many lawless counties in the State, and one of them was where this outrage occurred. It is, however, a curious fact that for one outrage upon a negro there are twenty on white people—which the relative proportion of each in the population will not account for.

The recent Democratic convention well illustrates which way the wind is blowing, and it is pretty evident that in this State, at least, the party is going to pieces; and this is the general feeling here with men whose opinion is unbiassed. It is unfortunate that the Republican party has no organization in the State, and its early history here is so unpleasant to most of the white population that it never can be revived. The so-called Independent party, which already has great power and is generally supported by the negroes, is led by sharp and unscrupulous men, and is merely a Democratic bolt without any particular organization. It seems to me that this independent movement—of which Senator Norwood is now the leader for governor—should be supported by the negroes and every one else who desires to see a new party come out of the present chaos, unless it be still more desirable that the negroes should divide like the whites. This latter supposition is not likely to occur, however, while the name of the Republican party exists, and it is to be hoped that a new party under some other name than Independent may take shape from the present discontent, with some creed other than the buried issues of the past.

This is, I believe, a just view of Southern politics to-day by a Northern resident—as far, at least, as this part of the South is concerned. W. T.

MARIETTA, GA., Aug. 23, 1880.

THE BEST WAY TO PREVENT "ELECTION FRAUDS" AT THE SOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The most certain and effectual way to bring this about is to elect Hancock. The Southern whites fear Republican ascendency because they think the Republicans would be willing to remand them to negro rule to perpetuate their power. Remove this apprehension by a change of administration, and there could not fail to be a disintegration of parties as they now stand. The whites would then divide, and then the negroes would also divide, and the elections would be more fairly conducted. It was a great mistake to confer the franchise upon the negroes indiscriminately. The mass of them are wholly unfit for such a trust. The presence of such a mass of hopeless ignorance as a factor must necessarily degrade our politics, especially as they can never blend with the whites as one people. As long, however, as the color line is forced upon us as the leading political issue, the whites must be expected in some way to be masters of the situation, and any strategy needed to effect this will be considered as justifiable as similar strategy between belligerents in time of war. EASTOVER, S. C., Aug. 24, 1880.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S CIVIL-SERVICE ATTITUDE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Would you be kind enough to state in your columns what evidence there is, if any, that Mr. Garfield is in sympathy with the Independents on the question of civil-service reform? I ask this because, as an Independent and a citizen of Mr. Garfield's district, I have watched pretty carefully the distribution of offices and the conduct of office-holders in that portion of the district in which I live; and the evidence thus obtained, as well as what I can learn from men prominent in political circles, goes to show that that sentence in his letter of acceptance which you term (No. 785, p. 37) "a vindication of Congressional interference with appointments" is an expression of his real sentiment on that question. In his own district his position is generally understood to be this: Civil officers should be selected, with regard to fitness, from the party in power. Yours very truly,

L. B. TUCKERMAN.

AUSTINBURG, ASHTABULA CO., O., August 21, 1880.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With your correspondent "J. B. M." (who is certainly a practical man), I will be one of five thousand, one thousand, or one hundred to give, as the case may be, one, five, or fifty dollars a year towards the formation of a publication society, the aim of which shall be the destruction of the spoils system, which in my judgment is not "second only in importance to the abolition of slavery," for it is slavery itself—a degrading bondage which holds black and white alike. Truly yours, JOSEPH PARRISH.

PHILADELPHIA, August 26, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Quite agreeing with your correspondent "F. W. H.," I shall be very glad to assist in the formation of a publication society in opposition to the "spoils" system, and to that end will make the same offer as is made by "J. B. M." in your paper of yesterday.

Yours truly,

CHARLES MCK. LEOSER.

27 PECK SLIP, NEW YORK, August 27, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I entirely agree with your correspondent, "F. W. H.," in the Nation, No. 790, in what he says of the need for "Civil-service reform agitation." I look upon the spoils system as responsible for the bad police, etc., of our cities, for Seawanhaka accidents (are not the inspectors appointed on political grounds?), and for very much of the bad government with which we are cursed. Holding these views I take pains to express them whenever opportunity offers, hoping thus to do a little towards awaking attention to the need for reform. When the scales once fall from the eyes of our people, short work will be made of the "Machine" and what it stands for. I wish our people could be made to see how directly railroad and steamboat accidents result from the low official tone resulting from the bad example and influence of our civil-service performances—that is, administrative dry-rot! Some day men will find that these things come home not only to their business but to their bosoms in a very positive sense.

I shall be glad to be a member of the society "F. W. H." proposes, and to contribute money to its work. I fear it will be difficult to get five thousand (5,000) names—five hundred possibly. I am ready to contribute ten dollars a year, or more, to help to carry on this good work.

Very respectfully, P. S. J.

BROOKLYN, August 24, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Ever since it became clear that the noble efforts of Thomas Allen Jenckes, of Rhode Island, in favor of the reform in our civil service were not destined to meet with immediate success, it seemed evident to thoughtful men that the only way out of our Slough of Despond was by the patient methods of the old abolitionists. First and foremost among them was the formation of an association devoted to the reform in question. The well-written communication, therefore, of "F. W. H.," in your last issue, is sure to meet with some cordial responses.

The first desideratum is a preliminary meeting. New York, Philadelphia, and Boston will be likely to be chiefly interested in such a meeting. Of the places named by your correspondent wherein to hold it Newport seems most convenient of access to these three cities, as well as pleasantest at this season.

It would gratify many friends of this reform to feel as confident as your correspondent that after the election many Democrats would join such an association. But with the exception of the Adamses it would be difficult to point to any expression from a Democrat departing from the dictum of Governor Marcy—"the sharp mustard-seed of our present dilemma"—that "to the victors belong the spoils." W. H.

COHASSET, MASS., Aug. 23, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I trust that the suggestions of "F. W. H." in the Nation of the 19th inst. will meet with a prompt and effective response in the formation of a society for the publication and diffusion of argument and information in behalf of a true civil-service reform.

The sooner it is done the better. The interest in public affairs growing out of the Presidential canvass would supply a large class of readers among voters at other times indifferent. Nor does it seem unavoidable, or even necessary or desirable, that such a society should enlist under the banner of either Garfield or Hancock. I agree with the Nation, and with "F. W. H.," in believing that the friends of such reform have far more to hope from the election of the former. But there are those who sincerely entertain, as they claim, a like hope—I confess I can see no ground for it—through the success of the Democratic party. Why antagonize either, since civil-service reform is a policy, which its friends would gladly see enforced by either, and which is promised in the platforms of both? The work of such a society would bind it to no existing party or candidate, as such, and it would affiliate exclusively with either only if and because one should adopt and the other reject it. Its office would be to bring, in the plainest and most practical shape, before men of all parties the vast and increasing evils of the spoils system, the frightful peril into which it has already brought the stability of free representative government, the true nature and methods of the reform desired, its actual simplicity and complete practicability whenever the people of this country choose to command it, and the necessity of electing not only a President who will execute, but also Congressmen who will honestly support, or else will be afraid to oppose, efficient laws to that end.

For this purpose, at this time, the dissemination of appropriate political tracts would be greatly facilitated by the existence of thousands of political clubs all over the country, engaged in actively distributing documents relating to public questions, and the fact that many thousands of voters, especially young men, are disposed, as at no other time, to read and think seriously about such questions. The argument for such a reform is independent of either party. Both need to be reformed in that regard, and both have acknowledged the demand for it by promises which each charges that the other means to break—with perfect justice, no doubt, so far as many influential members of both are concerned. Why not so frame such arguments as to reach, without offending, members of either party, leaving the voters whom they convince to decide for themselves which party they can safely trust? Were the tracts of the Anti-Corn-Law League addressed to Whigs or to Tories, or the Anti-Slavery appeals to Whigs or to Democrats, as such? Why need the cause of civil-service reform be handicapped with either Democratic blunders or Republican mistakes?

However, it will be for those who shall form such a society to weigh these and all other considerations as to the best mode of doing its work. I am satisfied, for one, that the conviction that this reform must be had is far more deep and widespread than many of its friends venture to believe: of which it is one indication, that even the politicians and avowed spoilsmen at Chicago, willing enough to smother, were yet afraid to reject, the Massachusetts amendment to the platform when forced to a direct vote. I am convinced that in capable and fearless hands such a society would meet a welcome and find a pecuniary support greatly beyond the estimates of "F. W. H." The mere fact that it had brought this question home to the voters, and compelled its recognition during the Presidential canvass, would be an important preparation for the determined fight which must and will be made—forced, if need be, by a small band—in Congress, and which, sooner or later, is certain to be won. To those who never lost faith or hope during the war for the Union, and who rejoice in the assured triumph of hard money, common sense, and public honesty over the greenback craze, it is no great stretch of faith to believe that this nation of practical, and for the most part honest and hard-working, business men can be convinced that the same methods which ensure honest, efficient, and economical service in their private business will serve them best also as a people.

I earnestly trust that the proposed conference may be held and such a society formed, and that such men as "F. W. H." names will act with promptness, energy, and, above all, with a hearty faith in their cause.

H. H.

NEWPORT, R. I., Aug. 21, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have long wondered why the able advocates of civil-service reform have made so little effort to explain their principles fully to the common people, and expended so much strength in urging politicians to adopt reform resolutions for which they have contempt, and for which they know nine-tenths of the voters have the most indifferent regard.

My association is wholly with the common people, and though my political friends all admit the need of improvement in political morals, I cannot name three who have any definite idea of what is meant by civil-service reform, or how the spoils system is responsible for our demoralization. The recent correspondence in the Nation leads me to hope that some plan will soon be adopted to bring this great moral question to the attention of all serious voters. Francis Parkman says that "The champion of the new reform will need no whit less enthusiasm [than the abolitionists], but it must be tempered with judgment and armed with knowledge."

I would gladly give five dollars a year to sustain "F. W. H.'s" "Civil-Service Reform Publication Society," which seems to me to be exactly adapted to spread knowledge and enthusiasm through the country, which Mr. Parkman believes "is full of recuperative force, latent just now, and kept so by the easy and apathetic good-nature which so strangely marks our people." "F. W. H." desires persons interested in the movement which he advocates to send their names and addresses to the Independents' committee-room. Will you please state the full address of the committee?

WALTHAM, MASS., August 23, 1880.

[Address the Independent Republican Committee, Box 1827, New York.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

JAMES J. CHAPMAN, Washington, has brought out Mr. Edward McPherson's 'Hand-Book of Politics for 1880.' The contents are of the usual character—President's messages; judicial decisions; Congressional measures, votes, and resolutions; national political conventions, and statistical tables. We doubt if any volume of the series has a more permanent value, if one considers only the light which it sheds on the present controversy over the powers of the Federal Government in the regulation of elections.——Newly discovered material for a volume of sketches by Charles Dickens will be, by special arrangement, printed here in the "Leisure Hour Series" by Henry Holt & Co., under the title of 'Mudfog Papers,' etc. The same firm have in preparation a 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia of Persons and Places,' by John D. Champlin—a welcome supplement to his childish cyclopædia of common things.——J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press a sociological work which will doubtless be made to do political service also—'Homicide North and South,' by H. V. Redfield. It offers in a scientific spirit "a comparative view of crimes against the person in various parts of the United States."——William Bros., Cleveland, announce a 'History of Hamilton County, Ohio,' by Captain Henry A. Ford.——Macmillan & Co. will shortly have ready Roby's new Latin Grammar for schools, the high quality of which can safely be predicted.——The New England Publishing Co., Boston, Mass., will issue this month a bi-monthly international magazine called Education, which "proposes to discuss questions of education on the sides of philosophy and humanity," or, less vaguely, to be a sort of pedagogical review in the field of the higher education. Mr. Thomas W. Bicknell will be its conductor.——Mr. B. F. De Costa's "Traditional Washington Vindicated," in the August number of the Magazine of American History, is also a rehabilitation of his first biographer, Weems. The story of the little hatchet is ingeniously sustained by reference to the severity of the Virginia laws touching the mutilation of fruit-trees. The number is given up to Washingtoniana, and contains thirty-two hitherto unpublished letters of the general in the years 1782–3. Two of these relate to slaves carried off by the fortunes of war. "Although," writes Washington to Col. Bland, "I have several Servants in like predicament with yours, I have not yet made any attempt for their recovery."——The first annual report of the Cornell University Experiment Station (Ithaca: The University Press) shows what can be achieved without an endowment. It has a special value for dairymen and cultivators; the longest paper relates to the lung plague in cattle.——Last winter (No. 754) we noticed Mr. Fred. Barnard's series of six "Character Sketches from Charles Dickens," published in portfolio by Cassell, Petter & Galpin. The same firm has now reissued them in reduced fac-simile (4to), with little detriment to the drawings, and of course with a marked reduction in the price.——We have received from Macmillan & Co. a 'Treatise on Determinants,' by Robert Forsyth Scott, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. The principal novelty about the work is the systematic application to the theory of determinants of some of the fundamental principles of Grassmann's 'Ausdehnungslehre.' It is another indication of the irresistible manner in which the ideas of that remarkable man are forcing themselves upon the mathematical world. The work presents the results of a great number of papers widely scattered in mathematical journals, transactions of learned societies, etc. Of these it gives a valuable bibliography. For purposes of self-instruction, it does not appear well adapted to the use of those who have no previous acquaintance with the subject.——The South Australian Institute of Adelaide, whose origin goes back to 1834, exactly a fortnight after the colony was established, laid on the 7th day of last November the corner-stone of its new building, which will embrace a Public Library, National Gallery, and Museum. A pamphlet, giving an account of the proceedings, as well as of the history of the Institute, has just reached us.——Messrs. Sands & McDougall, of Melbourne, Victoria, have published a limited number of copies of 'The Baconian Authorship of the so-called Shakespeare Plays Demonstrated by an Original Enquiry,' by William Thomson, F.R.C.S.——The lectures of Professor Herman Grimm on Goethe, reviewed in No. 639 of the Nation, have appeared in a new edition, making a single volume, and greatly improved by the addition of a list of the chief editions of Goethe's works, select references to the literature pertaining to Goethe, a chronological table (1474–1880), and an excellent index (New York: B. Westermann & Co.)——One can now obtain of J. Dumaine, 30 rue Dauphine, Paris, any one or all of the sheets (save that including Lyons) of the map of France published by the General Staff on a scale of 1:80,000, or .792 inch to the mile. They number 258 and upwards (e.g., No. 160, 160 bis, 160 ter). The indication of highways and railroads, canals, villages, heights, marsh, woodland, vineyards, etc., is very minute. The sheets cost one franc each unmounted, and three mounted. —Among the ingenious explanations of the backwardness of the South in promoting public schools must be reckoned that furnished by the Rev. W. H. Patten, D.D., to a late number of the Methodist. "As a rule," he says, "Southern leaders greatly desire the education of the masses of the people, both white and colored, but they fear the consequences of an irreligious education of the masses more than they do the evil resulting from a partial ignorance of letters." Accordingly, "representative men vote money reluctantly to inaugurate and sustain a godless system of education, and not because they are indifferent to the subject." Dr. Patten thinks this view "a slow one," but "safer for all interests." He further explains what he means by "godless education" by saying that it "destroys the power of conscience by destroying the power which is back of conscience, which is God"—certainly the most destructive agency yet discovered. He does not intimate where this system prevails, but his substitute for it is to place "schools for the higher education of the colored people under religious control."

—The position which the late General Albert J. Myer held in the scientific world was peculiar. He was at the head of the most extensive and important meteorological service in the world, which had grown up mainly under his directions and through his instrumentality, and which in ten years has become an indispensable function of the Government. Yet he was not properly to be called a meteorologist, and his official designation as Chief Signal Officer U. S. A. both indicated the original source of his distinction and the kind of talent which he brought to his later work. His invention lay in perfecting the art of signalling, by which during the war he rendered the greatest assistance to the operations in the field. His success since 1870 in organizing and developing the meteorological branch of the Signal Office was owing to very great executive ability on his part, and the wonted liberality of Congress in matters pertaining to science. In criticising his annual reports we have remarked on the disturbance of the records caused by embracing the returns of stations dominated by their environment, on the fatal want of accuracy in editing the returns, and on other evidences of the lack of a controlling mind imbued with the principles of the science. On this side, therefore, General Myer's loss can more than be made good, and it should not be difficult both to maintain the existing discipline and to extend the service with better judgment. Perhaps also his successor will be less open to the suspicion of magnifying his own reputation at the expense of his assistants and subordinates. General Myer was a native of Newburgh, N. Y., where he was born in 1828. He took his degree in medicine at the University of Buffalo, and entered the Army in 1854 as an assistant surgeon.

—The Marquis of Bath has recently published a little book under the title 'Observations on Bulgarian Affairs,' in which he gives the impressions received during a journey through Eastern Rumelia and Bulgaria in May and June, 1879. It is in no sense an account of his travels, but a clear and pleasantly written description of the people and the new governments established by the Treaty of Berlin, their relations to their neighbors, and their prospects for the future. The Marquis does not conceal his strong Liberal bias and his disgust at the success of the Jingo Government of Great Britain in preventing the creation of a powerful Bulgarian state, consisting of Eastern Rumelia, Bulgaria, and a part of Macedonia. The strong Turkish sympathies of the English officials are, however, not without some advantage, as the following extract will show:

"In all probability the English Consul-General has contributed in no small degree to the success of this, the most recent, and, for the present, most prosperous attempt at self-government on the part of a province lately subject to Turkish rule. By his unceasing hostility he has brought home to the Bulgarians the consciousness of there being among them an ever-present enemy ready to turn to account any mistake they may commit, and impressed on them the necessity of sinking all minor differences in order to unite for the preservation of their newly-acquired liberties, and in support of the governor and of the constitution, on the maintenance of which they at present depend."

The author has a high appreciation of the value of the labors of the missionaries of the American Board. "The result of their teachings," he says, "has permeated all Bulgarian society, and is not the least important of the causes that have rendered the people capable of wisely using the freedom so suddenly conferred upon them." The general desire for schools and a superior education is quite remarkable, as is the absence of class or race hatred, even against their former oppressors. The strongest opponents, apparently, of the new state and the province are the Phanariot Greeks, who have seen their ecclesiastical supremacy overthrown and their political hopes of the succession to Constantinople endangered by the rapid development of the Bulgarian nation.

—In the August number of Le Livre M. A. J. Pons insists upon the importance in Balzac's career of his failure as a publisher, and afterwards as a printer and type-founder. He gives interesting details of the classics bearing the imprint of H. Balzac, "éditeur-propriétaire, rue des Marais-Saint-Germain 17," which were issued in 1825 and 1826—the complete works of Molière and La Fontaine. These were put forth in illustrated livraisons forming a single volume when complete. Balzac furnished a Life of Fontaine, in which, as M. Pons says, by a curious kind of misinterpretation the novelist "unconsciously projected his own features upon those of the fabulist." Neither can M. Pons praise the engravings (after designs by Devéria, some of whose work is reproduced in this number of Le Livre in connection with another article); but print and paper were excellent and the price not dear. Still, nobody wanted the books, and they were disposed of as waste paper before one in twenty had been sold. With a loan of $6,000 from his indulgent father, Balzac and one Barbier, a practical printer without funds, set up an office and manufactured a number of books, including, besides some of good quality, 'L'Art de mettre sa cravate' and (most ominous) 'L'Art de ne pas payer ses dettes.' They even added a type-foundry to their establishment when the pinch was hardest, as a means of improving their credit, and then their creditors compelled them to liquidate, leaving the printing-office to Barbier and the foundry to a M. Deberny, who found his profit in it. Balzac emerged with honor but loaded with debt, and then resumed strenuously his literary undertakings, having gained an experience which was of the greatest value to him. He had seen the bright and the dark side of life, and especially learned all the shifts of the impecunious. His Gobsecks and Birotteaus and Crevels were partly the reflection of his own past. Above all, he learned "the potency of money and the grand rôle which this force plays in our modern society."

—European scholars are still busy discussing the revelations made last winter by Prof. Sophus Bugge and Dr. A. Chr. Bang, of Christiania, Norway, in regard to the origin of Teutonic mythology. Illness has prevented Prof. Bugge from publishing his lectures in an authentic form. Of Bang's little work (Völuspaa og de Sibyllinske Orakler.' Christiania. 1879) we have received a copy in the original, and also a German translation by J. C. Pœstion ('Voluspá und die Sibyllinischen Orakel.' Vienna. 1880). The translation is somewhat enlarged, giving, instead of references to the Sibylline oracles, the passages themselves in full, so that the reader who has not the opportunity or the time to refer to the work itself, which is very scarce, finds his task at once more agreeable and more profitable. The Norse edition also abounds in aggravating misprints, which have been corrected in the German version. As already pointed out in the Nation of March 18, of this year, Prof. Bugge has attempted to show that a considerable part of the Teutonic mythological literature is not national, but is based partly on Jewish-Christian, partly on Greek-Roman legends, and was imported to the north by the vikings from Ireland and the isles around Great Britain. In the work before us Dr. Bang has made a special investigation in regard to the 'Völuspa' (the vala's prophecy, the first and by far the most interesting and important lay in the Elder Edda), and has come to the remarkable conclusion that both as to form and contents it is wholly based on the Sibylline oracles, and that, like these, its purpose is to scatter Christian doctrines among the heathen. From the second to the fourth centuries after Christ there were produced a number of so-called Sibylline oracles, purporting to be of divine origin, and in a credulous age they were not unfrequently quoted by the Church fathers. Of these a collection was published in two volumes by Alexandre (Paris. 1841–53), and another, complete and furnished with critical commentaries, by Dr. J. H. Friedlieb in a metric German translation (Leipzig. 1852). It is to these post-classical Sibylline books that Dr. Bang refers. The whole drift of his discussion is to show that the songs of the Elder Edda, the prose tales in the Younger Edda, and the Latin-dressed stories in Saxo Grammaticus—that is to say, all those weird traditions which we have been taught and have accustomed ourselves to regard as the venerable and unadulterated expression of Teutonic heathendom—are a mere hash made out of Teutonic, classic, and Christian ingredients.

—After a careful perusal of both the original and the translation, and after a painstaking examination of the references, we are bound to say that we utterly fail to see the force of the author's arguments. The numerous passages in the oracles referred to as parallel to lines in the 'Völuspa' are never convincing, and in some instances seem almost ridiculous. The only resemblance we are able to see between the two is that they treat of the origin, development, destruction, and regeneration of the world. But, in the name of common sense, what mythology or religion does not do this? On this principle it would be easy enough to show that the Hindu mythology is founded on the Norse, or to prove that any religious system is borrowed from any other. In the Sibylline oracles we fail to find a single myth, a sentence, a line, or a name like those in the 'Völuspa' and the Eddas. Where in the oracles is there a word about Niflheim, Muspelheim, Ginungagap, the Elivogs, and the whole pre-chaotic condition of the universe? There is not a syllable about Ymer and Audhumbla, who represent the Teutonic chaos; nor of Odin's creating the world (Kosmos) out of Ymer's slain body. There are no names in these oracles that, etymologically or otherwise, suggest Odin, Thor, Balder, Loke, Frey, etc. The oracles speak, like the Bible, of the end of the world and the wicked times that go before its destruction; but these passages bear not the slightest resemblance to the Eddaic description of Ragnarok (the twilight of the gods), in which all the good, on the one side, and all the evil forces, on the other, meet on the great battle-plain Vigrid, and mutually slay each other. They are as unlike as the Teutonic representation of creation is unlike the Jewish. Of course there is a place of reward for the good and a place of punishment for the bad; but the Sibylline oracles depict for us no shield-thatched Valhal, no Gimle that outshines the sun, and no Nastrand constructed of serpents wattled together, with all their heads turned into the hall and filling it with streams of poison in which perjurers, murderers, and adulterers have to wade. Indeed, the similarity between the oracles and the 'Völuspa' is so very slight that we cannot see how any one could be struck with it. Furthermore, if the supposed author of the 'Völuspa' imitated the Sibylline oracles, where did he find them? Dr. Bang makes short work of it by alleging that these Eddic lays, which every one knows are written in pure Old-Norse, were composed on the Orkneys, on the Hebrides, and in Ireland and Scotland, where there were monasteries filled with rare books. We look in vain for any proof of this.

—In the 'Sammlung gemeinverständlicher wissenschaftlicher Vorträge' (Berlin: Carl Habel) three recent numbers—339, 'The Government-Post of the Roman Emperors,' by Prof. Gottfried Ritter von Rittershain, of Prague, and 340 and 341, 'Journals and Journalists of the French Revolution,' by Dr. Ambrosius Neményi, of Buda-Pesth—are noticeably interesting, and give a good idea of their subjects. The Roman post was created by Augustus, and was an imitation of the Persian system. Before the time of the Cæsars the rulers of the provinces were much more independent than afterwards. The cost of the post fell upon the provinces, and was almost wholly without benefit to private individuals. The names cursus publicus and cursus vehicularis show that light wagons were used when the quantity of despatches was great, or speed not especially important. With regard to the evectio, however, the despatch of persons as well as baggage, by imperial permission, the author is of opinion that this arose under later emperors. Permissions to use the post were called diplomata, at first a word of wider signification, but, after the second century, used especially for postal permits, and the officers charged with issuing them—mostly freedmen—were called a diplomatibus. The system fell into decay with the fall of the empire, but Theodoric the Great attempted to revive it, and in France down to the ninth century, long after the fall of the Merovingians, the old technical terms were still in use, for some of which the reader must look outside the usual classical dictionaries. The author refers to numerous works on the subject, and gives interesting details and quotations.

—The journalists of the French Revolution Dr. Neményi divides into three classes: the earnest, the bloodthirsty, and the satirists. Under the first head we have Mirabeau, Brissot, André Chénier, Loustallot, and on the other hand, as defenders of constitutional ideas, Mallet-Dupan and Ch. J. Panckoucke, founder of the Moniteur Universel. Of the second class, Marat, Fréron, and Camille Desmoulins, in some of his phases, and, on the royalist side, the Abbé Royou. Hébert, the founder of the Père Duchêne, belongs to this class also, but on account of his literary qualities the author places him in his third class, along with Desmoulins, whom, with Carlyle, he considers the brightest of all and the wittiest. The author describes at length the wit of the journalists on the royalist side, and has special praise for Suleau among the journalists of the reaction. Suleau, he says, was one of the most strangely gifted men and most honorable partisans, and had no superior in the possession and expression of the Middle-Age French wit. With Desmoulins, he is the humorist of the period—a melancholy time for the display of humor, but the two writers are characteristic of their generation. The number of the journals of the Revolution was immense, but no paper throve except in opposition. On the other hand, every day saw a new list of newspapers whose appearance was forbidden and whose editors were condemned either to exile or death. Michelet says that at one time 600,000 copies of the Père Duchêne were printed. It appears to be certain that 80,000 copies of this weekly were printed and circulated.

THE BAYARD OF INDIA.*

"THE Bayard of India"—such was the name which, in the days of their friendship, Sir Charles Napier conferred upon James Outram, and its strict propriety is attested by the fact that it remained associated with him, though Sir Charles Napier had become the bitter enemy of the man he had once commended. To the world in general Sir James Outram is known chiefly, if not entirely, by the romantic generosity which declined to supersede Sir Henry Havelock in command of the troops destined for the relief of Lucknow. Sir James Outram was the senior officer. He had been summoned in hot haste from Persia to assume high command in India. He was a man, as one of his friends said of him, "absolutely consumed by ambition"; but justice had all his life been dearer to him than his ambition, and "therefore" (to quote the language of his own order) "the major-general, in gratitude for and admiration of the brilliant deeds of arms achieved by General Havelock and his gallant troops, cheerfully waived his rank on the occasion, and accompanied the force to Lucknow in his civil capacity, tendering his military services to General Havelock as a volunteer." An extraordinary impression was made at the time by this generous act of self-renunciation; but the full measure of the sacrifice it involved was unknown to the world until the publication of General Goldsmid's 'Biography.' In reference to it he writes as follows:

"Every one can appreciate what it must have been for an ambitious soldier to surrender the glory and satisfaction of conducting to a triumphant issue, under the eyes of the whole world, such an enterprise as the rescue of the imperilled garrison of Lucknow. But this was not all. He believed, on what were at the time good grounds, that the rebellion would virtually collapse after the capture of Delhi and relief of Lucknow, and that any subsequent operations would be of a desultory character, unlikely to afford any opportunity of distinction to an officer of his rank. In short, he believed that this month's campaign would in all probability bring his military career to a close. He was already a G.C.B., and any additional reward must necessarily assume the form of a permanent title with a pension attached. He therefore believed he was irretrievably surrendering the certainty of a baronetcy and its accompaniment. Further, it was understood that the treasure in the Residency, stated to be from twenty-three to thirty-two lakhs of rupees, would, in accordance with precedent, be adjudged prize-money. He elected to receive the insignificant share of a civilian volunteer, instead of the very substantial one of the general in actual command. Thus he deprived himself 'not only of all honors, but' (we quote an allusion to the subject in a private letter of his own) 'of the only means of support for the declining years of a life the chequered vicissitudes of which have afforded no opportunity of making any provision for the requirements of age.' If in after years the matter was mooted in his hearing, he was wont, as his custom was when his own good deeds were spoken of, to turn it off by some self-depreciatory remark, such as 'People have made too much of it,' . . . and so on. But it is only fair to the memory of an unselfish man now to make public what he only revealed in confidence. The surrender of the command was no mere chivalrous impulse, but a deliberate act of self-sacrifice."

The unique characteristic in the public life of Sir James Outram is the number of such acts which it contains. They begin almost with his entry into the military service of the East India Company. He was still only a young lieutenant when he had become conspicuous by the prudence and circumspection, not less than the dash and enterprise, with which he handled troops in the field. Sir John Keane, the Bombay commander-in-chief, had in consequence nominated him to the chief command of an expedition to suppress some insurgents, over the heads of several superior officers. The reply of the young lieutenant to this signal mark of distinction is highly characteristic:

"He declared himself sensible of the distinction conferred upon him by such a mark of confidence, but felt it his duty to point out that the appointment of so junior an officer might give umbrage in quarters where unanimity was necessary. The senior officer on the spot was almost the senior captain in the army; none above him could be sent with the detached companies of which the force would be composed; whereas he himself, from his junior position in the army, would, if in command, be the cause of separating captains from their companies to the detriment of the service. He wrote, moreover: 'The qualifications of the officer now commanding the detachment in the disturbed districts are far superior to mine. I willingly stake my humble reputation on his conduct. Associated with him, as I presume I shall be in the duty, while he has the honor of success, mine be the blame of defeat, in measures of which I am the proposer.'"

The Commander-in-Chief, however, declined to be balked of the services of the chivalrous young lieutenant, and Outram was obliged to do violence to his feelings and accept the command.

We find him acting in a precisely similar fashion in the Afghanistan war of 1838–42. His services in this campaign had been manifold, and of the most arduous and distinguished character, but more especially towards the close. He had then been entrusted with the charge of holding open General Nott's communications at Kandahar with British territory on the Indus. At that time not only Kelat but all Sindh was independent territory, ruled by native princes, who might, had they pleased, when disaster overtook the British forces in Afghanistan, have barred the way for either supplies or reinforcements, in which case the troops at Kandahar would in all probability have succumbed, as did the troops at Kabul under General Elphinstone. It was due to the political ability and indefatigable exertions of Major Outram that all such disastrous results were averted. But the most signal service he rendered to his country was his opposition to Lord Ellenborough's pusillanimous purpose of withdrawing the British troops from Afghanistan without having effected the liberation of the ladies and gentlemen held prisoners by the Afghan chief, Akbar Khan. Such a policy, it is easy enough to imagine, must have been inexpressibly revolting to such a mind as Outram's; and he did not cease to argue and protest against it until it had been relinquished. But Lord Ellenborough, though compelled to forego his purpose, could not forgive the man who had brought this humiliation upon him. He bided his time, and Outram's generosity soon furnished him with what he desired. A British force under the command of General England was defeated by the Afghans at a place called Hykulzai. The defeat was due to the incapacity of the officer in command; but it is a common thing when accidents of this kind occur to pass over the real criminal and select some uninfluential subordinate as the scapegoat. The scapegoat on the present occasion was a young lieutenant, Hammersley—an officer in the political department, and working under the orders of Outram. England's defeat was due, so the Government of India declared, to the deficient information regarding the number and strength of the enemy supplied by Hammersley, and that officer was, in consequence, deprived of his political appointment, and remanded back to his regiment. Outram knew that Hammersley had been wronged. That was sufficient for him, and he determined to vindicate the reputation of his subordinate. He was well aware of what the consequences would be to himself of thus assailing a recorded decision of the governor-general; but that in no way deterred him. Hammersley's reputation was vindicated, but the pent-up wrath of Lord Ellenborough descended upon his champion. Outram was remanded back to his regiment. In his despatches on the termination of the Afghan war the governor-general sedulously abstained from either mentioning his name or referring to his services; and so it came about that in the distribution of honors and promotion absolutely nothing was conferred upon Outram—"My real offences," writes Outram to a friend, "being such as he (i.e., Lord Ellenborough) cannot forget—i.e., my advocating poor Hammersley's cause, and opposition to the disgraceful retreat from Afghanistan. . . . But I regret nothing that has passed; indeed, you are well aware that I fully laid my account to suffering personally in the cause of Hammersley months ago; and were it all to do over again I would not vary my course. I am prepared for the worst, and fully expect it."

Precisely similar was Outram's behavior with reference to the Amirs of Sindh. No one doubts now that the conquest of this province and the deposition of its rulers constitute one of the most dishonorable episodes in the history of British rule in India. But at the time Outram stood almost alone in his perception of the injustice and the dishonor. He was under no obligation to protest against the wrong of it. He knew well that he could do neither without raising up around him a swarm of powerful and implacable enemies. But Outram never counted the costs when a wrong had to be rectified and it was in his power to contribute aught towards its rectification. He stood forth alone as the champion of the fallen Amirs of Sindh, simply because they were weak and fallen; and the animosity with which Sir Charles and Sir William Napier pursued him in consequence will remain for ever a blot upon their memory. For Sir Charles, Outram retained through life the warmest affection—an affection which survived unchilled the bitter hostility with which Sir Charles assailed him. General Goldsmid recounts a pleasing anecdote to illustrate this. The incident occurred when Sir James, then at the zenith of his fame, was commanding the intrenched camp at the Alum Bagh, in the neighborhood of Lucknow:

"A comrade, not by any means the least distinguished of his officers, once accompanied him to the rear of the camp, to inspect a detachment of native cavalry that had lately joined. The native officer in command, after paying his respects to Outram (who as usual treated him with the most kindly courtesy), said he would like to produce some letters which he possessed from English officers under whom he had served. His request was readily granted, and, retiring to his small tent, he presently returned with the much-prized testimonials. The first paper put into the general's hands at once aroused his interest. 'I was standing,' says our informant, 'close behind Outram, and heard him speaking to himself, as he read the letter. Thus he soliloquized: "Ah! poor Charley; he could appreciate a good soldier."' The manner in which these few words were spoken sufficed to convince the hearer that he who uttered them had the warmest feeling towards the subject of his contemplation. It was, indeed, a worthy tribute in memoriam, for the writer of the native officer's certificate was no other than Sir Charles Napier."

The extracts we have given from General Goldsmid's work will suffice to show that the general's style is not one suited for biography. In fact, a more unfortunate selection could hardly have been made than that which entrusted the writing of such a life to so ponderous and unimaginative a writer as General Goldsmid. It was a life fraught with romance and moving accidents by flood and field. Outram, in his young days, was a mightier hunter than Nimrod: and later on he was diligent in hunting the bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth. Wherever he was placed, he kindled in the minds of those around him a perfect enthusiasm for him and his service. He won the hearts of savage races, and reclaimed them from their wild and predatory habits to become peaceful, law-abiding agriculturists. The soldiers he commanded, whether British or native, regarded him with an affection wonderful to recall and to have seen. But General Goldsmid's arid narrative fails completely to make us feel all this. We accept it on his testimony; but the subject of his biography is not made to move before us in his habit as he lived. This is greatly to be deplored. A biography of Sir James Outram, worthily written, would have been a book of surpassing interest and fascination.

GREEN'S HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE.—I.*

MR. GREEN'S 'History of the English People' is completed. The time, therefore, has now come for expressing our estimate of an author whose works are certain to exert a wide influence on the study of English history. Mr. Green's merits are great and unmistakable. Not the least of them is that he has brought the task which he set before him to an end. This is an age of great schemes and of small performances. Increased masses of information have, especially in the province of history, daunted the energy of enquirers. The stupendous amount of knowledge which may be gained by assiduous labor makes students feel that to accomplish any great achievement involves an amount of preliminary study which necessitates the devotion of a life to the preparation of materials whence a literary monument may be erected. Hence one life after another is consumed in preparation. The stones for the building are collected, and the architect dies before he can even lay the foundations of his gigantic edifice. The spirit of criticism, moreover, is essentially adverse to the daring recklessness necessary for creation. We think our age happy in its immense stores of learning; we forget that the weight of fuel may put out the fire, and that a generation imbued with a passion for investigation has lost the capacity for creative production. Hence the present is a period of fragments, and that author is certainly to be called happy who in the nineteenth century sees the completion of his work. Such felicity is not the mere gift of fortune: it is the proper reward of certain rare intellectual merits. It can be attained only by those writers who are endowed with a sense of literary proportion, who can measure their means for reaching their ends, who have the good sense to form designs which lie within the compass of human industry, and who possess the aptitude for doing exactly the task set before them and avoiding the infinite temptations to stray into other fields which do not really lie within the scope of their efforts. These gifts Mr. Green certainly possesses. Every line he writes exhibits talent and what we have termed aptitude. He never pretends to be a profound investigator. The aim of his work is to present to his readers the latest and best results of enquiry in a compendious and readable form. He does not try to add to the fruits which have been attained by the labors, say, of Stubbs, of Freeman, or of Gardiner. What he endeavors to achieve is to combine the results obtained by the investigations of the best enquirers and to make them intelligible to the English public. No man could take upon himself this kind of labor who was not a trained student of history. But the particular function undertaken by Mr. Green is literary rather than historical. His book is the performance of one of the ablest and cleverest literary men of the day. It is because he has kept consistently before his mind the fact of his duty being one rather of exposition than of investigation, that he has succeeded in completing his work. His success, like all true success, is the legitimate fruit of energetic labor directed by talent and insight.

The second distinguishing quality of Mr. Green's workmanship is that it is guided throughout by an original and, in our judgment, a true conception of the principle on which an historical manual meant for general reading should be written. The prevailing notion is that such a compendium should be an abridgment, and should contain a brief account of everything (such, for example, as invasions, battles, laws, etc.) which would be given at length in larger works. The inevitable fault of such an idea is that it leads to the production of books which, like the 'Students' Gibbon' or 'Students' Hume,' are to most persons unreadable, and which, in the attempt to tell something about everything, end in conveying to the reader nothing about anything. Mr. Green, with the insight of genuine literary genius, rejected the attempt to tell something about everything, and wrote his manual on the principle of telling a great deal about a limited number of events and transactions. These events were to be the salient points in the history of England. The omission of a host of details, the careful avoidance of matters which if dealt with at all ought to be dealt with fully—such, for example, as the strategy of generals or the principles on which great campaigns were conducted—gave him space in which to paint the marked features of great crises or the outlines of remarkable characters. Of the skill with which he has described the limited number of matters on which he fixed the attention of students, one cannot speak too highly. The immediate and immense popularity of his short history (in which his genius is exhibited to more advantage than in his later and longer book) was sufficient proof that he had discovered, or rediscovered, the art of compressed historical narrative. One may also add that critics who candidly compare Mr. Green's work with such a meritorious and dreary production as Kitchin's 'History of France," will agree that the writer of genius has, in the composition of his manuals, perceived and followed a sound principle which escaped the attention of the worthy and industrious Mr. Kitchin. The author of the 'History of France' tells us a great deal and leaves nothing impressed on our minds. The author of the 'History of the English People' omits much which other writers would tell us, but of the little he does tell us he impresses a great deal on our recollection. The moral which Mr. Green's success forces on all writers is that a manual is quite a different thing from an abridgment.

Mr. Green's undoubted merits are balanced by some grave defects. He exhibits a tendency to become what we can only call "sketchy" in his treatment even of important topics. It is quite in accordance with his design that details should often be omitted. Of this, accepting as we do his principle of composition, we do not complain; but a writer who omits details is bound to mark clearly and distinctly the main and important points of his narrative. Mr. Green, especially in his last volume, is by no means careful in the matter of precision. There is something very loose, for example, in his narrative of Monmouth's rebellion. After an account of the rout of the rebels at Sedgemoor, Mr. Green adds that "their leader fled from the field, and after a vain effort to escape from the realm was captured and sent pitilessly to the block." This sentence may in the writer's own mind mean a good deal. The word

* 'History of the English People. By John Richard Green, M.A., Honorary Fellow of Jesus' College, Oxford.' Vol. IV. New York: Harper & Bros.

"pitilessly" is probably to him emphatic. But surely Monmouth's end deserved something more elaborate than mere adverbial allusiveness. Can any one believe that an intelligent boy or girl set to read the 'History of the English People' would in the least realize the features of Monmouth's death? It is, we presume, mainly by its fitness for younger students that the merits of Mr. Green's work should be tested; yet this criterion is exactly the test which his last volume, at any rate, hardly stands. What we have termed his sketchiness is not his only defect as a teacher. He has always exhibited boldness approaching to rashness in the enunciation of wide views; he has always been what one may call "viewy." But his real insight, and, in the earlier parts of his history, his thorough command of his subject, have kept his tendency to viewiness within due bounds, and have made his theories, if not always correct, at least always striking. As we advance nearer to present times his speculations become not less bold, and are, we cannot but feel, based on less solid ground. We do not for a moment mean to intimate that Mr. Green's capacity for grasping the essential features of the historical landscape before his eyes ever deserts him. One may learn much from his views as to modern England. Few writers have grasped more firmly the transformation of Great Britain into the British Empire. None have shown more clearly the relation between England and her colonies and the true import of the struggle for American independence. Industrial England, and its relation to the moral and political changes which began towards the close of the century, have, perhaps, never been better drawn than by Mr. Green. He has, indeed, almost omitted all reference to that most important topic—the history of English law—but in this he has only followed an error which must probably be considered inveterate till some man of genius makes the growth of English law his special study. What, however, we complain of is a kind of speculative rashness which certainly goes beyond knowledge.

The view, for instance, of Pitt's statesmanship is certainly original. He is grouped by Mr. Green with statesmen, such as Turgot and Joseph II., "whose characteristics were a love of mankind and a belief that as the happiness of the individual can only be secured by the general happiness of the community to which he belongs, so the welfare of individual nations can only be secured by the general welfare of the world." But the originality of the estimate of Pitt, which makes the favorite minister of George III. a representative of "the larger sympathy of man with man which especially marks the eighteenth century," is far more obvious than its correctness. Students will find it difficult to accept an analysis of Pitt's character which contradicts the impression left on all his contemporaries. Mr. Green's view may be right, but it needs to be supported by undoubted knowledge both of Pitt and of his age. Such support is, we must frankly say, wanting. It were absurd for any ordinary reviewer, and certainly for the present writer, to pretend to anything like the acquaintance with English history possessed by Mr. Green. We do not doubt that his inaccuracies are nearer the truth than that average knowledge of educated men which is, compared with the knowledge of experts, but a decent name for ignorance. Still, it is impossible not to note points which though small in themselves seem to betray that Mr. Green is not quite at home in the eighteenth century. Thus, of Pope he writes: "His life, as Johnson says, was a 'long disease.'" For aught we know, Johnson may make this remark, but Johnson certainly knew, what Mr. Green apparently does not, that this pathetic description of an existence racked by illness was given by Pope himself when he refers to the muse who served "to help me through this long disease—my life." The error is a trifle. It may be a mere slip of the pen. It is far less significant than the statement that Burke "struggled bitterly against all proposals to give freedom to Irish trade." Certainly such was not the impression of the electors of Bristol, and on this matter we venture to think that they were better informed as to the policy of their member than is Mr. Green. We have not the remotest wish to make too much of such slips as these. They may be the only errors in the whole of Mr. Green's four volumes; they may mean nothing but that the author happened to be away from a library when he was correcting his proof-sheets. At the very most they only show that a man of genius may be wanting in accuracy. They do, however, make us receive with some hesitation our author's bolder speculations, and suggest that he is a safer guide for the reign, say, of Alfred or of William the Conqueror than for the period of George II. or of George III.

Moreover, if we may in our turn enter on the dangerous path of speculative criticism we should venture to propound the theory that the very nature of Mr. Green's task makes it likely that he should be less successful in his treatment of modern times than in his dealing with the earlier periods of history. His object, as we have pointed out, is to reproduce in a striking literary form the best results of other men's historical labors. If a writer is to do this with success it is absolutely necessary that he should deal with fields of investigation which have been already well worked. An era like that of the Norman Conquest, all the portions of English history included within Professor Stubbs's four volumes, the Reformation, and, to a certain extent, the religious and political struggles of the seventeenth century, have of recent times been carefully explored, though they can hardly be said to have been worked out. Each of these periods has, at any rate, been so studied that Mr. Green can find with regard to them that kind of material which he needs. He is never a servile imitator, but he thoroughly knows a good authority when he has one; and when he has guides such as Stubbs or Freeman he can trust their guidance, and, working upon the materials which they have sifted, use freely his own great powers of narration and speculation. With the history of modern England it is otherwise. That any one who has not devoted his existence to the study of the age of George III. should try to master all or the greater part of the documentary authorities for the Georgian era would be simply ridiculous. A writer such as Mr. Green would, no doubt, read what may be called the authoritative historians for that time, if such historians existed. Unfortunately, they do not exist. There is no one who has made himself the master of George III.'s reign in the way in which Mr. Freeman has, so to speak, appropriated the Norman Conquest, or in which Mr. Gardiner is gradually making himself the acknowledged authority for the reigns of James I. and Charles I. The result is that Mr. Green has not at hand the kind of help which his sort of book requires. In finishing his work he has been forced not only to build but to bake his own bricks. He has erected a striking literary monument, but we cannot greatly wonder if the last part of the edifice has suffered from the unfavorable conditions under which the architect has been forced to labor.

RECENT NOVELS.*

MR. BLACKMORE returns to his old manner and merit in 'Mary Anerley,' which is to be ranked with 'Lorna Doone' and 'The Maid of Sker,' and deserves the praise—sometimes of more value than just now—of being called the novel of the year. It is a Yorkshire tale of such proportions and variety that we cannot attempt an epitome of its plot, and must be content with saying that its characters are very numerous, and divided into four or five sets, each of which illustrates a different though convergent action; that it is partly a sea-story, the hero being first a daring smuggler and afterwards a junior lieutenant on the Victory at Trafalgar; and, in fine, that it contains the elements of two or three ordinary novels, and elaborates them all with ease. The time is the beginning of the century, and the book is a picture of English life that has a real value as well as a romantic interest, just as was true of 'Lorna Doone,' which illustrated the seventeenth, and 'The Maid of Sker,' which concerned the last part of the eighteenth century. In this sense Mr. Blackmore may be called the successor of Scott. Indeed, in the two earlier works mentioned he has done for the romance of history what Scott failed to do—namely, lent it the reality of local color by an archaic style surpassed, so far as we know, only by the archaism of 'Henry Esmond,' and perhaps not very greatly surpassed even by that. But in temper and attitude Mr. Blackmore is Scott modernized, if that be not a contradiction in terms; that is to say, though he is as romantic to the full, and some of his scenes are as melodramatic as anything in 'Waverley' or 'Rob Roy' or 'Ivanhoe'—witness John Ridd's visit to the Doone valley, which his readers will vividly recall—his tones are so quiet and his observation of the true relations of character and incidents to human nature and life in general so nice, that there is the same difference between his romance and Scott's as between a modern battle picture and an old-fashioned "historical painting." This is not quite saying that his attitude is wholly modern, which perhaps would imply an absence of the quick sympathy with the subject needful in every just treatment of history; but his sympathy is of the literary order which enables him to appreciate the past from his own view-point and illustrate it with his own art, without making such free translation and adaptation of it as Bulwer, or James, or Harrison Ainsworth, let us say. For he is first of all an artist, and shows an artist's subtlety of divination in treating traits and emotions capable of satisfactory treatment only in this way; experience, observation, even erudition being poor substitutes at the best.

Notwithstanding his distinctly romantic bent, it is with character that he mainly occupies himself, and for the illustration of certain points of character rarely illustrated in humdrum life that he uses his romantic machinery. Such natures as those of Robin Lyth and Lieutenant Carroway are to be found fully developed, perhaps, only amid exciting scenes, and, in their characteristic details, only amid such circumstances as existed on the Yorkshire coast at the beginning of this century. Mary Anerley herself not only could not have been born out of Yorkshire, but could not exist there now, doubtless; and, allowing for the essential identity of human nature in all times and places, it would be difficult to imagine any one of the interesting group by which she is surrounded—Mistress Yordas, Mrs. Carnaby, Stephen Anerley and his wife, the Poppletons, Mordacks (one of "the prize men of fiction," as Thackeray would say), and the Flamborough people—figuring in one of Mr. Trollope's novels. It cannot be denied that this is strong evidence of the fact that Mr. Blackmore is not greatly interested in what are known as colorless characters, and perhaps would be no great hand at portraying such; and this, from the point of view of the modern novel, is undoubtedly to be called a limitation. But, as we have intimated, if he is old-fashioned enough to be most at home in depicting picturesqueness, he is nothing less than old-fashioned in the subtlety with which he does it. No modern dissector, such as George Eliot (if we may hazard the temerity) or Mr. Blackmore's more immediate rival, Mr. Hardy, can set before us the lineaments and deportment of a personage with "points" more vividly and completely; and this used to be thought something to do.

Saying, however, that Mr. Blackmore is first of all an artist ought to be qualified by adding that he is pre-eminently an English artist. He is altogether given over to following the lead of his own sweet will, and it must be confessed it conducts him in a very charming manner through very pleasant places. Having only his own original force, and the tastes of a public that wears responsibility in such matters as fiction very lightly, to depend upon, a novelist who has Mr. Blackmore's force is very fortunate. Very likely he would say he does not care a button about style, for example; in which case he is lucky to have made shift to get such an admirable one, so flexible, so genuine, blending so well those generally incompatible elements, power and charm. He will, if he likes, humor himself in making a wretched pun now and then; in delaying his action by quaint philosophical digressions that could not fail to irritate a hostile reader; in putting a literary aphorism into the mouth of a character that could by no possibility have either conceived or expressed it; in loitering over the details of a landscape which has the charm of familiarity for him, but none for another; in introducing full-length portraits which have no intimate connection with the set he is avowedly painting; and in verbal quips and eccentricities of phraseology which utterly contradict the character of his quaintness, which is that of admirably-studied simplicity rather than whimsicality. In the face of all this, one can only suggest that it is very agreeable to find his merits so far outweighing his blemishes, and possibly to solace one's self with the query—which never occurs to the strictly academic critic—whether, namely, these blemishes and merits are not cognate, and whether, if Mr. Blackmore should have a respect for his art too great to permit him to take such frequent liberties with it, he would not lose something in the vivacity and absolute sincerity that are among its chief claims upon our admiration, and contribute, it may be, to the sense of large truth (as pictures of life) that informs his books—'Mary Anerley' notably.

It would be difficult to imagine a more complete contrast than that afforded by two such writers as Zola and Gaboriau, each of whom probably detests the aims and accomplishment of the other with cordiality. In a certain sense the works of both belong to what George Sand called "the literature of the mysteries of iniquity," but the function of one is to exploit the romantic possibilities of such mysteries, and that of the other to show their vulgar and inane reality. The latter, at least, is part of Zola's profession, and he has rarely had fewer relapses into the art of the romancer than in 'His Excellency Eugene Rougon,' to which the translator has given the title of 'Clorinda.' The change, by the way, is to be regretted because it tends to obscure the intention of the author by exaggerating one element of his hero's career. M. Zola's political prejudices contribute further obscurity; a spirit of contempt, not to say hatred, dominating his usual passionless philosophy. But the book contains some of his best work; the study of each incident is exhaustive, and at times subtle enough to show a different phase to, and awaken a different judgment in, different minds—an effect justly to be called artistic, and thoroughly antagonistic to his most impressive "naturalism." In other respects it is rather a failure; the transitions are abrupt, there is juxtaposition without continuity, and the author struggles with his mass of material with evident effort and apparently divided purpose. With a slight subordination of the principal character it might have been made a study of the Court of Napoleon III., or a heightening of the conception of Clorinda would have made it a picture of the power of a woman without scruples and with a superstition for a religion. But to give these two motives as prominent a position as they hold obscures the chief one, which is the study of the greed of power exhibited in a man who can accept no defeat of his instincts, and it results in confusing and weakening all three. Historically, one of the most important chapters is the baptism of the Prince Imperial. Of 'Monsieur Lecoq' we only need to say that it is one of the most labyrinthine of detective stories, and that no one who likes these will begin it and leave it unfinished.

'Hepzibah Guinness' gives the title to a volume of three well-told stories. The scenes of the first two are laid in Philadelphia, and they deal with the straitest sect of the Quakers. The devices which these find allowable in their relations with the people of the world, and their jealous watchfulness lest one of their number should slip from the fold, form a good background to two pleasant little love-stories, which are, however, in so low a key that the tragic element of the second seems a little incongruous. The third story, 'A Draft on the Bank of Spain,' is more ordinary.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1880.

The Week.

NEARLY six millions of foreign gold arrived here during the week, and foreign exchange at the close warrants further imports. The movement of gold to this country is anxiously watched by the leading European banks, and the Imperial Bank of Germany has again advanced its discount rate. The Bank of France has been urged to do so, but has not, and the Bank of England has taken no action as yet. It is now evident that, while Europe will want a large amount of our breadstuffs, the demand will be much smaller than last year. The yield of wheat in Russia, it is estimated, is hardly more than sufficient to supply the home demand. Last year Central Russia alone furnished Great Britain with over ten million bushels of wheat. The European demand for American securities continues good, however, and the public credit of the United States now rules in London nearly as high as that of the English Government, due allowance being made for the length of time which the securities of these respective governments run. During the month of August our public debt was reduced a little over $12,000,000. Railroad business continues to be very profitable, and the best class of railroad bonds and shares have in several cases advanced during the week to the highest prices ever paid for them. This is due not only to the large traffic of the railroads and to the easy condition of the money market on account of gold imports, but to the fact that investment money is being steadily driven out of United States bonds by the purchases of the Government for the sinking fund. These purchases during August amounted to about $10,000,000, and in the last ten months to not far from $90,000,000. The money thus driven out goes very largely into the next best class of securities. Speculation at the Stock Exchange was active and buoyant during the week, and in all departments of trade activity was the rule. So large is the demand for currency all over the country that the New York banks are not able, even with all the foreign gold coming here, to maintain their surplus reserve, and this was reduced during the week about $1,000,000. The price of silver in London and here was unchanged during the week, notwithstanding sensational rumors about the intended action of the German Government towards bi-metallism.

Important letters on the subject of the campaign by General Grant and Mr. Conkling have been made public during the past week. General Grant, it seems, is to come to New York and preside at a Garfield and Arthur mass-meeting in the course of the month. Writing to General Logan with regard to this he says, "I agree with you that it will not do to be beaten now"; a pithy sentiment which has proved a godsend to many Republican newspapers which were in want of some ringing cry to "place at the head of their columns." General Grant adds, in a somewhat less simple style, "We should never be beaten until every man who counts, or represents those who count, in the enumeration to give representation in the Electoral College can cast his vote just as he pleases, and can have it counted just as he cast it." There are so many men who "count," or who "represent those who count," in a Presidential election nowadays, that General Grant's exact meaning might have been made plainer without disadvantage. If his intention was to express the same idea that is conveyed in the phrase which the World keeps set up on its editorial page, and attributes to General Hancock, "a full vote, a free ballot, and a fair count," and if Hancock did really use this language, the views of the two generals on the subject seem to be identical; in fact, they both seem to be clamoring for the same thing. Mr. Conkling's letter was addressed to a Republican meeting in Rochester, and contains some hearty praise of Abraham Lincoln and the Republican party, but neglects entirely to mention General Garfield. He makes up for this to a certain extent by pointing out "the grave hazard at this time of putting in power the Democratic party, dominated as it must be." With regard to this "domination" he adds, in a vein which shows that his old power of sarcasm has not yet been exhausted, "The Democratic nominee for President is an honorable man, and therefore he will not try to defraud the party whose nomination he has accepted of the results implied by success." This enables the World to say with deep malice, but still truthfully, that Mr. Conkling has called General Hancock "an honorable man." Mr. Conkling adds that his "earnest sympathy" is with the Rochester Republicans "in every effort and purpose to lift high the Republican banner and push on the Republican column," but regrets his inability to lift or push, himself, in person.

The Massachusetts Democratic Convention has resulted rather curiously. The long struggle between the Butler and anti-Butler forces has ended in the complete capture of the organization by Butler, and at the same time the Convention has nominated an old anti-Butler man as its candidate for governor. Mr. Charles P. Thompson is a lawyer of excellent standing in his profession, and was elected to the Forty-fourth Congress over Butler, then a Republican candidate. He is a man of high character, and would certainly make a good governor, but the chances of his election are small. General Butler had the whole Convention in his hands, and could have been nominated himself if he had desired it. Instead of this, he made a thoughtful speech in which he explained his present position. He reviewed the history of the Democratic party in the days of its success and power, incidentally alluding to San Domingo and the "whole group" of West Indian islands, "which sooner or later will come to us, just as sure, in God's Providence, as a necklace of jewels shall come from the bridegroom around the neck of a fair bride." He showed that the Union soldiers were chiefly Democrats, and that "the first blow struck and the first word given" toward the emancipation of the slaves "came from a Democrat in command"; and that since the war the Republican party has been "chained to the car of capital." With regard to the Revolution he declared that, so far from that war having been carried on by capitalists, most of the great men who made up the convention which declared our independence "could hardly have paid their board bills out of their private fortunes." They were "young lawyers, young doctors, . . . young shoemakers, young coppersmiths, young mechanics," and the "gentlemen and capitalists" came in late and after "the movement had got so far it could not be stemmed." He drew a striking contrast between the tendencies of the Republican and the Democratic parties, and expressed the hope that "something like statesmanship" might be the result of this campaign.

If we may trust Republican accounts of the New Jersey Democratic Convention at Trenton last week, a "delirious mob of a thousand delegates," sitting in an "air blue with tobacco-smoke and sulphurous with blasphemy," made a very good choice of candidate for governor in the person of Mr. Geo. C. Ludlow. Mr. Ludlow is a lawyer of character and standing and mature age, who has presided over the State Senate as a member of that body. The weak point in him is that he voted on one occasion to let the State-prison convicts engage in the manufacture of shoes. This implies that he would favor their making hats also, and as hatting is a very prominent interest in certain counties the Republicans expect, not without reason, that the shoemakers and hatters will to a man bolt the ticket and vote for Mr. Ludlow's rival, Mr. Potts, also a very respectable man. The fact that the Convention, after endorsing in the gross the Cincinnati resolutions, incorporated a protective-tariff plank in their own platform, is regarded as a futile endeavor, by stealing Republican thunder, to repair the error of their candidate. Now, we have grown accustomed to seeing the Republican party advocate protection as an historic article of their faith, but we are not aware that, outside the State of New Jersey, they couple with it opposition to self-supporting industries in our prisons. The more they inflame the resentment against Mr. Ludlow on this score, the more they will recommend that gentleman to the suffrages of those who have bestowed a very moderate amount of thought on the moral and economic advantages of convict labor, and who object to any further concessions to Kearneyism on the part of the Republican party.

The hottest work of the canvass is evidently taking place in Indiana, and the candidates for governor have begun a series of joint debates which seem to have been conducted so far with reasonable decorum. More prominence, however, than people at a distance from the scene of conflict could wish has apparently been given to the question as to whether Judge Porter ever publicly referred to his opponent as a drunkard. He is not accused of having done this in anything but a jesting and humorous manner, but it looks as if Mr. Landers attached a good deal of importance to his having done it in some fashion, and made use of the charge not only with the confidence of an immaculate man, but as the fitting climax to a terrific indictment of the Republican party. Judge Porter denies it, nevertheless, in terms of great vigor, and thus the onus of having introduced personalities into the debate falls upon the Democratic candidate. It appears that this is a grave thing in Indiana. As to other portions of the discussion, so far as we can learn, the Republican candidate has had the advantage, despite the fact that he is but just recovering from an attack of illness. His competitor laid great stress upon the Republicans' mismanagement of the finances, a subject upon which he talked with great fluency, and was led into statements that made it necessary for him to protest that he had never been an inflationist, but simply a strenuous opponent of a wicked contraction. But, although the Democratic party had brought the treacherously demonetized silver dollar and the retired greenbacks back into circulation, he did not propose "to monopolize this thing" and claim "the credit that belongs to the Lord" for the present prosperity of the country. Judge Porter's reply to this, inasmuch as he had never before "attempted a speech on financial matters, while that subject has been Mr. Landers's stock in trade for several years," is reported to have been very creditable, and at the second debate Landers went so far as to leave the platform, either in disgust or discomfiture, before his opponent had finished. This discourtesy, added to his introduction of personalities, is severely commented upon, but he appears to get a good deal of applause.

The South Carolina Republican Convention, held in Columbia last week, proved a very singular affair. On the eve of its meeting, the press despatches reported that "the intention seems to be to-night to retire every one tainted with the frauds and irregularities of the past, and to nominate none but men of unassailable character." But when assembled to carry out this laudable design it was called to order by ex-Congressman R. B. Elliott, chairman of the Republican State Committee, and Special Agent of the Treasury Department, who was convicted by the Legislative Committee on Frauds, some years ago, of having bought his election to Congress by drafts upon the "Armed Force Fund" of Gov. Scott's régime. Presently the Convention went into secret session with closed doors, and appointed a committee to consider the expediency of nominating a State ticket. On the following day the committee reported favorably, but were opposed by Elliott, who succeeded in persuading the Convention that such a course would be impolitic. Accordingly it resolved merely to present an electoral ticket, and that the party should make such a contest for Congressmen as it could. Conformably to this advice, the Fifth District immediately nominated Robert Smalls, a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, who, in November, 1877, as a result of the same investigation which exposed Elliott, was tried before a mixed jury and convicted of having accepted a bribe of $5,000 from the Republican Printing Company, while serving as chairman of the Committee on Printing of the State Senate.

We must not wonder that, in view of this protracted control of the party by its greatest knaves, sustained no longer by Federal bayonets but by Federal sinecures, the white Democracy in South Carolina consider it a paramount duty, in the words of the Charleston News and Courier, "to put down Elliott's political party and to keep it down," and "desire a change of administration at Washington." "The character of most of the United States officials in South Carolina," continues the same journal, "is a reproach to the Government. Leaving their politics altogether out of the estimate, they are a very sorry crew. There is some stain upon almost every one of them." If this be true, and we have little doubt of it, it supplies an evident reason for Southern opposition to Federal supervision at elections where such creatures as Smalls can be put up and perchance elected, with the aid of the Treasury Department. Moreover, do not such incidents make honest Republicans, when they speak of a suppressed "Republican" party at the South, ask themselves what possible meaning the term has there, and whether, as it furnishes no criterion of principles or of character, it stands for anything but a purely artificial political division? And if such divisions are in the nature of things unstable as well as pernicious—like the carpet-bag governments, which could not stand alone—is there any cause for regret in the fact that in South Carolina and in Georgia the "Republicans" have decided to abandon a State ticket?

In Arkansas the Republicans have accepted practical effacement with the same submissiveness. At the election for State officers on Monday there were but two tickets in the field, Democratic and Greenback, and the majority of the former is probably about fifty thousand. The repudiating constitutional amendments have, it is now thought, undoubtedly failed. The returns of the Vermont election on Tuesday, which show a Republican gain over the election in 1876, indicate that the situation there is about as depressing for the Democrats as that in the South is for Republicans. The contest was accurately though enviously described in advance by Mr. Blaine as a "dress parade," and yet "the unterrified" had no thought of disbanding. Their example in Vermont and Rhode Island may be commended in this sense to discouraged Southern Republicans, as it is practically just as bad to be in a hopeless actual, as in a hopeless virtual, minority.

We beg to direct the attention of our readers to a review of a history of Windham County, Conn., which will be found on another page. It will be found to furnish peculiarly seasonable reading at the present moment. It gives a picture of intolerance towards a lady keeping a school for colored girls, in one of the most enlightened counties in New England, within the memory of any man not over sixty (the victim is herself still living at the West), the like of which we venture to say can be found in no "campaign story" of Southern outrages. We call attention to it thus prominently for the benefit of those—many of them pure in intention and honest in belief—who are busy preaching the doctrine that the Southerner who kicks against negro suffrage and negro politicians is a new and obnoxious variety of human being, who cannot be reasoned into humanity and enlightenment, but must be for ever denounced and voted against and suspected. We have no doubt there are hundreds in Windham County, Connecticut, to-day who roll their eyes in unaffected horror when they hear that the South Carolina whites become turbulent and unscrupulous when threatened with a State government composed of the Elliotts and Smallses. To all such we say: Read what your own fathers felt about having one colored school in their town, and what they did in order to get rid of it; and learn from the story to believe in the power of time and knowledge and trade and education over your Southern countrymen, against whom you allow demagogues and sentimentalists to lash you into perennial hate and distrust. Learn from it, too, that human nature is much the same in all parts of your country, though blessed with much better surroundings in some parts than in others.

When speeches like Secretary Schurz's and General Cox's have been made, printed, and given a wide circulation—at least through the press—it cannot be said that civil-service reform has been disregarded in the present canvass. We were glad to note still more recently two occasions well improved for preaching sound doctrine on this subject to a large body of hearers. At the annual reunion, near Cleveland, of the 124th Ohio Volunteers, on Friday week, Mr. Andrew Squire, the orator of the day, devoted nearly one-half of a long address to citations from the testimony of earlier American statesmen against the spoils doctrine, and from Secretary Schurz's speech, to which he added some timely comments of his own. For example, after pointing out that the Democrats' "genuine and thorough reform" would, in case of their success, mean "a clean sweep of the offices," he said no Republican could blame them, and urged such preparation against "clean sweeps" by any party hereafter as we have enforced on another page. In contradistinction to an eminent Ohio Republican Mr. Squire said, "I believe in 'abroad,'" and proceeded to hold up the example of the English civil service. The same thing was done in Boston at a Republican flag-raising by Mr. Robert M. Morse, jr., who showed how little disturbance in the personnel of the administration was caused by Mr. Gladstone's accession upon the defeat of Lord Beaconsfield. We fear, however, that the moral of this was lost upon Mr. Morse's audience by his failure to explain that as the political opinion of applicants is excluded from the tests of fitness for every subordinate office, there exists no excuse for removals under a new administration. It will be observed that both these speakers were Republicans. The Democrats are yet to be heard from. Ex-Senator Trumbull, addressing the voters of Belleville, Illinois, on Monday week, made no allusion whatever to the need of this particular reform, or to Democratic intentions in regard to it, laboring altogether to show why his party "demand, as did the Republicans of 1860, an entire change of administration."

"Straws" have not been as plentiful during the present campaign as could have been desired; but, nevertheless, every now and then we meet with indications of the way the country is going. A Chicago Tribune correspondent at Omaha gives an account of a vote taken on a train of cars on which the Rev. Dr. Talmage was homeward bound. He was returning from Leadville and had been "taking in scenes and incidents along the Pacific coast." On the same train which bore the reverend gentleman homeward over the Union Pacific Railroad a Presidential vote had been taken, which resulted in fifty-six votes for Garfield and forty for Hancock; General Crook, who was on board, and Dr. Talmage refused to vote, but it is obvious that their failure to exercise their rights cannot have materially affected the result. This, of course, is a Republican "straw"—a plain, unvarnished statement of facts from which the wayfaring man can draw his own conclusions. To show how different Democratic "straws" are in their origin and composition from this, we may mention that the New Haven Union (a Democratic sheet) boasted within a few days about a train of cars on which the ballot stood fifteen for Hancock and six for Garfield. The Meriden Republican, however, mentions that "a passenger on the train states that the said canvass was taken on the scoot train from this city Wednesday noon, and that ten delegates from the Democratic Convention in this city were on board, and six train-hands voted, three of them being Democrats." The Republican continues: "This explains the unprecedented result of the ballot, and it was rather unkind of the Union to conceal the fact that the Democratic delegates were on board." It was not only unkind, it was wrong. What can reformers expect of a party that provides "straws" of this kind?

Mr. Hayes's speech at Canton, at the meeting of the 23d Ohio Veterans, was chiefly devoted to urging the necessity of some national provision for education in the late slaveholding States. The facts, as he states them, are rather startling. In 1870 there were over 4,000,000 people in the South unable to read and write, and more than three-quarters of a million of voters "too illiterate to prepare or even to read their own ballots." This evil, too, is not diminishing rapidly. In 1878 the total school population in the old slaveholding States was over 5,000,000, but of this number only 2,710,096 were enrolled in any school. The conclusion which he comes to is as follows: "Citizenship and the right to vote were conferred upon the colored people by the Government and people of the United States. It is therefore the sacred duty, as it is the highest interest, of the United States to see that these new citizens and voters are fitted by education for the grave responsibility which has been cast upon them." In the same way he thinks that the Indians, the New-Mexicans, and a large proportion of European immigrants all require education which the General Government can best provide. With regard to the Constitutional power to do all this, Mr. Hayes appears to think that there can be no room for doubt as to its existence, and contents himself with mentioning as to the Territories that the General Government has authority to make "all needful rules and regulations." It would, however, involve a very important change in the hitherto accepted relation between the States and the central Government if Congress undertook to provide the machinery of popular education within State lines. The moral obligation to do something in the premises may be derived from the fact that the negroes have been given the suffrage, but the legal power cannot be got in this way. The speech deserves consideration as a serious suggestion of a definite scheme of political action directed against admitted political evils. So few such suggestions are made in either party that anything of the kind comes as a sort of surprise. We fear, however, that the excitement and noise of the campaign will deafen the country to Mr. Hayes' proposals.

The House of Lords has been acting with so much perversity and obstinacy in Irish affairs as to suggest the belief that the majority was bent both on frustrating all attempts of the Ministry at conciliation and on increasing the madness of Irish malcontents. For their resistance to the Disturbance Bill they had the excuse that it was in some sense an unusual interference with the rights of property, but there is no creditable excuse for their recent defeat of the Irish Registration Bill, which was simply intended to facilitate—that is, make more convenient as to time and place—the registration of voters in the country districts. The rejection of this can hardly be ascribed to anything but rancor, and it is, of course, likely to increase greatly the exasperation which makes the Irish problem such a tough one even for a Cabinet with the most benevolent intentions.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Mr. Forster, on whom so much of the burden comes, should have been stung into an assertion that, if such things were repeated, an alteration in the constitution of the House of Lords would some day become necessary. The "tremendous cheers" with which this indiscretion was greeted is a significant indication of the kind of feeling which the Upper House is exciting in the breasts not only of English Radicals but even of more moderate Liberals. No such utterance with regard to the Lords has, to the best of our knowledge, escaped the lips of a Cabinet Minister since the days of the Long Parliament, and it is not surprising that Lord Granville had to explain in the House of Lords that it was Mr. Forster's own opinion he expressed, and that he spoke for no one else and committed no one else.

General Roberts reached Kandahar unopposed, entering it on August 31. He found Ayub Khan occupying a fortified position at Mazra, on the Argand-ab, which was completely concealed by the intervening hills. Reconnoissances were immediately made, which elicited the fact that the enemy's main camp was on the Baba Wali heights, and that his right could easily be carried and the camp assailed from the rear. This offered an opportunity of totally breaking up Ayub's army, and the preparations were made accordingly, and ably executed on the following morning, September 1. General Primrose, with the Kandahar garrison, about nine o'clock made a direct attack on Baba Wali, which served as a feint to cover the real design, while the cavalry brigade, under Hugh Gough, advanced upon the left, to occupy a position on the Argand-ab suitable for pursuit. The main attack was made by two brigades of infantry, supported by a third, all under the command of General Ross. The turning movement was vigorously opposed at various points, but in vain. The reverse slope of Baba Wali was reached and the camp stormed. At noon the work was achieved, the enemy fleeing in wild confusion. Twenty-seven guns were captured in the camp, and five more—Ayub Khan's last cannon—during the pursuit. Ayub himself made a hasty flight, followed by almost all the other chiefs and a few Herati horse, the rest of his troops dispersing in various directions. He had been joined before the battle by the leaders of the Ghazni faction, and is believed now to be going straight to Herat, which, however, it is thought, may close its gates against him. The loss of the victors was insignificant.

NEGLECTED PRECAUTIONS AGAINST A "CLEAN SWEEP."

THE charge which some critics have been making against the Republican orators in the present canvass, that they are refraining, apparently with care, from all mention of civil-service reform, is not strictly accurate. They all, or a very large number of them, do draw attention to the very serious consequences which would result from the "clean sweep" of the offices which would be sure to result in case the Democrats got into power. On this point they are generally very emphatic in their remarks, and their objection to this clean sweep rests, as far as it goes, upon the very grounds on which the civil-service reformers ask the Republicans to set the Democrats a good example. Every orator, therefore, who urges this argument is pro tanto a civil-service reformer. Every voter who is influenced by it into voting against Hancock is pro tanto a civil-service reformer. He objects to having the Government offices treated as the booty of the party which happens to get most votes at the polls; to having competent men who are familiar with their work expelled from these offices because they happen to hold a particular set of political opinions and to have voted for a particular candidate. He objects to having the salaries annexed to these places treated as a property subject to a tax to which no other kind of property is exposed—a tax levied, too, without authority of law, and yet, in practice, levied under a penalty, in case of default, to which payers of no other kind of tax are liable, and disbursed by a body unknown to the law, and which renders no public account of the use made of the money. The difference between such an orator and voter and the regular civil-service reformer, who "sips cold tea" and is "goody-goody," and clamors for "the schoolmaster's test," lies simply in the application of the rule. Mr. Sherman and his brother orators think the rule an excellent one, evidently, but think it ought only to be applied to the Democrats, because the Democrats are such bad men and have such evil designs. They would not apply it to the Republicans, because the Republicans are such good men and have such noble designs. This view of moral obligations is a very old one, and has excited the merriment of many generations. But we are willing to concede, for the sake of argument, that it is sound—that the Democrats are bad men and the Republicans good men, and that things done by Republicans might be very harmless which if done by Democrats would be very mischievous. But action based on this view can only be safe—indeed, one might say can only be rational—if accompanied by precautions as insurmountable as human skill and strength can make them against the Democrats ever coming into power.

We need hardly say that no such precautions are possible, or desirable if possible. This Government, like every other constitutional government, is framed and carried on on the theory that two parties or more are contending for possession of power, and that power may, and perhaps frequently will, pass from one to the other. If there were no such theory elections would be a farce. Voting is the exercise of a choice between two sets of men and two sets of ideas. All the speeches the Republican orators are making to-day are appeals to the voters not to make any change in the depositaries of power; but they are also very emphatic admissions that the voters may make such a change next November. If there were no likelihood or no risk of their making it, there would be no occasion for the speeches, and the voting would be a mere form. Moreover, power has heretofore often passed from one party to another in the United States. The Federalists gave way to the Republicans; the Republicans gave way to the Whigs; the Whigs gave way to the Democrats, and the Democrats gave way to the Republicans again. No rational and intelligent Republican would maintain that no other similar change is likely to occur, or that the Democrats, or some party essentially embodying their spirit and aims, are sure not to get hold of the Government in place of those who now hold it. As a matter of fact, the Democrats for some time back have been in actual possession of Congress in both branches, and came within a hair's-breadth of securing the Presidency in 1876. Moreover, no observant man can deny that the Democratic tide has, for some years, been slowly rising—that is, that the voters who have the Democratic way of thinking about government and legislation have been for some time gaining on the Republicans, and diminishing their majorities in States in which the Republicans have been strongest. We may, therefore, set it down as undeniable that the Democrats, or some other party like them, may come, and very probably will come, into power again. In other words, Democratic ascendency—we are now looking at the matter from the standpoint of a very Stalwart Republican—is one of the dangers to which the Republic is most exposed. It is more likely than a foreign war, for which we prepare by keeping a militia on foot; more likely than a run on the Treasury, for which we prepare by keeping a reserve of specie; more likely than the inability of the Government to pay cash in a great national emergency, for which we prepare by affirming its power to manufacture and issue paper money; more likely than that the separate States should destroy the Federal credit by taxation, for which we prepare by forbidding such taxation in the Constitution. In fact, there is hardly a single risk to the National Government or its belongings, now guarded against by either the Constitution or the laws, which is nearly so probable as that the Democrats will one day get possession both of the Presidency and Congress, and be thus enabled to make that "clean sweep" of the public offices, with its attendant horrors, over which our Secretary of the Treasury and his brother orators are so eloquent.

It is, therefore, proper and desirable for every voter who hears them to ask them what preparations they have made for this contingency which they paint in such black colors. A party in power in Holland, whose orators, every time they took the stump, declaimed on the horrors of inundation, but made no mention of what they had done or proposed to do about making or repairing dykes, would naturally call forth much interrogatory criticism from the audience. The Republicans who are conducting this canvass, from General Garfield down, seem to us very much in this position. They lay themselves open to some very awkward questions, of which we may give the following as a sample:

"If, as you confess, the danger of the Democrats getting possession of the Government is not an imaginary danger, and if, as you say, they will, if they get power, make the dreadful thing called a 'clean sweep,' you, as the party which has for fifteen years held the Government in all its branches, and in a measure created the civil service as it now exists, must surely have taken some means to prevent this clean sweep. What have you done? You cannot possibly believe that the Democrats will be prevented, if they get a chance, from turning your men out and putting their own in all the offices, by the feeling that they are themselves too wicked for such an undertaking. Have you, therefore, passed any law or constitutional amendment making a 'clean sweep' impossible when there is a change of administration? If not—if this has been impossible—have you made an effort by your own example to embody in American political usage the rule that a man's tenure of office in the public service shall not depend on his political opinions, but on his character, skill, and efficiency? If so, where, when, and to what extent? You dwell a good deal on the power of the 80,000 offices on the corrupt imagination of the Democrats in stimulating their exertions at the coming elections; now, what have you done by your own practice to rouse popular feeling against the doctrine that the offices are the fair prize of party victory? Is there anything in your example to suggest to any Democrat that treating offices as 'spoils'—that is, giving them to the members of one party exclusively as the reward of electioneering—is a disreputable system? Can you imagine any spectacle more likely to stimulate their cupidity than the spectacle you are yourselves offering to the world at this moment of the levy of illegal assessments for your own purposes on the salaries of your office-holders? Would there not be something ludicrous in one of you preaching the sacredness of property to a mob from a balcony while his confederates were gutting the house and dividing the goods in full view of the street? When your candidate, too, proposes publicly to fill offices by the advice of Congressmen of his own party, can you expect a Democratic President to refrain, whenever he gets a chance, from doing likewise? Your plan, too, or at all events the only plan you offer, of preventing the derangement of the public business by a sweeping change of public servants is keeping you in power, because your men, having been twenty years in the business, understand it. But does not this suggest to your opponents the obvious answer that when you began you were as green and awkward as they would be, and that they have as much right to learn to administer by long administration as you have, and will draw as good an argument from this source against being turned out of office at the end of twenty years as you now draw? In fact, does it not seem as if your allusions to the evils of change were highly unbecoming in you, who have carefully maintained a system which not only tempts millions into clamoring for change, but makes the change, when it does come, in the highest degree mischievous?"

"THE CORMORANTS AND THE COMMUNE."

WE print elsewhere a letter from a highly esteemed correspondent which is in several ways very suggestive. The personal character of a possible Vice-President is undoubtedly a subject of legitimate interest to voters, and a man's "treatment of his unfortunate debtors" is an important indication of character. But no man's personal character can be depicted to the voters in a trustworthy manner by the researches of a campaign newspaper reporter among his private papers. To any one who knows anything of the frame of mind in which this functionary enters on the examination of a candidate's life and manners, there is something very ludicrous in treating his revelations of any candidate's treatment of debtors as a proper basis for a judgment about his humanity. The one thing certain which appears from the list of Mr. English's foreclosures is that he made a large number of loans to persons whose credit was very poor, and on the only security they could offer, and presumably at the legal rate of interest. Any one who makes great numbers of such loans must needs, unless he means to lose a great deal of money, or convert his property into a charitable fund, make a great many foreclosures. Mr. English, it appears, made three hundred and ninety-two within the last two years, which proves that he had made three hundred and ninety-two loans, and did not seek to enforce his security until there was no other way of getting either principal or interest, for he could not foreclose until the debtor defaulted on both. It suggests, too, that he had probably made twice as many loans on mortgages which he did not foreclose, because he could not, unless he were Satan himself, select as his debtors only those who would be sure to become insolvent. Moreover, it appears that the security in those cases in which he did foreclose was very poor, because in most of them he had to buy the property in himself and got it, in the absence of competition, for less than the assessed value. The theory of his critics, therefore, apparently is that he ought to make thousands of loans on mortgage, but not foreclose in the only cases in which foreclosure would be necessary—that is, where the debtor is poor—and ought to have taken the property himself in the open market, not only for more than any one else would give, but for enough to cover his debt. We should like to know who has ever foreclosed a mortgage on anybody but a poor debtor. Foreclosures on rich or well-to-do debtors are at least very rare. The mortgage is taken lest the debtor should become poor. There is not a particle of proof that Mr. English was harsh in his treatment of the debtor in any case. He may have been; but every transaction between a creditor and debtor has two sides to it, and before being used against the character of either should be examined by some impartial tribunal. The last person in the world to report on it is a campaign reporter getting up "stories." We know nothing about Mr. English's private affairs, but we think the researches among his foreclosures, and the inferences based on them, have been more ludicrous and discreditable than such things usually are. It may be that Mr. English has used his "capital as an instrument for wrecking," but do not let us convict any man of this on the strength of a list of foreclosures published in the midst of a canvass, with comments of his own by an industrious "staff correspondent."

It is to be observed, too, that a man who has a house and lot to pledge for a loan of money is usually a man of considerable intelligence, who knows what pledging it means, and knows the probable consequences of any failure to pay the interest on the loan. Moreover, the law protects him in this kind of a loan against any sharp practice on the part of the creditor. The creditor cannot snap him up for one, two, or ten days' default, as an insurance company can, and cut off his equity of redemption. The law gives the debtor ample time to look about him for means of relief in the shape of a fresh loan, on the same property, or on other property, or the sale of the property itself. So that the presumption is, and Mr. English is entitled to the benefit of this presumption as well as everybody else, that mortgagers are a class of men who understand their own business, who know what risks they run when they make a mortgage, and who are prepared to bear the penalty of their default when the time comes. According to the campaign view of these English debtors, however, they are a band of unfortunate paupers who borrow money on contracts to which they do not expect to be held, and who are grievously wronged because they are held to it.

If it be asked why we attach enough importance to this particular campaign story to make it the subject of any lengthened discussion, we answer because it has made more impression on the public mind than such stories usually make, and seems to have a more substantial basis than such stories usually have; but, above all, because we think it a kind of story which the Republican party should by all means avoid as a weapon of attack. The Republicans appeal to the country in all their platforms and speeches as par excellence the conservative party, which is the only safeguard of industry, property, intelligence, and order against that combination of violence, envy, slothfulness, and greed known as "the Commune." "The Commune" is, in fact, frequently referred to by Republican orators as one of the things we have to fear if the Democrats get back into power, and some of them were so much frightened by it last year, even, that they were almost prepared to protect themselves against it by the sort of veiled dictatorship called "Grantism." We do not deny that there is something in the country which may be called "the Commune"—that is, a body of persons who look on all owners of capital, no matter whether composed of the workingman's savings or the idle man's inheritance, as their natural enemies, and to whom all power, influence, or authority acquired by superior training, skill, or intelligence is detestable. The Greenback party contains a considerable body of them; the Democratic party contains most of them. They are the sworn enemies of public and private credit. They like high taxes, to be paid by the industrious people who save. They like also to have money made plenty without labor, by the free use of the printing-press. They hate colleges and all institutions of learning as producing persons with marks of mental superiority to the simple Democrat who carries the hod up to the bricklayer. They do not care to have the world carried forward in civilization, because their highest ideal of civilization is expressed in the phrase "plenty to eat and drink and little to do." They are the curse of any country in which they abound, and though they are less numerous in this country than in most others they have the power of making more trouble. They have within a year or two arrested the prosperity and seriously endangered the future of one American State—California. They may any day disorganize the industry or lower the credit of some other in which they may happen to secure a temporary ascendency or hold the balance of power. The "cormorant" clause of the Democratic platform was put in in order to placate them, and by "cormorants" they understand everybody who has savings out at interest. They are as hostile to the investments of the savings-banks as they are to those of Mr. Vanderbilt. Any country which was governed by them, or had its domestic or foreign policy shaped by their ideas, would speedily disappear from the community of civilized states.

Now, all indiscriminate abuse of capitalists and "money kings" for heartlessness and greed furnishes these people with their whole stock in trade. A capitalist ought to be reprobated for heartlessness, greed, and extortion when he is proved guilty of them, but no sooner. We have no right to infer heartlessness, greed, and extortion from the fact that he has much money and many debtors, and brings many foreclosure suits or holds people to their contracts. We must let him live under the common law and hold his character on the same tenure as other people. So, also, it ill becomes the Republican party, as the party of intelligence and education, to endorse such sentiments as Mr. G. F. Hoar's denouncing General Hancock because he was regularly trained in the national military school and had honorably followed the calling for which he was trained, and had not, like General Garfield, begun life as a day-laborer. This view of the comparative merit of callings and careers is essentially Kearneyite and barbarous. What we need in the United States is more, and not less, regular training for honorable callings, and steady pursuit of the callings for which the training has prepared. It is to be regretted that a man of General Garfield's capacity should have passed the best learning years of his life on a tow-path, and it is to be desired that all boys as bright as he should be saved from such a waste of time if possible. It is greatly to General Garfield's credit that he should have overcome the disadvantages of this early loss of time; but it is not to any other man's discredit that he was enabled to avoid it, and to pass his youth in school. To preach that it is is to supply the nourishment on which Communism grows, for what the Communist seeks is not so much that the poor should have more knowledge as that the rich should have less, and he therefore hates and despises the fortunate son of an honorable and conscientious father who has labored and saved that his children may get the best equipment for the work of life which the community in which he lives can give.

PARLIAMENTARY OBSTRUCTION.

LONDON, August 26, 1880.

PROBABLY before this letter reaches you the Parliamentary session will have come to an end. It has been marked by a struggle between the efforts of the Government and of the majority to do the business of the country, and of the minority in opposition to prevent that business being done. The temporary return of Lord Hartington to the leadership of the House of Commons has probably been to the advantage of the Government and of the party. He possesses a certain thickness of skin, a lack of which is Mr. Gladstone's chief defect as a politician. When there is any question of argument or persuasion, when the ministerial majority has to be roused to decisive action, when an obstructive minority has to be taught that the forces of the country are behind the Prime Minister, Mr. Gladstone is without rival or second. But in dealing with the vexatious details of obstruction Lord Hartington's slower intelligence and less sensitive temper give him great advantages. He allows things to pass partly because he does not perceive the point to which opposition is directed, partly because he is not stung into retort by attacks which he does not feel and therefore does not resent. He does not by any copiousness of ideas or speech contribute to prolonged discussion. Assaults to which no other rejoinder is made than a few matter-of-fact sentences, or a supercilious taciturnity, followed by a request to the House to proceed at last to business, are sooner over. It cannot be truthfully said that Lord Hartington is greatly aided by the colleagues who sit by his side. Only two of them have any remarkable power of debate or great position in the House of Commons. These are Mr. Bright and Sir William Harcourt. Mr. Bright speaks with an authority inseparable from his age, his long parliamentary career, his position in the country, his disinterestedness, and his eloquence. He is respected even by those who hate him. It cannot be said that Sir William Harcourt has any weight with the House of Commons at all. The sentiment, perhaps, does him injustice; but he is looked at as a man who is only accidentally on the Liberal side, as a counsel who has taken the brief which came to him first, and whom a little more promptitude might have retained for the party and cause against which he now contends. Mr. Bright's occasional insolence and arrogance have a moral dignity of real conviction about them which shines through the rudeness of his language and bearing. If a savage, he is a noble savage. He is fighting for what to him are his hearths and altars, against greedy and sacrilegious invaders. Sir William Harcourt's offensiveness of tongue and port is resented as an outrage, because it is regarded as the indecorum of a licentious advocate.

I dare say all this is very unjust. But it is the Opposition view of him, and it inflames the dislike and fear with which he is regarded by an infusion of contempt. The office which Sir William Harcourt holds brings him more frequently before the House in replying to questions and in the detailed discussions of committee than any other would have done. The Home Secretary has, moreover, to arrange matters with members in the lobby more frequently than any of his colleagues. This is involved in the peculiar business which belongs to his department. Sir William Harcourt is not specially fitted for his work; and if, as is said, of all the great ministerial offices that which he fills is that which he least desired to have, his distaste proceeded on an ample basis of self-knowledge.

The other members of the Cabinet in the House of Commons are respectable heads of departments. Mr. Childers adds to a mastery of the routine of administration a knowledge of parliamentary management and a superficial tactical skill which would probably have made him a good whip. He has an eye for the emergencies of the moment, and a skill in devising evasions of difficulties and plausible excuses for glaring blunders, which are estimated perhaps above their intrinsic value in the House of Commons. Mr. Forster has been too much occupied in getting into false positions and out of them to give much general help to the Ministry. He is a dreary figure lost in the Irish bog which has engulfed, though not, perhaps, beyond the possibility of recovery, his reputation for statesmanship. Mr. Chamberlain's sudden elevation to the Cabinet, at an age at which most men are content to be under-secretaries, and after a Parliamentary career scarcely long enough to justify selection for office at all, has roused jealousies which seem to have suggested to him a certain modest self-effacement. But he is a trained man of business and a dextrous political manager; he has the official and Parliamentary manner, and his future is well assured. After a personal elevation without recent precedent he does well to wait. Mr. Dodson belongs, like Mr. Childers, to the class of official and Parliamentary experts, but he is scarcely to be counted as a directing or controlling influence in Parliament. In Mr. Gladstone's absence Lord Hartington does not receive much help from his colleagues in the Cabinet in his conflict with the tacticians of Parliamentary delay.

The first practitioners of obstruction in the House of Commons were Mr. Raikes, Mr. James (more familiarly known as Jim) Lowther, and Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, the two latter belonging to great aristocratic English families. The Lord Eskdale of Lord Beaconsfield's political novels was the Lord Lonsdale whom Wordsworth suffered to protect him, and to whom he paid in poetry the debts due for patronage. Mr. Jim Lowther is a scion of this great Tory house. Mr. Cavendish Bentinck belongs to the Dutch and ducal family whom William III. established in England. Both these gentlemen, together with Mr. Raikes, distinguished themselves by their strength of constitution, which enabled them to sit up late o' nights under Mr. Gladstone's former Government; by their strength of lungs, which made them unweary in articulate speech and inarticulate interruptions, and by their capacity for taking minute and constant exception to every detail of every question which was brought before them. On the principle which is adopted when a desperate poacher is turned into a gamekeeper, or as a thief used in olden times to be enlisted as a thief-taker, Mr. Raikes was appointed when Mr. Disraeli came into power to be chairman of committees. Knowing every artifice, and having practised most of them, by which the forms of the House can be evaded for the purposes of delay and resistance, he was well fitted to watch over their execution and to maintain them against transgressors less bold and skilful than himself. Mr. James Lowther was made, first, Under-Secretary of State, and then Chief Secretary for Ireland, and Mr. Cavendish Bentinck became Judge-Advocate General. The example of their promotion has not been lost upon the aspiring Tory youth of the present Opposition. Political youth has a very long duration, and a man at fifty in the House of Commons is supposed to be just beginning his career. Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir Henry Wolff, and Mr. Gorst, among the Conservatives below the gangway, are practising the arts which were pursued with success by Mr. Raikes, Mr. James Lowther, and Mr. Cavendish Bentinck. They will doubtless have their reward. They have already hustled aside poor Sir Stafford Northcote, who scarcely affects to control the party which he nominally leads, and is little more than a figure-head and symbol of a political chief.

But it may be doubted whether they will succeed in their more immediate purpose. They are bent upon wasting time, and the Government is wisely giving them as much time as they like to take. It has hitherto been, to use the phrase of Lord Hartington, an unwritten law of Parliament that it was to rise early in August, some days, at least, before the 12th, and only in the extremest cases to remain sitting a few days after it. If business was not done, so much the worse for business. The measures which there was no chance of passing before a certain date had to be dropped and to be started with anew in the next session. Mr. Gladstone has adopted a new course, which it is to be hoped will be persisted in. He is resolved to keep Parliament sitting until the measures which are brought before it shall either have been passed or shall have been definitively rejected. He has made up his mind not to allow the deliberate proposals of the Cabinet to slip through the Ministerial fingers. If either House refuses to pass them, the blame or the merit of their refusal, as the case may be, will be clearly ascertained and the Government will be without responsibility. This method has provoked vehement outcries of indignation. Attempts have been made to censure the Ministers for pressing measures at a time when, it is alleged, they cannot be fully and fairly considered. But they can be fully and fairly considered in September or October, if the peers and members of Parliament will remain in town to consider them. If they choose to go away for their own amusement or on their private affairs, it will be for the country to confide its business to persons who will attend to it at any and every season. The existence of a class of professional politicians in the United States is sometimes sneered at, and sometimes deplored as an evil injurious to the working of republican institutions, and as one from which England is happily free. But we have in this country another evil. A very large number of members of both Houses are persons to whom a Parliamentary career is simply an amusement—something to occupy their leisure when they are in town and cannot be killing something on the moors or among turnips. To them the two Houses are simply clubs of mixed politics, like the Athenæum or the Travellers'. It is these people who maintain that only so much business ought to be done as can be packed between the months of February and August, and that whatever cannot be accomplished within that time must be abandoned till another session. If Mr. Gladstone succeeds in teaching legislative amateurs on both sides of the House that this understanding will not hold good for the future, he will render very considerable service not only to his own administration but to Parliamentary government in England. The venerable man of letters whom it is the custom to speak of as the Sage of Chelsea is in the habit of appealing to the history of the past half-dozen years as a proof that Parliamentary government, or, as he calls it, the national palaver, has broken down. Talk has superseded work, in his view. While the choice was between talk and work, the opponents of changes which they disliked naturally preferred talk. When the choice comes to be, not between talk and work, but between talk and sport, talk will be sacrificed and work will be done. †††

MR. ENGLISH'S MORTGAGE RECORD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In this week's Nation you ridicule the attention paid by the Republican organs to the record of Mr. English's mortgage foreclosures. Permit me to remark that I think no one with the slightest sense of humor can fail to enjoy the delicious contrast between that record and the denunciation of "cormorants" in the Cincinnati platform which Mr. English mounted with so much alacrity. That demagogical appeal invited, and I think justifies, precisely such an attack upon a candidate open to it.

I venture to add that the personal character of a possible Vice-President is a subject of legitimate interest to voters, and in nothing are certain important traits more clearly revealed than in a man's treatment of his unfortunate debtors. I have had considerable experience in mortgage investments, and I must say that no one of ordinary humanity will sell out and buy in a debtor's homestead, except as a last resort of self-protection and after stretching indulgence to its utmost. This the long record of Mr. English's foreclosures would seem to show that he had habitually not practised. Again, while mortgage investments are a perfectly legitimate employment of capital seeking merely security with interest, we are all of us familiar with cases in which the capitalist uses them for another purpose—as instruments for wrecking; his object being, not the safety of his money, but to profit by the misfortunes of his debtor to obtain property below its value; and this, again, is presumptively indicated by Mr. English's record. This process of acquiring wealth is strictly legal, but it never serves to elevate a man's character with his neighbors or to increase their willingness to entrust themselves to his power.

Very respectfully, ***

THE SOUTH AND PUBLIC EDUCATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your answer to "J. B. S.'s" communication on "Republican Threats of Rebellion," contained in No. 790 (August 19) of the Nation, induces me to relate a fact that was brought to my attention some ten days since, while on a visit to Northampton County, North Carolina.

I was out hunting, and there passed me on the plantation-road that led to the county-road some eight or ten colored children of different sexes, between eight and fourteen years of age, I should judge. On being asked where they were going, the oldest said "to school," and they all had their books in their hands. I found the oldest was studying third arithmetic, English grammar, geography, and I believe natural philosophy. Their teacher was a colored man, and their schooling was given them at the expense of the county, under the general school system of the State. The white children have separate schools and white teachers. Up to the close of the war the parents of these children were the slaves of the gentleman on whose lands I was hunting. Northampton County has a population considerably over 15,000. The blacks largely preponderate. There were but five prisoners in the county jail. The crops (cotton and corn) are the finest seen since the war, cultivated almost exclusively by colored labor on shares, or at a rent of two bales of cotton for twenty-five acres.

I come now to your remark: "We cannot recall at this moment a single attempt on the Democratic side to provide by legislation for the fact that the negroes are now free, very ignorant, and liable to great oppression." If you will refer to the speeches by Senators Vance, Ransom, and other Southern senators, delivered last winter in the Senate on this subject, "as to what the Southern legislatures have done for the education of the colored race since their emancipation and the Democratic party has had control," you will find reason to change your opinion. If the author of 'A Fool's Errand' is correct when he says the only solution of the problem of negro elective franchise is time and education, I think you will find that the South, by legislation, has done in that direction as much as lay in her power; and it must be left to time and the ability on the part of the South to do more, when her ability is greater, unless President Hayes's plan is adopted, and the universal education of the colored people be undertaken by the General Government—as to the propriety of which there would doubtless be an irreconcilable diversity of opinion, as people now think. Possibly a few more decisions of the Supreme Court might enlighten us as to what powers Congress does possess as to matters relating to the freedmen in the South under the recent Amendments to the Constitution.—Very respectfully, Wm. H. S. B.

Baltimore, Md., August 31, 1880.

[We had in our mind, and ought to have expressed it more clearly, the national Democratic party, and the "Democratic side" in Congress. Of these we believe our remark is strictly true. We were, of course, well aware that the Southern State governments were doing something, some of them a great deal, for the education of the blacks —Ed. Nation.]

THE PRIESTLEY RIOT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. A. V. Dicey (Nation of August 12), in speaking of the Bastille anniversary, seems to imply that Dr. Priestley was present at the tavern dinner which was the pretext of the Birmingham riot of 1791. This is an error. Though doubtless in full sympathy with the party there assembled, he sought to avoid needless grounds of irritation. In his 'Appeal to the Public on the Riots in Birmingham' (Works, vol. xix. p. 373), he says:

"With the dinner itself I had, in a manner, nothing to do. I did not so much as suggest one of the proper and excellent toasts provided on the occasion, though it was natural for my friends to look to me for things of that kind, if I had interested myself much in it; and when opposition was talked of, and it was supposed some insults would be offered to myself in particular, I yielded to the solicitations of my friends, and did not attend."

Mr. Dicey must be jesting in suggesting that Priestley was "dreaming" of the mob when he pleaded for the "supremacy of the people"—Priestley, who stood so stoutly for education and all things that go to make the mob impossible. The scandalous feature of the riot was that, if not actually planned and instigated, it was certainly winked at and rejoiced over, by the local clergy of the English Church. They were the "mob" which had worried Priestley for years and finally drove him to this country. Even Burke (Priestley heard from a friend in the house with Burke) could not conceal his exultation when told of the sacking of Priestley's house. It was not the "people," in any proper sense, that did the deed, nor had Priestley any "awkward argumentum ad hominem" to face. H. D. C.

MRS. SWISSHELM CRIES ALOUD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You do me a great injustice when, in your review of 'Half a Century,' you speak of my desire to see Indians exterminated. I have never had any such desire; but, on the contrary, have persistently opposed the Penn policy, on the ground that it exterminates Indians. In the book you review is this passage, given in denunciation of that policy:

"If, by gentle means, Mr. Lo can be persuaded to stop taking all the wives he can get, extorting their labor by the cudgel, and selling them and their children at will, all well and good. Millions are expended on the persuading business, and prayer poured out like the rains in Noah's flood, without any perceptible effect; but still they keep on paying and praying, and carefully abstaining from all means at all likely to accomplish the desired result. All the property of every tribe must be held in common, so that there can be no incentive to industry and economy; and if the Indian refuse to be civilized on that plan he must go on taking scalps and being excused, until extermination solves the problem."

Is not this true? Do not the mass of thinking people regard the North American savage as incapable of civilization? For eighteen years I have stood protesting and insisting that the exceptional savagery of our savages is due to the exceptional conditions in which they have been placed by the exceptional people who have dictated a policy they have been unable to control; in other words, that William Penn and his maudlin sentimentality are the cause of the exceptional savagery of our savages, and exterminate them.

You mean to be generous when you excuse my "incoherence" and "shrieks" by assuming that I lost control of my nervous system in 1862; but eighteen years of hysterics is an untenable position. In what way should any one give utterance to the words you quote, believing, as I do, in their literal truth? If you saw a railroad train full of people rushing toward a broken bridge, would you not shriek your warning? Shall I see the Christian people of our Eastern States, the people I revere, rushing blindly into blood-curdling crime, and not shriek! shriek! gesticulate! "cry aloud and spare not," beat my breast and swoon with agony to find I cannot make them hear, cannot induce them to forbear? To me the sun at noon-day is not more visible than the complicity of Eastern Christians with Indian massacres. "They know not what they do." Like the sleep-walker who cut off his friend's head, they are doing most terrible deeds in utter unconsciousness. Gabriel will not blow his trump to arouse them, and I can but use my poor little penny whistle, on the principle that a mosquito might wake a man in time to save his life. Oh, no! "I am not mad, most noble Festus, but speak the words of truth and soberness," when I say to you, to the Eastern people en masse, "Ye have taken and with wicked hands have crucified and slain the" innocent! You it was who took those eight Minnesota babies, tied them, two and two, by one wrist each, and threw them across a fence, tied their parents where they must see their agony and hear their shrieks, and left them there to die; and these were only eight of the one thousand murders committed at one time for which you are responsible! Did you not arm the murderers with the most effective, deadly weapons—the weapons they used in this work—and stimulate them to it by the assurance that they should not be punished, nay, that they should be rewarded for their crimes? Are not Indians always rewarded for a massacre, and is not this reward given in response to the demand of Eastern philanthropy?

You are mistaken about my scouting the idea of the Indians having any title to the land. On page 223 of 'Half a Century' is this:

"William Penn disclaimed the right of conquest as a land title, while he himself held an English estate on that title, and while every acre of land on the globe was held by it. He could not recognize that title in English hands but did in the hands of Indians, and while pretending to purchase of them a conquest title, perpetrated one of the greatest swindles on record since that by which Jacob won the birthright of his starving brother."

By what legerdemain of logic do you draw from such premises the conclusion that I endorse "the woman-whippers of Georgia" in their treatment of the Cherokees? I hold that a civilized nation has as much right as a savage tribe to acquire land by conquest, and you conclude that, if this be so, a band of brigands or brigadiers has a right to defy the laws of the nation of which they are a part, laws they have sworn to obey, and forcibly expel men from the lands assigned to them by the nation.

After disposing of my sins of commission you turn to those of omission, and say "one must not turn to this volume for any light on the causes of the Sioux outbreak, on the extent of the massacre, or on the justice of the multiple hangings which succeeded it; nor, either, for an explanation of the failure of our Indian policy, or for one humane or practicable suggestion how to redeem it!" I am sorry, now, that in my anxiety to be brief I have given so much cause for this charge, but it is not altogether just. On page 229 I state what I believe to have been the cause of that outbreak, viz., a plan to assist the rebellion; and give some of the evidence on which this belief is founded. On page 207, in describing the trains of Red River—Ironless Carts—I give this hint of the cause of failure in our Indian policy: "In these trains were always found Indians filling positions as useful laborers, for the English Government never gave permission for idleness and vagabondism, among Indians, by feeding and clothing them without effort on their own part." I intended, by this, to indicate the whole cause of our failure in dealing with the Indian question. As for my remedy, I have published it so persistently in newspaper articles, from the platform, and in petitions to Congress, that I thought every one was tired of seeing and hearing it, and shall be glad if you will lay it before your readers. It is this:

Article One. Tumble the Indian Bureau into the Potomac.

Article Two. Put a washstand in its place.

Article Three. Place every Indian under the protection and jurisdiction of the laws of the State or Territory in which he may be found.

Article Four. Give to every head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of land, in fee-simple, and make his title inalienable; then let him dig or die.

You say truly, that to me "the Northern sentiment of pity for the aborigines is abominable," and could not overstate my loathing for that mother of crime, or for that whole sentiment which would convert "the Friend of sinners" into the Friend of sin. The pity which is always on the side of vice against virtue; the pity which has taught this Government to pay tribute to any half-dozen savages who may please to make war upon it; the pity which nerves the arm of the stalwart murderer, as, with raised butcher-knife, he pursues the Christian mother and her babes, and buries his death-dealing weapon in their flesh; the pity which assures him of justification when he subjects mangled and dying matrons, maidens, and infants to his brutal lust; the pity which is with the barbarian in his war against those men and women who plant Christian houses, churches, schools, and libraries on the lair of the wolf, is, to me, altogether and inexpressibly abominable.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Nothing could be more gratifying than the letters on the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society which you published in the Nation for September 2. They show clearly, what has often been asserted, that there are plenty of men in the country who understand thoroughly the bearings and importance of the question at issue in civil-service reform, and, the moment the right cue of action is given them, will join in the movement.

I think the right cue of action has now been given; and as we love our country we must not fail to follow it out.

I feel free to say that there are thousands, as yet unheard from, scattered over the country, who as soon as the idea reaches them will back our Publication Society with their voice and wealth. It is our part to see that the idea does reach them. Let the gentlemen who have written letters to the Nation, and all others interested in reform, take action in their several communities. Let them write to their local papers, explaining the subject, and calling on all Independents to send their names to the Independent Republican Committee in New York. Let them mention the matter in clubs and societies, and by every means in their power induce their neighbors to pledge support, and call for a grand meeting to be held as soon as possible.

The iron is now hot. We must strike before it cools. We must have a monster meeting and rouse enthusiasm. As one of your correspondents suggests, this is just the nick of time. Everybody is in the humor for talking politics, and any action on our part would be sure to be widely known, and would draw full attention to our object.

I think our meeting should be held within the next week or so—at any rate, as soon as possible, before the holidays are completely over and men settle down to their business. F. G. S.

PHILADELPHIA, September 6.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I presume there will be little difficulty in raising five thousand dollars a year for the proposed Civil-Service Reform Publication Society by either five-dollar or fifty-dollar subscriptions. If it can be done by five-dollar or ten-dollar subscriptions so much the better, as the interest in, and influence of, the Society would probably be greater than if it was in the hands of a few.

It will be a point gained if the Society starts free from the charge of being in the interest of any political party, and if some existing organization could be used that result might be attained. Might not the Social Science Association undertake the work, increasing its membership with special view to this object? C.

PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 4, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I approve of the idea of your correspondent, "F. W. H.," in your issue of August 19, as to forming a Civil-Service Publication Society, and can promise five subscribers at five or ten dollars each whenever it is organized.

Yours truly, H. WALKER, JR.

PITTSBURGH, PA., August 30, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As one who would gladly contribute to the support of a Civil-Service Reform Club, as suggested by your correspondent, "F. W. H.," I beg leave to present a few considerations which I believe do, or should, affect the minds of Independents in the present campaign.

Your correspondent suggests that in order to accomplish anything such an organization as he recommends would be obliged to support either Hancock or Garfield. It seems to me that this course would be most unwise, for it must be admitted that neither of the candidates, nor the party which supports either, has given any assurance on the subject which may not be discarded when convenient, and to the discomfiture of those who may undertake to make promises on behalf of either. Take Hayes's Administration as a warning. It would hardly be safe to promise anything definite on the part of Garfield and the Republican party, and the fact that nothing more definite can be predicted of General Hancock and the Democrats shows how completely the politicians have thrown vital questions into the background, and how shrewdly they are rallying the rank and file to the support of extinct issues and party records.

In this state of affairs your correspondent's suggestion, that the argument in favor of reform should be simply that it is right, should lead to an attempt to bring a moral force to bear on both parties, and perhaps if a few enlightened clergymen could be induced to present from their pulpits the true state of the present evil, viz., that the distribution of the Federal offices is a vast corruption fund, a fund measured in value by the amount of the salaries of these offices, used as direct bribery by the "Bosses" and "Ringsters," public attention might be roused sufficiently to enable reformers to take some decided action. Unless, however, it be found possible to bring a strong influence to bear, I venture to suggest to Independents that, putting all other questions aside, there is one event that may force these questions to the front, viz., a collision between Hancock and his political supporters in the distribution of offices. It can hardly be believed that Hancock, in the event of his election, can fail to see the momentous importance of this question, or fail to pause before the undertaking of such sweeping changes as some of his supporters will be certain to call upon him to make.

I admit that there is little more to hope from his silence on this subject than from Garfield's unworthy letter of acceptance, but even supposing Hancock to be utterly weak and with no serious grasp of the question, is it unreasonable to entertain another hope—namely, that should he undertake to dispossess seventy thousand office-holders there would be a large number of intelligent Democrats who would severely condemn such a proceeding; and would not their censure, joined to the outcry from the entire Republican camp, become a force that could not be resisted nor defied? It seems to me that in this view the course of events may thwart the politicians, and further as if the election of Hancock gave promise of bringing this question speedily to an issue. Very truly yours, E. B.

THE LONDON TIMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A letter on English journalism dedicated to the Times in Nation No. 787 runs so wide of the pith of its subject that it is difficult to say whether it says more that it should not say or leaves unsaid that, more important, which it should say to give a fair idea of the Times. I can only warn your readers in general not to accept it as an adequate statement of that which may be said about the paper—for some things could only be said by those who have no disposition to say them.

The well-understood principle of the Times is to support every measure which it considers wisely Liberal until it is clear that public opinion—i.e., the perception of some dominant public interest of England—is opposed to it, when it must be abandoned as too much resembling the butting one's head against a stone wall. That in following this course it should occasionally contradict itself is only equivalent to saying that it cannot struggle against a determined public opinion; but this contradictoriness is so much dwelt on and exaggerated as to become practically a misstatement, because in general the course of the Times is self-consistent and may nearly always be safely predicted. One honors the Daily News for its tenacity in defence of Liberal principles; but they are the principles it was founded and is supported to defend. The Times would lose its power and support at once if recognized as a party paper, or one devoted to the support of any special dogma or interest. But to say that it does not combat the opinions of the day is to forget or ignore the fact that to the obstinate resistance of the Times and its effect on public opinion was, more than to anything else, due the paralyzing of the long effort of the Conservative Government to drive the country into a war with Russia during the Bulgarian war; nor was there any cessation in that opposition until the danger of war was over. Acrimoniously attacked as a Russian organ, it never in reaction became anti-Russian, and only withdrew its generous advocacy of interests espoused by Russia when the more material interests of the proprietors made persistence ruinous.

Nothing is more curious in English character than the excessive energy of action and reaction in regard to exciting questions, so that the men who applauded the mob that broke Mr. Gladstone's windows are now borne off their feet by the Liberal flood. A tide of this kind directed against the Times for a few months would wash an obstinate editor and staff out from the office, and leave nobody the better for it, and the proprietors much worse off. I have known Englishmen so fanatically hostile to the Times that they absolutely refused to read it. Yet with this fanaticism forcibly brought home to the paper as a consequence of its Slavic tendencies, with the strongest influence of the Government and Court pressing on it, I have yet to see that the Times during that long and most critical period ever went over to the other side, or further than silence on questions on which it had spoken warmly. It is not true, then, to say that it follows and never leads public opinion. What is better and more just would be to say that it leads as long as it can, and when it can lead no longer accepts the dictates of public opinion. Of course there are occasional exceptions, but this is the fair general statement. With regard to the Afghan question, again, I heard the editor, on the receipt of the telegram with the news of the first hostilities in Afghanistan, express the opinion on the question which to-day he is maintaining, and from which the paper has never widely varied—vindication of English honor and total abandonment of Afghanistan militarily.

A little acquaintance with the mechanism of the journal would have saved your correspondent from some practical mistakes, especially as to men. During all the last years of Mr. Delane's ill-health Mr. Stebbing was the acting editor of the Times, as he still is one of the principal collaborators. When Mr. Chenery came in he was not Arabic professor at Oxford in any proper sense of the term, but held an honorary professorship involving no duties, and was one of the principal editorial writers of the Times, and had been for many—if I mistake not, twenty—years; he was, in fact, educated to journalism on the staff of the paper, and he did not change his staff in any material degree. Nothing is more characteristic of the Times than the conservatism of its organization. It is difficult to get on the staff, and with common prudence next to impossible to get thrown out. There was never any noticeable degree of disorder or any large changes, and Mr. Chenery had by most of his fellow-workers been long noted as the fittest man for the succession. He is probably as competent a man as could be found for a position in which no man living would not make some mistakes, and he is both eminently judicial and very firm in his opinions. Nor was he in any shape responsible for the opposition to Lord Beaconsfield's Government, which was at its strongest before Mr. Chenery came to the helm.

The present editor is known to be more in sympathy with Mr. Walter than was Mr. Delane, and while Mr. Walter never directly interferes with the conduct of the paper, nothing is more certain than that it would adopt no line of policy which he did not favor. It would be, I think, safe to say that Mr. Chenery would not submit to direct interference; but this sympathy of views between Mr. Walter and him, and his long and complete identification with the conduct of the paper, taken with his appointment by Mr. Walter, knowing him for so many years, secure this result, so that Mr. Walter is practically dictator of the Times and its policy.

In the very partial list of the personality your correspondent omits some of the most important names, which is not strange, as the destiny of a good Times man is obscurity: no man who does not more or less merge himself in the paper and adopt its general tone would long remain on the staff, if he ever got there; but to speak of the editorial staff and not mention Mr. Clifford is strange, while to leave out the manager, Mr. MacDonald, is like "Hamlet" without (not Hamlet, but) the Ghost, for no man now on the paper has so large a part in what it is as he. He is not only business manager but director and controller of the correspondence, and the inventor of the Walter press and of nearly all the improvements which make the mechanical execution of the Times possible, as well as of the marvellous organization within the printing-office, as in the intelligence department, which keeps the paper in the position it holds quite as much as anything in the editing of it. Mr. MacDonald is, even more than Mr. Walter, the soul of the Times.

Unless Mr. Davidson has retired from the musical criticism by death or resignation lately, Mr. Hueffer is not the musical critic but an assistant of Mr. Davidson, though in all probability to our public Hueffer is better known than the responsible chief, who, in fact, I believe, writes very little.

Of the correspondents, Eber, who has the post at Vienna that Blowitz holds at Paris, certainly is as well worth notice, and the two have very great influence on the tone of the paper in reference to their provinces. One feature of the Times, which distinguishes it from all its English contemporaries, is the preference for foreigners as its chief correspondents, and the entire independence in which they are left in the expression of their opinions, even when radically opposed, as often happens, to the editorial tone. Eber is an Hungarian, Blowitz a Czech, Gallenga (the chief of the specials) an Italian, and in the late war in the Balkans two if not three of its specials were American; and at one time, not long ago, the only great capital where an English correspondent was kept was St. Petersburg.

I believe that every person connected with the Times is Liberal, nor has it, ever since I have known it, advocated Conservative opinions. Nor is it just to say that in the latter part of the Eastern crisis it "suddenly turned round and became the organ of the Ministry," or that it has as suddenly gone over to the new Government. The Times has never, since I read it, been friendly to Mr. Gladstone, nor, if I am a judge, has it ever gone further in support of a Conservative Government than most patriotic and non-partisan Englishmen do. What is true, and a point in which the Times sets an honorable example to the press of the whole world—an example in which, so far as I know, the Nation is the only paper which follows it—is the allowing in its columns the expression of all sides of every question. As the most important channel of communication with the public, it is especially favored by the communication of the views of every English Government and of some European, and advocates those views if they seem to it reasonable and politic; but there are many questions on which it would be safe to predict that the Times will never advocate but one opinion.

In personal questions the Times is the only paper in England which refuses a hearing to no one. Let us be just, for the Times never defends itself.

AN EX-MEMBER OF THE "TIMES'S" STAFF.

Notes.

MACMILLAN & CO. have published, in an octavo of 333 pages, uniform with his other works, 'Passages from the Prose Writings of Matthew Arnold.' The title-page gives no intimation as to who is to be credited with the work of selection, but for several reasons we suspect it is not the author himself. In the first place, there is no preface or introduction, both of which it is Mr. Arnold's constant and agreeable habit of supplying in cases where there is far less need of any. In the second place, the arrangement, divisions, and headings are such as his urbanity would have been more likely to sanction than his taste to dictate; and the whole volume has an air of scrappiness and "smartness" which misinterprets a writer to whom context is of unusual importance. Still, it contains many of his best passages, and readers who do not know him may get from it an intimation of the range and variety of his topics. The same house have in press a 'History of Procedure in England during the Norman Period,' by Melville Madison Bigelow.——In a class of text-books which may be thought (according to the teacher and his method) either of the first or of the least importance—readers, namely—Swinton's supplementary series, to be published at once by Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., will have some claims on attention. The fifth and sixth respectively consist of extracts from seven American and seven British classics.——Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago, have entrusted Mr. J. J. Lalor with the editing of a 'Cyclopædia of Political Science and Political Information,' in three volumes.——The supplement to the first annual report of the Massachusetts State Board of Health, Lunacy, and Charity preserves the independence of the unequalled series of health reports. Drainage and pollution of drinking-water furnish the bulk of the discussion. Mr. E. W. Bowditch's paper on the drainage of summer hotels (aided, as it is, by effective drawings from photographs) has a special bearing on the settlement at Oak Bluffs, Martha's Vineyard, but a universal interest. Mrs. Ellen H. Richards's report on the adulteration of some staple groceries gives, on the whole, a comforting assurance.——We have also received the seventh annual report of the Michigan State Board of Health, which might have been edited and printed to greater profit. It gives details which it is useless to spread before laymen. The most characteristic feature of this report is the section upon the meteorological conditions of the year 1878 in Michigan.——An unpretentious, clear, and important study of the mound-region of southeastern Missouri is made in Part I. of 'Contributions to the Archæology of Missouri,' by the Archæological Section of the St. Louis Academy of Science (Salem, Mass.: George A. Bates). Prof. W. B. Potter gives an interesting topographical description of the deltoid district in question, with the aid of several plans showing the mound settlements; and Dr. Edward Evers briefly comments upon the twenty-four plates of pottery, which embrace not a few remarkable specimens. ——Effingham Wilson, London, sends us the seventeenth edition of 'Tate's Modern Cambist,' a standard manual of foreign exchanges and bullion, weights and measures. The work has perforce undergone extensive revision in consequence of the great monetary changes of the past ten years. May the editor be able to say in the next edition as now: "The United States have practically still the 'gold valuation.'"——Students of mediæval art may find their account in examining Camillo Boito's recent illustrated work entitled 'Architettura del Medio Evo in Italia' (Milan).——According to the Athenæum the present month will witness the publication of the first number of a periodical devoted to international spelling reform, the Zeitschrift für Orthographie, of which Dr. W. Victor, of Wiesbaden, will be the editor. A zealous French reformer, by the way, M. Courtat, sets forth a scheme of his own in a recent 'Monographie du Dictionnaire de l'Académie française,' upon which Polybiblion remarks: "Entre l'identité parfaite de la prononciation et de l'écriture et l'orthographie actuelle, telle qu'elle est, il n'y a pas de milieu. . . . Et si chacun s'en vient écrire comme il parle, combien de patois compterons-nous?"——A correspondent more versed in iconography than ourselves calls our attention to the fact that the portrait, in the September Harper's, purporting to represent "Caroline, wife of George IV.," is really a portrait of that king's mistress, Mrs. Fitzherbert, after the original miniature by R. Cosnay, now at Wortley Hall, Sheffield.

—A portion of the Boston publishers' fall announcements can be given as follows. Roberts Bros. promise 'Fragments of Christian History,' by Prof. Joseph H. Allen; 'Sanskrit and its Kindred Literatures,' by Laura Elizabeth Poor; a volume of poems by Edwin Arnold; 'Voyage Alone in the Yawl Rob Roy,' by John Macgregor; 'Round About a Great Estate,' by Richard Jefferies, and the same author's 'Gamekeeper at Home' in an illustrated holiday edition, with designs by Charles Whymper; 'Stories of the Sea, Told by Sailors,' by the Rev. E. E. Hale; a 'Memoir of Governor Andrew, with Reminiscences,' by Peleg W. Chandler; 'Modern Society,' Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's Concord paper; 'Certain Men of Mark'—living characters—by Geo. M. Towle (who will publish, by the way, through Lee & Shepard, his 'Marco Polo' for younger readers); Coquelin's 'Actor and his Art,' translated by Miss Alger; 'Verses,' by "Susan Coolidge," and new children's stories by this writer, Miss Alcott, Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, and Mrs. Juliana H. Ewing. A good turn is also done to little folks by new editions of Munroe & Francis's time-honored 'Old-Fashioned Fairy Tales' and 'Sandford and Merton.' For novels, Roberts Bros. offer 'The Head of Medusa,' by Miss Fletcher, the author of 'Kismet'; and 'By the Tiber,' by the author of 'Signor Monaldini's Niece.' James R. Osgood & Co. have nearly ready the first volume of their 'Memorial History of Boston,' and have undertaken a revision to the present time of Spooner's 'Dictionary of the Fine Arts,' edited by Mrs. Clara Erskine Clement. Estes & Lauriat have in press 'M. Guizot in Private Life, 1787–1874,' by Mme. de Witt; and 'Rural Bird-Life,' by Charles Dixon, to which Dr. Elliott Coues furnishes a preface. Dr. Coues, in turn, will publish through Lee & Shepard 'New England Bird-Life.' Houghton, Mifflin & Co. announce volumes of poetry by Longfellow ('Ultima Thule') and Holmes ('The Iron Gate'), the product of the last few years; each will be accompanied by a portrait. The indefatigable Mr. Moses King is engaged in bringing out a 'Dictionary of Boston,' and a kindred guide-book, 'The Back Bay District and the Vendome.'

—The recent Boston meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science was one of the most notable in the history of that body. To mention only some of the physical papers—Prof. Graham Bell's, "Upon the production of sound by light" (describing his marvellous new photophone, or mode of transmitting sound along a beam of light, in connection with the telephone); Prof. Alfred M. Mayer's description of his Topophone, and Mr. E. H. Hall's "New action of magnetism on a permanent electric current" (the last two discoveries already signalized to our readers), would give distinction to any scientific gathering. Never, perhaps, were the arrangements for the information and entertainment of members and their transportation on various excursions more satisfactory. Besides the general "Programme of the Twenty-ninth Meeting," the local secretaries published their daily bulletin or "Announcement," paged consecutively, with lists of arrivals, new members, papers filed, hospitalities offered, etc., etc. A handy card map of Boston peninsula, and a large folding map of the city and its environs, made sight-seeing easy, and a pamphlet, "Brief Account of Some of the Scientific Institutions of Boston and Vicinity," showed where the visitor should go. Finally, the custodian of the Boston Society of Natural History, Mr. Alpheus Hyatt, prepared a special edition of the introduction to his "General Guide to the Museum," for the use of members of the Association.

—A writer in the September number of the International Review does its readers a service in giving examples of the verse of a South Carolina poet whose work seems to have been less ample than one could wish, after making the acquaintance of these fragments of it. Though "Whittier has warmly commended him as the best of Southern singers," we are informed, his present celebrator is probably right in thinking that to most readers "the name of Henry Timrod will present the doubtful charm of novelty." For the sake of more illustrations we could easily reconcile ourselves to an abridgment of the writer's exposition, which, though enthusiastic and sympathetic, is scarcely critical, and to praise a poet indiscreetly differs little in effect from not praising him at all. From the examples given we should say Timrod's verse was overweighted rather than interpreted by confident comparisons with Tennyson, Heine, and Catullus; but it has an evident purity and fulness of meaning, so opposite to the just convention we all have in mind when Southern verse is mentioned as to be emphasized, perhaps, by its setting in prose less far removed from the conventional notion of Southern critical writing. His "greatest poem," we are told, is "too partisan" to quote, but Northern readers would, we think we may say, be quite as ready to tolerate its animus as to credit the unsupported assertion that it will "be ranked near to Dryden's 'Feast of Alexander' and Lowell's magnificent 'Commemoration Ode.'" Timrod was born in 1829 and died in 1867, after a life not empty of trouble and at the last full of pain, but sustained by a cheerful serenity not unaffectingly depicted here. An incomplete edition of his works was published by E. J. Hale & Son, of this city, in one volume, some seven years ago.

—The remaining articles of the International make it an unusually good number. M. Auguste Laugel contributes, in a paper on Lamennais, a distinct literary flavor not too common in current periodicals, and possible only to a writer withdrawn from current discussion in all its phases, and wholly given over to the pursuit of literature as an art. It is a portrait of the priest drawn in lines apparently purely descriptive, but having all the force, as one presently comes to see, of an impersonal critique. Whitefield is treated with less suggestiveness, though with fully as much explicit detail, by Mr. William Myall, of Paris, Ky., who has made the interesting article he could hardly fail to make with such a subject; it is, however, what it might easily have failed of being, candid and discriminating. "Few men," says Mr. Myall, "have succeeded in erecting so lasting a reputation upon so absolute a penury of everything in the human mind which is worthy of immortality." D. G. Hubbard examines with great elaborateness "The Myth of the Virgin in Painting and Sculpture"; Edwin De Leon writes about "Nubar Pacha and the Armenian Christians" with the acquaintance his Egyptian experience affords, though in rather a rhetorical vein; Mr. John Jay discusses "The Presidential Election" at length, rubbing their war record into the Democrats with a fine remorselessness, arguing from it their profound untrustworthiness, and concluding with a deprecation of any attempt "to reopen the issues of the war and assist in unsettling the issues of the past." The leading article is on "Money," by Professor Bonamy Price, and is naturally a good deal more than the review which it purports to be of General Walker's book on the subject, though it is that too, and as such is none the less severe for its courtesy, which is marked. On the subject of bi-metallism he implies that General Walker has only enthusiastic conviction for a support, and commends by contrast Mr. Clairmont Daniell's pamphlet, 'Gold in the East.'

—The death of Mr. Sanford Gifford removes one of the most popular of the older American painters. Among these, too, his rank was high. He is to be classed with Mr. Church and the late Mr. Kensett among the followers of Cole; and perhaps it would be putting too fine a point upon it to say that his work was inferior to the dramatic panorama of the former or the mild sweetness of Kensett. On the other hand, it would be difficult to indicate clearly the real difference in value between it and such work as Mr. Whittredge's or Mr. Casilear's. It was thoroughly American, we need not say; indeed, it seemed to assert its nationality in a certain soft aggressiveness or placid imperviousness to ideas of painting current in the rest of the world. It was wholly hostile to anything like pertness or even vivacity, and shunned the obvious excellence of more modern methods with a dignity and poise in themselves pleasant to perceive. In pursuing this end it paid a penalty that has been rigorously exacted of it—we think not too rigorously, though the unmistakableness of its old-fashioned character and simple ideal was so great as to make it easy for critics incapable of appreciating either (if there were any such) to deride it ignorantly. The truth is that the canons to which such art as Mr. Gifford's subscribed have now to be recalled by an effort of memory. He did not paint nature as he saw it, and in all probability never essayed to do so. To him a "picture" was not only the different thing from a "study from nature" which it is acknowledged to be on all hands, but it was a transfiguration after some receipt perfectly known to him, rather than a selection and arrangement of natural material even. Light and air, those elusive objects of other than the older American landscape painters, he seemed not to be uneasy about striving for at all. They gave place to the relation known as "aerial perspective," which he sought with evident and ingenuous directness, and in doing so enshrouded all the objects of his pictures in a cadmium mist, by which his work became recognizable anywhere and always, and which seemed, at a certain stage of every observer's æsthetic development, very lovely to behold. As one got tired of it, it became clear that it was tiresome not so much because of its monotony as because of its lack of large significance, and that it was not so much a superficial phase of natural beauty as Mr. Gifford's notion of all beauty whatsoever. In the same way one outgrows a certain order of poetry well known to possess dignity and witness a refined nature. So that the sudden ending of his career is a loss to the body of American artists of a singularly fine and shy personality rather than an irreparable loss to American art.

—The study of early institutions, begun at Harvard under the guidance of Professor Henry Adams, fruits of which have already been laid before the public in the volume, edited by that instructor, called 'Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law,' has been further illustrated by the thesis on which, at the last Commencement, the degree of Doctor of Philosophy was granted to Mr. Denman W. Ross. We speak of it here with reference to a review of the work, in the current number of the Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie, by Von Inama-Sternegg, of Prague, a voluminous writer on political economy. Mr. Ross's pamphlet is called 'The Theory of Village Communities,' and his aim is to controvert the generally-held doctrine (of which the ablest English expounder is Sir Henry Maine) that private property in land arose out of the disintegration of tribal institutions, and is the final stage of a process of evolution of which village communities form the intermediate term. Dr. Sternegg begins his review with a sharp protest against "the ready-made application by the pseudo-romanticists of socialism" of the results of scientific investigation in this field, which has resulted, he says, in making the work of true students more careful and thorough than ever, and he hails Mr. Ross's work as "a valuable contribution to the conscientious study of historical political economy," which "causes double pleasure—first, because it treats one of the weightiest of social problems in a spirit entirely free from preconceived bias, and is based upon original investigation; second, because it testifies to a lively interest in these problems in the distant West." While the reviewer does not deem settled all the points raised by the essayist, he is of the opinion that "he has unquestionably made himself worthy of great praise in incontestably proving that, since the beginning of documentary history, the Germans have had individual property in land and a settled law of succession."

—The writer of the entertaining account of "A Reindeer Ride through Lapland," in the last number of Blackwood, makes the following statement in regard to the designs of Russia upon a portion of that country, which is "important if true." At a Norwegian settlement on the Tana he was present at the trial of the river-superintendent, who was accused of the intention of transferring the river to Russia, and was removed from his post on that account. The Tana for a considerable part of its course forms the boundary between Russia and Norway, but about thirty miles from its mouth the boundary-line turns sharply to the southeast, the river flowing due north and emptying into the Arctic Ocean through a fiord bearing its name. A "scientific frontier" would naturally follow its course, and this is what Russia very reasonably (in accordance with British precedents) desires. By gaining possession of the district included between the river and the sea Russia would not only have the valuable cod-fisheries of the Varanger Fiord, but in the island-town of Vardö would obtain a port which is open the whole year round. The importance of a naval station in European waters from which a fleet could be despatched at any time and to any quarter would be very great. Vardö is now an insignificant place of some twelve hundred inhabitants, but enjoys the distinction of being protected by the most northern fort in Europe. Of the ultimate success of Russia in obtaining this territory the chief official of the district had no doubt.

—The following discussion, excerpted from Mr. W. J. Stillman's Athens letter of last week, has a special antiquarian interest:

"While on the subject of the Acropolis I ought to say that German studies on the great staircase which Beulé excavated have recovered some more fragments of the Temple of Victory, and shown some confirmation of the view previously advocated—that the staircase is not ancient, but a Middle-Age construction. Émile Burnouf, indeed, in one of the latest publications on the Acropolis ('La ville et l'Acropole d'Athènes aux diverses époques'), attacks the whole of Beulé's researches with a vigor in which it is impossible not to recognize personal passions which have led that never too sound archæologist to neglect the plain common-sense arguments in the question to such a degree that he destroys his own demonstrations. Burnouf maintains, in brief, that the whole western wall and the gate which Beulé uncovered, with the staircase and everything dependent on it, were the work of the Florentine dukes of Athens, and that the so-called restoration of Valerian was really originally a work by Nerio Acciaioli, and restored by Antonio, his son, in haste on the approach of Sultan Amurath. There is not room here to follow all his argument, and it must be admitted that he has made several good minor points against Beulé; but it would not, I think, be difficult to show that in his eagerness to demolish his predecessor he has exposed himself to destructive criticism. So far as concerns the general plan of approach to the Propylæa and the probable character of that portion of the enceinte, I do not believe that Beulé's theory can be attacked; but Burnouf and the later German excavations show that the staircase in its present state is a mediæval work—probably, me judice, an incomplete and greatly-modified restoration of the original approach, without which in some such state as is now indicated the position and magnitude of the Propylæa (the structure that stood before the gates—i. e., the nine gates) would be an architectural solecism, even an absurdity. It is clear that the staircase is not contemporary with the Propylæa; but Burnouf's ineffectual struggles to reconcile his hypothesis with the nine-gated approach alone suffice to show the untenableness of his theory, for there is not in the space he would dispose of—viz., that between the landing of the Propylæa and the foot of the present staircase—room to bestow nine gates without making them a weakening of the military defence, and the Pelasgi were too good engineers to put nine gates where three sufficed. The fact is that a sound induction from the Propylæa and its surroundings would lead an investigator to look for some such gate and some such staircase as long as the bastions which once covered the whole approach existed, and Beulé was the third who, following this induction, attempted to find what he finally succeeded in finding. It is indicated in the plan of the Propylæa. Nothing that Burnouf advances goes to weaken Beulé's reading of the existing walls and gate, but, on the contrary, the reading proposed by the former only shows his entire ignorance of antique wall-structure; and his hypothesis that Antonio Acciaioli, in haste to defend Athens against Amurath, had been so careful as deliberately to select the antique material, restore the antique form of the gate with its archaic slope of lintel, and replace the band of Eleusinian black marble, so as to be in keeping with the use of the same in the antique substructure of the Propylæa above, is whimsically absurd. The internal evidence is irresistible that the gate known as Beulé's was reconstructed on an antique model, while something of the old Greek methods, traditions, and reverence remained; and there is scarcely any escape from the further conclusion that this was the work done by Valerian, as history records. The repairs which Burnouf shows Antonio Acciaioli to have made were in preparation for an attack by the Turks, who were already in the Phocide! The slightest examination of the wall in which is Beulé's gate will convince any one who has experience in these matters that it is utterly impossible that it should have been constructed only about 1430, as Burnouf would have us believe—the more that, being in a very few years later completely cased in by the massive masonry of the Turkish bastions, no chance remained for the wear of time and weather which it shows to-day most unmistakably. But neither Beulé nor Burnouf offers any valid suggestion as to the position of the Enneapylæ, and if the excavation of the western slope of the Acropolis and the southern of the Areopagus does not disclose some indications of it we must regard it as lost. Burnouf's attempt to locate the Pelasgicon within the inner enclosure of the Acropolis is so wildly at variance with every known tradition that it becomes difficult to give him credit for ordinary archæologi-cal acumen. On the whole, it seems to me, we must accept Beulé's conclusions as to the meaning of his own discoveries, as unmoved by any of the subsequent attempts to reconstruct the Acropolis."

—Apropos of De Gubernatis's Oxford lectures on Manzoni we remarked upon the scanty knowledge we possessed of the subject of the book. It was the first attempt at more than a mere biographical sketch, and, although unsatisfactory, was a distinct advance. Since then De Gubernatis has been fortunate enough to be allowed to publish the correspondence of Manzoni with his most intimate friend, the distinguished French scholar, Claude Fauriel. An Italian translation of the letters was published last year in the Nuova Antologia, and has recently appeared in book form and passed through two editions already. The title is 'Il Manzoni ed il Fauriel studiati nel loro carteggio inedito' (Rome: Barbèra. 1880). In this second edition the letters of Manzoni (fifty-four in number) are given in the appendix in the original French. The body of the work consists of an Italian translation of the same, accompanied by a commentary by the editor, and illustrated by other letters directed to Fauriel. At Fauriel's death his papers passed into the possession of Madame Mary Mohl, the widow of the distinguished Orientalist, who at one time desired Manzoni to write a life of her friend. This Manzoni, with his usual shrinking from publicity, was unwilling to do, as it would involve his own intimacy with Fauriel, and he was, of course, opposed to any publication of his own letters. They have, therefore, remained unpublished until now. They extend from 1807–1830, and give a great deal of interesting information about the composition of the 'Conte di Carmagnola,' 'Adelchi,' and the 'Promessi Sposi.' They also bear witness to one of the most beautiful friendships in literature, and honor equally the writer and the recipient.

GREEN'S 'HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE.'—II.*

OF Mr. Green's deficiencies we have spoken plainly. They are to a great extent compensated for by his rare capacity for bringing into view the great phases of his subject. In nothing is this talent more clearly manifest than in his account of what he aptly terms "modern England," by which he means the period extending from about the accession of George III. (1760) to a date (1815) within the memory of persons now living. This term of fifty-five years has undoubtedly a unity which divides it at once from the preceding age and from contemporary history. By no writer have its features been, on the whole, better seized than by our author. The object of the present article is to determine wherein this unity from a political point of view (which is the only aspect we have space to consider) consists. In performing our task we make free use of Mr. Green's suggestive chapters, but he must not be taken as endorsing all our conclusions. On two accounts it is specially worth while to direct attention to the unity of an era which is both so near to and in another sense so far from the present day. The first is that the French Revolution broke the continuity of English progress, and there is, therefore, a special danger of missing the real unity of English development. The second is that, when the revolutionary movement storm abated, English political life resumed the path from which it had been forced, and the true key to English history since 1815 is to be found in the set of English policy from 1760 up to the time when it was, so to speak, warped by the force of the revolution.

Of the distinction between modern England and the preceding age (1689–1760) so much has been written that the topic, though interesting enough, is not one to which we care at the present moment to direct the minds of our readers. What is better worth notice is that the reign of George III. is marked by four different movements which are closely connected, and which from their combined influence have given a new turn to the annals of the English people.

First. The policy of Chatham had by 1760 permanently transformed Great Britain into a very different thing—the British Empire. It is this imperial character which gives a new impress to the public virtues no less than to the public vices of the generation which seized India and could not retain America. The sense of imperialism terminated the ill-will between Scotland and England, and enabled the genius of Chatham to convert Highland rebels into the best soldiers of the British army; it strengthened the nation to the endurance of defeat, and to exertions which just a century ago redeemed disaster from every tinge of disgrace. The feeling that Great Britain was the centre of a vast empire is seen from its better side in Goldsmith's conviction that Englishmen were "the lords of human kind"; it is seen from its worst side in the brutal determination to enforce to the utmost rights of sovereignty which fostered the pride of every Englishman. "We have been so very powerful and so very prosperous that even the humblest of us were degraded into the vices and follies of kings." Philosophers and statesmen may deplore the prevalence throughout modern England of the spirit of domination. But historians, whose province is to note facts rather than to moralize on the follies of mankind, must observe that the good and bad qualities which still mark English society were alike the sign and the result of the movement which produced the British Empire, and will probably last as long as that empire endures. It is at any rate noticeable that imperial sentiment in its best sense, and the vulgar parody of it which is now nicknamed "Jingoism," owe their birth to the condition of politics and society when George III. mounted the throne.

Secondly. The creation of the British Empire, which was itself mainly the offspring of commercial energy, went along with not only an immense extension of commerce, but also with an unprecedented development of the industrial resources of the country. Mr. Green's chapter on industrial England contains nothing which is absolutely new, but it brings into one view a lot of facts of which the effect is lost if they are not combined together. Brindley, Watt, Arkwright, and Crompton did much more than merely make ingenious inventions. Whether they knew it or not, the inventors who enabled Great Britain to make full use of her manufacturing resources as surely turned the current of English history as did the statesmanship of Chatham and Pitt, or the speculations of Adam Smith. It is at least an ingenious theory that the growth of industrialism fostered the religious and humanitarian movement which was characteristic of modern England as, it must be added, of modern Europe generally. It is not a theory but a demonstrable fact that the working of English coal-mines and the growth of English manufactures shifted the centres of population, and with them what may be termed the centre of power from the south to the north, and gave something like a permanent predominance to the mercantile and manufacturing classes. This silent revolution was hardly noted by even so acute a speculator as Burke, yet more than any one cause it was in the end fatal to the system of Whig aristocratic rule, which Burke considered the best form of constitutional government. In any case the imperialism and the mercantile spirit of modern England are closely connected, one might almost say intertwined, with each other. The conquest of India was the achievement of merchants who, unwillingly enough, were driven into the exercise of sovereignty as a means of preserving or extending their trade.

Thirdly. The acquisition by England of the Indian Empire will, to future historians, bear an aspect very different from that which it presented to contemporaries, and in all probability very unlike the ideas which it suggests to the men of to-day. It may well be seen in later ages to fix as truly the turning-point of English history as the extension of Roman dominion beyond the limits of Italy fixed the fate of Rome, or as the attempted conquest of Syracuse determined the fortunes of Athens. One matter is, however, now visible to all observers which naturally escaped the attention of the generation that witnessed the triumphs of Clive and of Hastings. The establishment of American independence and the conquest of India worked curiously together towards the same result. They caused English energy to shift from the west to the east. The ship of state, which had, up to 1760, been directed towards the western world, turned slowly but unmistakably eastward. More and more decidedly has England become an Eastern power. In the East Englishmen have performed their greatest exploits. Towards the East has flowed all that is most energetic in the English nation. As the interests of the country have centred in India, so Eastern questions have more and more engrossed English attention. "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also" is as true of states as of individuals. If any one wishes to see where the heart of England really is, let him compare, what often puzzles foreigners, English apathy about Continental or American questions with English activity and passion in Eastern affairs. The Crimean War was influenced by views with regard to the East; but even so the Russian contest called forth but half the strength of the country. So acute a critic as De Tocqueville fancied that English energy had declined. The Sepoys revolted. Europe expected the fall of the Empire; but the whole vigor of the nation revived, and the Eastern rebels were crushed by the same remorseless force which had, a century before, driven France both from the Western and from the Eastern world.

Fourthly. The new direction given to English energy, combined with the expulsion of French influence from all the fields which Englishmen were inclined to occupy, changed the relations between England and France. The date and extent of this alteration are concealed by the wars of the Revolution and the First Empire. They appear at the first glance to be the continuation of the old rivalry between the two countries. They are, in fact, an unnatural break in an almost irresistible tendency towards friendship which at any moment might become an alliance. The peace by which George III. put an end to the warlike triumphs of Pitt was no doubt the result of a court intrigue: it is difficult to believe that his Majesty saw in it anything else than an arrangement which favored his attack on the Whig leaders. But for all that it really marked a decisive crisis in the relations between the two neighboring nations. The War of Independence offered an opportunity which France could not be expected to miss; but it was popular enthusiasm for liberty, at least, as much as the policy of the Government which led France to aid America. The impulse which had formerly driven Frenchmen and Englishmen into unceasing contests was already dying out. The policy of Chatham, though cut short, had so completely done its work that the reasons and interests which justified it had ceased to exist. That this was so was seen when Pitt routed the Coalition. It is the custom to draw a marked contrast between the warlike policy of Chatham and the pacific statesmanship of his son. The one needed, as was said, "an accompaniment of trumpets and trombones"; the triumphs of the other were achieved by successful finance and commercial treaties. The difference in the character of the two men told for much; but we may well doubt whether the difference of the times and the situation did not tell for a great deal more. Pitt came on the public stage as the heir of Chatham. The feeling that he was his father's representative was the source to which the youthful statesman owed half his power. Father and son alike were the heroes of the City. Each found his permanent support in the rising power of the mercantile and industrial classes; each alike had the interest and the honor of these classes at heart. If the father was the constant foe of France, and the son was so averse to a French war that he could only be forced into it by the demands of a nation maddened by the horrors of the Reign of Terror, it is surely reasonable to suppose that the difference in policy was based on something more solid than a difference of individual character. The cause is to be found in a general change of national interests and sentiment. Till 1760 France was a dangerous rival to the development of England's commercial empire. Hence French power was combated by English arms and English subsidies, and Frenchmen were held Britain's natural foes. After 1760 the rivalry ceased. French prosperity promoted the welfare of England, and the greatest English minister of the day cultivated the friendship of France. Change of interest brought, as it always will bring, a change of moral feelings. Every page of such a book as Young's 'Travels' shows, what is well enough known from other sources, that, in spite of French intervention in the War of Independence, there existed in the years immediately preceding the Revolution a lively feeling both in France and in England of reciprocal friendship and sympathy. The entente cordiale would have been fully developed before the end of the century had its growth not been interrupted by the violence of the Revolution and the wars of the Empire. When English officers can see without fear as without jealousy the formation of a gigantic naval arsenal at Cherbourg, and when the representative of England can during a parade of the French navy take the opportunity to point out that peace between the two ancient rivals has now lasted for over sixty years, we may be pretty sure that the secular conflict between France and England is at an end. There is no reason, however, for holding either that the Englishmen of the last century who waged constant war with France were fools or brutes, or that the Englishmen of to-day who would feel a breach with France almost like a civil feud are philosophers or philanthropists. It is wiser to observe that Englishmen of to-day are neither better nor worse than their forefathers; that each generation will be found to occupy the position naturally suggested by its interests; and that friendship between what, after all, are the two leading Powers of Europe is the natural result of the influences which have governed what we have termed modern England.

SYMONDS'S SKETCHES AND STUDIES IN SOUTHERN EUROPE.*

MR. SYMONDS'S volumes are of varying interest and value. The essays collected in them have been published heretofore separately and at different periods during the last dozen years, and have no particular association beyond the loose one suggested in the title. Most of them are about places of Southern Europe notable for their natural scenery, their history, or their artistic wealth. All are quite as remarkable, perhaps, for their "glowing, glittering" style as for their contents. Mr. Symonds's sentences have a sort of rhythmical flow that reminds one faintly of Macpherson's 'Ossian,' and, as the author often says about Italian edifices, "Every square inch is encrusted with mosaics"—of rhetoric. It would be difficult to find an equal number of pages of good English wherein adjectives abound with such "prodigious prodigality"—to borrow another expression from Mr. Symonds. Ideas that hardly strike one as needing any particular emphasis whatever are reinforced by an accumulation of phrases; e.g., "No other poet who ever lived, in any age or on any shore" (i. 358). Alliterations are as frequent as in newspaper "display" headings; on the first page of the first essay a distant view "swam into sight from the shifting cloud," and the impression made upon Mr. Symonds was apparently permanent. "Airy azure," "cave of care," "gorgeous gloom," "golden gloom," "haunt of hives," "gaping gateways," "castled crags," "pearled promontories," we encounter in close succession. The descriptions of scenes and persons are further decorated by parenthetical allusions to other scenes and persons, which must be set down as ornament merely, and that of rather a rococo order. Sometimes these are the result of recollections confessedly singular. Thus (ii. 34):

"The traveller in Sicily, . . . crossing a broken bridge at night in the lumbering diligence, guarded by infantry with set bayonets, and wondering on which side of the river the brigands are in ambush, . . . suddenly calls to mind that this torrent was the ancient Halycus, the border between Greeks and Carthaginians, established of old and ratified by Timoleon, after the battle of Crimisus."

This, we should say, would depend altogether on who the traveller was, and how much of his classical dictionary he had in mind while in nervous ignorance as to which side the brigands were on. Mr. Symonds's imagination is a lively one, however. While looking at San Lorenzo, one winter day, "by one of those strange freaks of the brain to which we are all subject," he suddenly fancied himself "in the close of Salisbury on a perfumed summer afternoon." Then, in an instant, he was back in Perugia again, the vision having been "but a momentary dream, a thought that burned itself upon a fancy overtaxed by passionate images."

A writer who takes things so seriously may be imagined to be sufficiently impressed by the commonplace to make him in the main a trustworthy guide, rhetoric aside. This is true, to a considerable extent, with Mr. Symonds. Those portions of the essays devoted to art and artists, though invariably enthusiastic, and occasionally ecstatic, are generally of an ultra orthodoxy, the opinions expressed those which we all ought to entertain, and the emotions described those which we all ought to feel. Where a received opinion is called in question it is apt to concern some point on which, from the nature of the case, no definite conclusion can be drawn—e. g., it is suggested in regard to the bronze equestrian statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni, at Venice, that too much praise is usually given to Verocchio, to whom the design of the work is attributed, and too little to Leopardi, who executed it, no reason whatever being given for the suggestion. So in more important matters we find an unsatisfactoriness resulting from the same cause. A considerable portion of most of the essays is historical. But before accepting any statement in the exact form in which it appears in Mr. Symonds's text the reader should look at the foot-notes, and in the absence of these he would do well to consult authorities more professedly historical. In the essay on "Rimini" the author says of Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta: "It is enough to mention that he murdered three wives in succession, Bussoni di Carmagnuola, Guinipera d'Este, and Polissena Sforza, on various pretexts of infidelity. . . . He died in wedlock with the beautiful and learned Isotta degli Atti, who had for some time been his mistress" (ii. 95). This is very positive; yet in a foot-note the author tells us that, in regard to his first wife, it admits of doubt "whether Sigismondo murdered her, as Sansorino seems to imply in his Famiglie Illustri, or only repudiated her," and in regard to his marriage with Isotta "there is some uncertainty." What a writer "seems to imply" is a rather slender support for a charge of wife-murder, but perhaps Mr. Symonds thought that in the case of such villains as the Malateste one wife-murder more or less was of little consequence. We may add that it admits of still graver doubt whether all the charges of infidelity were merely "pretexts." In the essay on "Athens" we read: "The Panathenaic pomp, which Pheidias and his pupils carved upon the friezes of the Parthenon, took place once in five years" (ii. 73). In a foot-note: "My purpose being merely picturesque, I have ignored the grave antiquarian difficulties which beset the interpretation of this frieze." But how are we always to know whether Mr. Symonds is to be understood literally or picturesquely? The Panathenaic pomp took place once in four, not five years, by the way, though we should think the error a misprint were not the force of the Greek word πεντετηρίς so often mistaken.

The longest essay in the collection is that on "Florence and the Medici," in which the author endeavors to trace the constitutional history of Florence and the means by which the Medici became "despots." But it is clear that political history is not Mr. Symonds's forte, and the reader may refute him in many places by consulting accessible authorities. On "Lucretius" a wealth of rhetoric has been lavished. The quotations from the 'De Rerum Natura' are numerous, but there are no translations. Some have references to book and verse, some have not. The characterizations of the poem, as a whole, appear to us strained and exaggerated, and the treatment of particular passages often mistaken and based upon a misconception of the poet's aim. One or two points may be particularly noticed here. The quotation at the bottom of p. 343, vol. i., commences in the middle of an indivisible clause; the omitted words are indispensable to the construction of the passage. The passage quoted, p. 349, to illustrate what the author calls "the Lucretian theory of conscience," breaks off in such a way as to leave an erroneous impression. Had he quoted one line more it would have given a different coloring to the whole passage.

Near the close of his essay (p. 365) we find:

"The exordia of the first and second books, the analyses of love in the fourth, the praises of Epicurus in the third and fifth, the praises of Empedocles and Ennius in the first, the elaborate passage on the progress of civilization in the fifth, and the description of the plague at Athens which closes the sixth, are noble instances of the sublimest poetry, sustained and hurried onward by the volume of impassioned improvisation."

* 'Sketches and Studies in Southern Europe. By John Addington Symonds, author of 'Studies of the Greek Poets,' etc.' New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880. 2 vols. square 8vo, pp. 394, 388.

The alliteration with which the sentence closes was a temptation Mr. Symonds could not resist. Unhappily it has no applicability. The last subject mentioned in this catalogue is the description of the plague at Athens. It consists of 144 verses, and is in great part a translation of the description of the same event given by Thucydides (ii. 47 et seq.) It gives us a high opinion of the Greek scholarship of Lucretius. In many places the translation is so exactly literal that the editors of Lucretius, in settling the text, make conformity to the Greek of Thucydides one of the chief tests by which their choice among various readings is determined. We submit that a careful metrical version of the text of a grave historian in a foreign tongue is not what people generally understand by an "impassioned improvisation."

In the essay on "The Debt of English to Italian Literature" the debt is esteemed much greater than most persons will be willing to admit. "Popular Italian Poetry of the Renaissance," "The Orfeo of Poliziano," and "Popular Songs of Tuscany" consist principally of translations designed to give, as far as is possible in an English dress, an idea of the form as well as the sense of the poetry. Mr. Symonds's accompanying remarks contain much that is instructive, and to most readers will be novel and interesting. "Antinous" is an enquiry into the history and cult of that canonized favorite of the Emperor Hadrian, and asks many questions to which it declares no satisfactory answers can be given. An "Appendix" contains a long essay on the history and characteristics of "English Blank Verse," a note on the text of the 'Orfeo' of Poliziano, and a translation of eight sonnets of Petrarch. Of Mr. Symonds as a translator the Nation has already spoken in the review of his 'Studies of the Greek Poets.' We have carefully compared with the originals some of the translations from the Italian and the Greek contained in these volumes, and we are acquainted with none better. But when we turn from those essays which professedly consist in great part of translations to the multitudinous quotations from foreign authors with which his pages are interspersed, it is impossible to discover by what principles the author has been guided. Sometimes he tells us where his quotations come from, sometimes he does not. Sometimes he gives only the original, sometimes only a translation, sometimes both the original and a translation, sometimes the same passage in the original in one case and a translation in another, sometimes one original passage with and another without a translation, both on the same page; and all this in such a way that, in the majority of cases, we can see no reason why he should have taken one course rather than another. The proof-reading has been remarkably accurate, a matter alike important and difficult in a book pedantically studded with quotations from different languages, living and dead.

LARNED'S WINDHAM COUNTY.*

THE slow growth of tolerance is perhaps the most valuable, if it be not also the most striking, lesson of the later as of the earlier history of Windham County (see the Nation for June 15, 1876). We read on p. 129 how, during the excitement caused by shutting up the port of Boston in the summer of 1774, "Mr. Francis Green, of Boston, one of the 'addressers' and adherents of Governor Hutchinson, having ventured into Connecticut to collect debts and transact private business, was forcibly expelled from Windham town and Norwich." This outrage led Colonel Eleazar Fitch, a French-war veteran, high-sheriff of the county, to assert "that the Norwich and Windham people had acted like scoundrels in treating Mr. Green as they did." His age, services, and the general respect for him saved his person from mob violence, but the people came together and hotly resolved "that they would administer tar and feathers to any blacksmith, barber, miller, or common laborer, 'who should aid said Fitch in any way,' and so his wheat and grass were left standing, and 'the whole of a considerable trade withdrawn from him.'" A few months later, the Rev. Samuel Peters, of Hebron, in an adjoining county, having been mobbed in his home, with the aid of Windham patriots, on account of his toryism, retired to Boston, preparatory to sailing for England. By two friends who accompanied him to that city he sent back two letters, one to his mother and one to Dr. Auchmuty, of New York, containing menacing predictions of what would overtake the traitorous inhabitants of Connecticut. These letters were intercepted and read, and the luckless carriers of private correspondence were made, in default of whipping at the town-post, to run the gauntlet in Windham Village—not quite the Indian gauntlet, but well equipped with kicks, cuffs, and insults. In the same village, while the Non-Importation Agreement was in force, "Jeremiah Clark, a most useful and industrious citizen, had opened a little trade with Newport, exchanging butter and domestic commodities for sugar, molasses, or other articles, by means of two deep boxes put into a bag and laid across the back of his horse. Whether with or without cause, suspicion was aroused that he was smuggling tea into the town; whereupon the neighbors assembled with tar and feathers, intercepted him on his way homeward, and only released him after they had made sure by thorough search that no contraband goods were included in his budget." At the close of the Revolution the Tories of Windham County joined perforce in the general exodus, and with them went Colonel Fitch, to whom life had become hardly tolerable. "It was difficult for him to obtain needful supplies for his family. Ardent Sons of Liberty had decreed 'that no mills should grind for, no merchant sell goods to, a Tory.' He was insulted, watched, guarded, subjected to vexatious and ruinous prosecution."

Exactly fifty years after this unfortunate old man had been forced into exile, the spirit of intolerance showed itself in similar but far more aggravated form, and directed not against a military veteran but against a Quaker girl. The story of Miss Prudence Crandall is too well known or too accessible (in May's 'Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict' and elsewhere) to need lengthy rehearsal here. Her offence began by the admission to her select school for young ladies of a young colored woman, a church member, and unexceptionable but for her complexion and her consequent social disabilities. When Miss Crandall lost by this means all her white pupils, she converted her school into one "for young ladies and little misses of color," and the people of Canterbury not being able to persuade her to remove it to some other locality, a town meeting was called (March 9, 1833) to denounce it. This, too, proving vain, a warrant was served upon one of the pupils from Providence, under an old pauper and vagrant law, "warning her out of town unless her maintenance was guaranteed; 'to be whipped on the naked body not exceeding ten stripes' in default of satisfaction or departure."

"While waiting for legal power to break up the school, Canterbury did its best to make scholars and teacher uncomfortable. Non-intercourse and Embargo Acts were put in successful operation. Dealers in all sorts of wares and produce agreed to sell nothing to Miss Crandall, the stage-driver declined to carry her pupils, and neighbors refused a pail of fresh water, even though they knew that their own sons had filled her well with stable refuse. Boys and rowdies were allowed unchecked, if not openly encouraged, to exercise their utmost ingenuity in mischievous annoyance, throwing real stones and rotten eggs at the windows, and following the school with hoots and horns if it ventured to appear in the street. Not only was Miss Crandall herself assailed with threats of coming vengeance and ejection, but her father in the south part of the town was insulted and threatened."

The desired law was obtained of the Legislature, and the news of its passage welcomed in Canterbury "by the ringing of bells [church bells, of course], firing of cannon, and every demonstration of popular delight and triumph." Sustained by equally intrepid friends, Miss Crandall resisted the law, even going to jail, and on the last appeal succeeded in maintaining herself. Then an attempt was made to burn her house down, and finally, in a night attack, the lower windows were simultaneously dashed to pieces with iron bars. This proved too much for the nerves of the inmates, and the school was shortly given up.

It is impossible to read the accounts we have here summarized without being impressed with the light they shed on the Southern temper and behavior towards Northerners and the freedmen since the war. To judge from the denunciations of the Northern press, one would sometimes conclude that the Southern people were alien to American soil and institutions, a race different from and almost incompatible with our own. Yet, taking into consideration existing circumstances, it cannot be denied that Samuel Hoar's expulsion from South Carolina in 1844 was more excusable than Mr. Francis Green's from Windham in 1774; that it would be hard to match the non-intercourse to which Colonel Fitch was subjected with any similar treatment of post-bellum Northern settlers at the South; that the rifling of mails for anti-slavery documents was less outrageous than the punishment of "Peters's spies"; and that no white teacher of the freedmen has had an experience at all comparable in malignity, inhumanity, and unrelenting persistence to that of Miss Crandall. The truth is, and 'A Fool's Errand' should not make us forget it, that the intolerance which connects the two epochs and sections has a common explanation: the human mind was not free. If you ask what is the essential difference to-day between the civilization of Connecticut and of any Southern State, the answer must be the degree of freedom attained. For a test of this let us take, on the one hand, the fact that communications to the Northern press from the South on public occurrences are almost invariably anonymous by request, from alleged motives of prudence, and, on the other, the following extract from a recent letter to a Baltimore paper. The writer, Dr. Bagby, is a Virginian, who is avowedly studying "New England by the Back Door." In his progress he reaches Litchfield, Conn., whence he reports:

"I am dumb. Here I have been in Yankee-land for a fortnight, not looking for but fully expecting to see something or hear somebody to 'get mad at,' but have neither seen nor heard anything of the kind. Nobody has insulted me, made mouths at me, or so much as pried into my business. Truth to tell, there is less curiosity in these villagers than among our own; the bump of inquisitiveness on the Yankee head seems to have caved in. They are accustomed to strangers, I suspect."

We have left ourselves little space to enumerate the readable features of the present instalment of this laborious and highly deserving work. Ecclesiastical affairs continue to fill a large portion of the narrative, and to furnish their share of amusement and instruction. The singularly benevolent and humanizing ministry of the late Rev. Samuel J. May is depicted with considerable detail, as was most proper, and Miss Larned's sketch of him makes what amends it can for a biography of this admirable man, which has yet to be undertaken. Putnam is the military hero of the Revolutionary era, but is seen besides in various humbler rôles—as a compromiser of church squabbles, an inn-keeper in self-defence, a bell-ringer, even—and is followed to his end in a happy old age. Another leader, General Samuel McClellan, whose portrait, like Putnam's and some of the clerical and political worthies, is given, was the great-grandfather of General George B. McClellan. Nathan Hale came from Windham County, and so did General Nathaniel Lyon, who fell early in the rebellion in Missouri. Godfrey Malbone also figures here as a Tory churchman who manages to escape the popular indignation. To him are ascribed the enquiry: "How much are you sorry?" and the reply: "Well, I'm sorry twenty dollars." From Windham went Manasseh Cutler, one of the chief promoters of the Ohio Company and of the Northwest Ordinance; and General Cleveland, founder of the city bearing his name. The Burleigh brothers, reformers, teachers, and writers, were natives of Windham County; and their co-worker, Theodore D. Weld, was brought up there. The great temperance movement of the second quarter of the century is traced by Miss Larned within her chosen bounds. The transformation and redemption of the county by the rise of manufactures form a graphic chapter of extraordinary interest. It is stated on p. 590 that of the foreign population attracted by the varied industries of the county the French operatives, who form more than half, "with scarce an exception, take their savings back to Canada, and make no attempt to assimilate with the Yankees." They therefore appear to be the Chinese of Connecticut, and should be looked after by the local Kearneys. Miss Larned has enlivened her text with numerous anecdotes, like that of the Windham wife who, her husband having been brought home drunk, thanked God he was not a blood relation; or of the good sister who half filled her pastor's cup of tea with molasses, adding "another souse" when he remonstrated with her, and the flattering explanation—"Clear molasses an't too good for Mr. Russel."

XXII Ballades in Blue China. By A. Lang. (London: C. Kegan Paul & Co. 1880.)—Mr. Lang's verses are undeniably clever, but they have the defect—for trifles a serious defect—of being a little uninteresting. The reader speedily comes to the conclusion that either this sort of thing can be done by one clever man as well as by another, or Mr. Lang has no special aptitude for sonneteering. We hardly need the dedication to Mr. Austin Dobson to remind us that the former notion is untenable, but the absence of any palpable blemishes in Mr. Lang's ballades suggests caution in too quickly inferring the latter. Formally they are admirable. Now and then a line is overrun in cases that betray indolence; more rarely there is a metrical halt—e. g., in the ballade on the Jesuits, where one has to shift the accent of "Escobar" from the penult in the refrain to the ultimate in the text. But in general they are attentively rounded, the sentiment of the theme is summed up in the envoy after the approved model, the diction smooth and tripping, and the rhyming felicitous. The thought, however, thus set seems satisfied with attaining respectability, and can scarcely be called poetic; it is much, indeed, if it avoids the distinctly prosaic note which in such circumstances rarely escapes commonplace. The daintiness of significance does not keep pace with the daintiness of form; and where substance and form are closely interblended the result witnesses the universality of the law in such matters which prescribes a reduction of the whole to the lower level. The prettiest conceit in the volume is perhaps the envoy of the "Ballade of the Book-Hunter":

> "Prince, all the things that tease and please—
> Fame, hope, wealth, kisses, cheers, and tears—
> What are they but such toys as these:
> Aldines, Bodonis, Elzevirs?"

It would be churlish to insist on the banality of the moral; but Mr. Lang is perhaps overfond of repeating it at this date, and when it is a balladist's best, the reflection that his inspiration is not too spontaneous is irresistible. The range of these lyrics is worth pointing out as well as their execution, but their range also illustrates the facility of the clever amateur, and the very evenness of their excellence testifies to an essential artificiality that is at bottom the true source of their lack of interest and makes them hard reading for trifles. It is in a line with this to note that the translations are better, in the sense of having more meat, than the purely original pieces. It cannot, however, be denied that both show a nice susceptibility to poetry and a sympathetic regard for the minor strains of literature; but Mr. Lang's agreeable prose has shown these qualities abundantly, and his verses are not likely to do anything beyond confirming the fact.

God's Acre Beautiful; or, The Cemeteries of the Future. By W. Robinson, F.L.S. 8vo, pp. vii.-128. Illustrations. (London: The Garden Office; New York: Scribner & Welford. 1880.)—Mr. Robinson considers the subject of urn-burial in this volume from the side of æsthetics and of sentiment, adding, however, an appendix in which the sanitary objections to the ordinary method of interment are pointed out. After discussing the deformity of crowded graveyards, and showing that in or near great cities at least they do not afford a final place of rest, but are, on the contrary, violated, sooner or later, to make room either for new occupants or for new constructions, the author describes the "cemetery of the future" as he would have it. "Permanent and inviolable it must be, with ample space for open green lawns. It is to be a national garden in the best sense; safe from violation as the via sacra, and having the added charms of pure air, trees, grass, and flowers." Mr. Robinson's plan for a metropolitan cemetery requires a massive architectural wall and covered way, "as lasting as rock," for the columbarium to contain the niches for the greater part of the urns. It should be far enough within the boundary of the land occupied to be completely screened from the adjacent region, except where a fine prospect could be had, by avenues of tall trees. The entire structure should enclose a garden and the necessary supplementary buildings. Nearly adjoining the great covered way ornamental tombs for urns should be provided, after the Roman custom, in which a single tomb served as a family burial-place.

"In old Roman cemeteries beautiful tombs may yet be seen, with the urns within them in as good order as when placed there two thousand years ago. The expense which is now spread over a variety of graves, head-stones, and the purchase of ground, would build a tomb which might endure for ages. What a contrast between the noble Roman woman, surrounded by her maidens and friends, herself bearing her husband's ashes to the tomb, and the black array, the paid mutes, and the hideous box in which the remains of humanity are nailed up for a decay as needless as it is odious! These buildings would save all inscriptions and memorials of the dead from the ravages of time and weather—a gain which no one will undervalue. The buildings within and near the covered way, with their accompanying groves, should not occupy more than a fourth of the whole space. The covered way should not be the work of one man or period."

Within, as well as without, the wall of the columbarium there would be room "for much noble tree-planting," care being taken that the larger trees be not planted so near the tombs as to risk the disturbance of their foundations by the growth of the roots. Evergreens, and the dwarf flowering, weeping, or columnar trees, should be placed near these buildings; and in the central spaces would be found opportunity for the most skilful landscape gardening. "The open central lawns should be preserved from the follies of the geometrical and stone gardeners." At the entrance to the whole should stand a church or a classic temple.

Mr. Robinson points out that urn-burial would have the advantages of being practicable "in churches and city graveyards to any extent"; that it would lead to the preservation of large cemeteries now in use, of which the fate, after they are filled and closed in, is always doubtful; and that it would lead to the beautifying for this purpose of open spaces in cities. He does not approve the ancient method of shroud-burial, or the basket-burials recently advocated, finding in them, and justly, in cases where the risk exists of air or water contamination, an added danger in the greater rapidity of the chemical resolutions. Of his defence of cremation it is not necessary to say much, the arguments, for better and for worse, being mostly those with which we are all familiar. We may note two of the errors which he makes in common with most of the advocates of cremation. He underrates the rapid and powerful disinfectant action of fresh, dry earth—an action so potent that if all the dead could be buried in properly-chosen country soil there would be no need of cremation for sanitary reasons. As a consequence, Mr. Robinson fails to distinguish quite as clearly as the subject requires that it is in towns and cities that the value of cremation, whether for sanitary, economical, or even sentimental reasons, is great; while it is much less in the case of country interments. To the most serious argument that is brought against the adoption of the practice, that it would give immunity to poisoners, Mr. Robinson replies, with Sir Henry Thompson, that "the evil, in the shape of disease and death, which results from the present system of burial in earth is larger than the evil caused by secret poisoning is or could be": and, somewhat more cogently, with M. Lavel's argument in favor of a greater strictness in the matter of the death-certificate.

We venture to quote a part of Lord Ronald Gower's version, given in Mr. Robinson's appendix, of "a somewhat rare brochure" which describes the violation of the royal sepulchres at St. Denis during the French Revolution:

"The work of destruction commenced early in October, 1793, and lasted all the month. The first corpse found was that of Henri IV., the once beloved Henri de Navarre. Some curiosity, if not affection, still seems to have lingered even among those body-snatchers, and the Béarnais was propped up against the church wall in his shroud, and became quite an attraction for the crowd. One of the republican guards even condescended to cut off the king's gray, upturned moustache and place it on his lip; another removed the beard, which he declared he would keep as a relic. After this . . . the body was thrown into a huge pit filled with quicklime, into which followed those of its ancestors and descendants. On the next day the corpses of Henri IV.'s wife, Marie de Médicis, Louis XIII., and Louis XIV. were added to this. The body of the Sun King (as Louis XIV.'s courtiers loved to call him) was as 'black as ink.' . . . By a strange chance, on the very morning that Marie Antoinette's sufferings came to an end in the Place de la Révolution, the body of another unfortunate queen again saw the light of day. On the 16th of October the body of our Queen Henrietta Maria, who died in 1669, was taken from its coffin and added to the ghastly heap in the 'ditch of the Valois,' as the pit into which these royal remains were hustled was called. That of her daughter, the once 'Belle Henriette,' came next; then in quick succession the bodies of Philippe d'Orléans; of his son, the notorious Regent; of his daughter, the Duchesse de Berri; of her husband, and of half-a-dozen infants of the same family. . . . The resurrectionists began by the Bourbons and had still to disentomb all the Valois, and further back, up to the Capetian line, and are not content until the almost legendary remains of Dagobert and Madame Dagobert reappear. After Louis the Well-Beloved had been disposed of, came in succession, like the royal ghosts seen by Macbeth, Charles V., who died in 1380, whose body was one of the few well preserved, arrayed in royal robes, with a gilt crown and sceptre, still bright; his wife, Jeanne de Bourbon, who still held in her hand a decayed distaff of wood," etc.

But we must not linger, even upon a theme which casts the interest of Mr. Robinson's proper subject into the shade. His book is the most attractive of recent contributions to the subject of cremation and urn-burial. The illustrations are charming pieces of wood-engraving.

Deep-Sea Sounding and Dredging. By Lieutenant-Commander C. D. Sigsbee, U.S.N. (Washington: Government Printing-Office.)—This book, which is the first extended treatise on the subject ever published, describes the methods and appliances, chiefly from a mechanical standpoint, used on board the Coast Survey steamer Blake, while under the author's command, and is destined to provide a guide for those who may hereafter have charge of deep-sea work. The sounding-machine used on board the Blake was the invention of Lieutenant-Commander Sigsbee, a modification of Sir William Thomson's original machine for sounding with wire. The improved machine gave such admirable results that "in two thousand fathoms' depth the Blake (of three hundred and fifty tons measurement) was enabled, in nearly all weathers, to sound and obtain serial temperatures continuously, day and night, with a probable error in sounding not exceeding one-quarter of one per cent. of the depth, even during moderately heavy gales." Nearly all the apparatus for sounding and dredging used on board the Blake was new, or modified from previous forms, and was peculiar to that vessel. Sigsbee's water-cup, which is the first and only instrument of its kind, is an ingenious invention by which specimens of water can be obtained from any desired depth; and a more recent invention of the author's, which has been tested this summer and given satisfactory results, enables the naturalist to get specimens of animal life from any depth between the surface and bottom. With a complete outfit of this kind the Blake, under the command of Lieutenant-Commander Sigsbee, was engaged for four years in the physical survey of the Gulf of Mexico and Gulf of Florida, and systematic and perfectly-recorded observations were made, with the object of investigating depths throughout the Gulfs of Mexico and Florida, temperatures from surface to bottom over the same area, character of the bottom and of the water from surface to bottom, surface and under currents, and animal life from surface to bottom; the whole yielding "valuable results towards a more definite conception of the flow, mass, and direction of the Gulf Stream." During a part of the work Mr. Alexander Agassiz was embarked on board the Blake, and superintended the dredging and trawling. At his suggestion wire rope was substituted for hemp in the dredging-machine; he has already made public some of the results. After four years' service, Lieutenant-Commander Sigsbee, having fitted the vessel for another season's work, was relieved by Commander Bartlett. With regard to the work performed by the Blake, the Superintendent of the Coast Survey says:

"Without specifying the great results obtained from this continuous research, I may be pardoned in referring with some gratification to the fact that in the small steamer Blake, of only three hundred and fifty tons burthen, under the energetic and skilful commands of Lieutenant-Commander Sigsbee and Commander Bartlett, with a full complement of forty-five, including officers and crew, more rapid work was done than had been accomplished with the old methods and appliances by the Challenger, a vessel of over two thousand tons burthen, with a complement of twenty-nine naval and civil officers and a correspondingly large crew."

A noticeable and important feature of the work is the exact navigation of the Blake. On the correctness of the ship's observed positions the whole value of a line of soundings with the attendant observations obviously depends. The most precise methods were used in the navigation and record, and the comprehensive scope of what is known as Sumner's method—a method but little in use among practical navigators—is very clearly shown in this volume. It should be added that a large number of illustrations, most of them heliotype plates of the apparatus, accompany the text.

Journals and Journalism; with a Guide for Literary Beginners. By "John Oldcastle." 1880. Price three shillings and sixpence. (London: Field and Tuer, ye Leadenhalle Presse, E.C. 16mo, pp. 141.)—This is a handbook to journalism as a profession. It is calculated for the meridian of Greenwich, but its advice is sound for those who count from the meridian of Washington. Its aim is to show the beginner how to begin, and to give him elementary information about the methods of the newspaper and the unwritten laws thereof. It would be of slight use in any of the schools of journalism of which we used to hear so much, for it is not concerned with the perfection of the would-be journalist; it takes the more characteristically British course of indicating merely the ways of disposing of whatever the beginner may write. The successive chapters discuss "Literary Amateurs," "Introduction to Editors," "How to Begin," "'Declined with Thanks,'" "Pounds, Shillings, and Pence," "Journalism as a Career," "In an Editor's Chair," and a few kindred topics. The "ten commandments" promulgated by the author for the government of the literary beginner prescribe the use of black ink and of small sheets of paper (and only one side of them), legibility, punctuality, and the like. Unlike most authors of primers for professional novices, he does not overrate the advantages of journalism as a calling, setting forth both sides fairly. He gives interesting particulars of the rates of pay on the leading English reviews and magazines; and if his figures are accurate, as we have reason to believe them to be, the reward of the magazine writers is less in England than it is here. At least, we infer that the best American magazines pay their best writers better than do the corresponding English publications, though the average pay of literary labor is probably as high in England as with us. Those who were interested in the series of instructive confessions which appeared not long ago in the Contributors' Club of the Atlantic Monthly, as to the pecuniary rewards of various American writers, will find in this volume somewhat similar revelations in regard to literary profits in England. Pertinent quotations are made from leading journalists, and personal references—wholly inoffensive—are frequent. Variety is given to the page by the introduction in the margin of the facsimile autograph of the literary man whose name may have been mentioned in the text, and most of the leading English journalists of the day are thus commemorated. Nearly forty pages are filled with a useful "Dictionary of the Periodical Press," and a list of the chief English publications, with a running commentary of information and anecdote.

The make-up of the volume is odd. The paper is an old-fashioned tint; the type and initials are antique; and the book is half-bound in vellum, with catgut stitching boldly in view; the corners are calf; and the sides—where in an ordinary half-bound book the paper would be—are thin sheep, on which, however, the title is printed in black.
